Hard times and opposition to our discipleship draws out of us things we thought we could not do. Hard times and opposition thus become the opportunity for self-discovery. Our relationship with others helps us discover those gifts we never knew we had. So for this reason, Dis Ability is lying to himself and others. He is simply offering an excuse to do nothing. Timothy possibly hung around Prob Ability too long until he became the friend of Dis Ability.

Discipleship is about taking ownership of our God-given gifts in order to exercise them for His use in His kingdom business. Sitting around and doing nothing can be a very tiresome job. It is a wearisome job because one cannot quit and rest. Unfortunately, we have befriended Dis Ability too long. He often thinks that things are going too fast. He often finds himself being the brakeman to change and growth. We must hang around more firemen as Cap Ability and Avail Ability who will arise to the occasion of a fallen world.

In order to grow as the body of Christ, we must allow the Spirit of God to enable us to be productive disciples. We simply cannot be as the idle itching flea on the elephant’s back that just crossed an old rickety bridge that creaked and bowed under the weight of the elephant. The small itchy flea said, “Boy, we sure shook that bridge this time.”

Kinetic energy is energy in motion. A kinetically energized disciple is on the move. Potential energy, however, is simply inert unless moved into motion. As a disciple, one must determine if he or she is potential energy, or kinetic energy. Are we in motion, or are we simply one who is the friend of Prob Ability, and thus, have only the potential to move into action. Disciples of Divinity are identified by their kinetic motion, not by their potential energy.

SHOE DISCIPLESHIP

Every Christian often has his or her own definition of what a disciple must be and do. What determines our definition of discipleship is our knowledge of the Scriptures, especially our knowledge of the New Testament. If we would be a disciple of Jesus, then it is assumed that we would conduct our lives according to the instructions of Jesus. But if one has little knowledge of what Jesus said, and especially how Jesus enacted in His own behavior His teachings, then we can be assured that our behavior as a disciple of Jesus will be dysfunctional.

When we investigate the New Testament concerning the function of discipleship, we are not surprised to discover that the Holy Spirit knew there would be those who call themselves after Christ, but at the same time, they would have a flawed understanding of what discipleship really is. One of our first indications, or warnings, concerning this “fake discipleship” was voiced by Jesus when He said, “Not every one who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he who does the will of My Father who is in heaven” (Mt 7:21).

It is frightening to conclude from this statement that there are those who would claim to be disciples of Jesus, but would not be true disciples because they failed “to do the will of the Father in heaven.” We certainly would not want to be “fake disciples” who do not live according to the will of the Father in heaven. Therefore, in order to separate true discipleship from that which is false, it might be good to review what the New Testament defines as “fake disciples.” The following types of shoes might help illustrate some disciples who claim to be disciples, but are not following the will of the Father:

A. Loafer Shoe Disciples:

Loafer shoes are made for light use. One does not climb a mountain in loafers, neither are these shoes used for construction work. One does not get up in the morning, put on loafers, and then go to work. Loafers are not shoes that are used for hardy work.

Loafer Shoe disciples are the same. They are like one of three turtles who went out for coffee at the local coffee shop. When the coffee was served, it started to rain outside. The two older turtles said to the younger turtle, “Could you go out and get the umbrella, so when we are finished with coffee, we can leave without walking in the rain?” The younger turtle replied, “I will if you don’t drink my coffee!” The two older turtles complied.

So the young turtle went out the door in order to fetch the umbrella. The two turtles inside waited and waited. After several hours had passed, one of the turtles said to the other, “Well, since he is not coming back, we might as well drink his coffee.” At that moment, the younger turtle stuck his head back in the door and said, “If you drink my coffee, I won’t fetch the umbrella.”

Loafer Shoe disciples are like that. They are not determined to accomplish a task, sometimes even when they say they will. They have good intentions, but they loaf around, usually waiting for someone else to do the work. In the parable of the Talents, the master said to the “loafer” servant who had buried his talent in idleness, “You wicked and lazy bondservant ...” (Mt 25:26). This loafer servant was as the one about whom Solomon wrote: “The desire of the slothful kills him, for his hands refuse to labor” (Pv 21:25). He is as the young turtle about whom Solomon would also say, “The soul of the sluggard desires and has nothing ...” (Pv 13:4).

James wrote about some Loafer Shoe disciples who thought that they could trust in a simple inactive faith to get them to where they desired to go. But James revealed to them a surprise: “What does it profit, my [loafer] brethren, if someone says he has faith but does not have works? Can faith save him?” (Js 2:14). Loafer Shoe disciples need to remember James’ exhortation: “Even so faith by itself, if it does not have works, is dead” (Js 2:17).

B. High Heel Shoe Disciples:

High heel shoes are used strictly for presentation. They are worn by those who seek to be above their stature, and thus parade themselves as sophisticated in the crowd. These shoes are not made for running, working tuff jobs, or climbing mountains. When it comes to doing physical work, high heel shoes are worthless.

There are High Heel disciples who like to strut their stuff. They pretend to be someone greater than they are. There were some High Heel disciples among the disciples in Rome. Paul exhorted the entire group of disciples, “For I say ... to everyone that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think ...” (Rm 12:3). The reason for this exhortation is simple.

The Holy Spirit continued, “For if anyone thinks himself to be something when he is nothing, he deceives himself” (Gl 6:3). High Heel disciples think they can spiritually stand above others. But they are disciples who are living a life of deception. If a disciple struts around on high heels, he must be careful. “Let him who thinks he stands take heed lest he fall” (1 Co 10:12).

It is easy to fall from “high heel pride.” Someone said, “The only thing which really hurts me is that which hurts my pride.” In the beginning when Adam dwelt in the garden of Eden, the first thing that overcame him was his pride. It will be the last thing all of us will overcome until God humbles all creation before Him in the end. Before that time, therefore, it would be wise to heed the words of Peter in 1 Peter 5:5,6:

Yes, all of you be submissive to one another and be clothed with humility, for God resists the proud and gives grace to the humble. Therefore, humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God so that He may exalt you at the proper time.

An ambitious young boy said to his mother, “I am as tall as Goliath!” The mother asked why. The boy replied, “I made a ruler and measured myself.” Such were some of the High Heel disciples in Corinth. However, Paul judged their erroneous attitudes: “But they, measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise” (2 Co 10:12).

We remember the prideful words of the Pharisee: “God, I thank You that I am not as other men ... I fast twice a week. I give tithes ...” (Lk 18:11,12). The high heel Pharisee forgot these precious words of Jesus: “Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth” (Mt 5:5).

C. Overshoe Disciples:

Overshoes are slipped over existing shoes. They are made of rubber and have no structure of their own to stand alone. They maintain their structure because of the shoe over which they are slipped. Overshoes are not stable when they stand alone.

The Overshoe disciple never develops any spiritual structure in order to stand alone. He is faithful because he trusts in the faithfulness of someone else. This is the husband who may trust in the faithfulness of his godly wife. Because of his lack of knowledge of the word of God, this is the person who must always ask for the opinion of the “pastor” before discussing any Bible subjects. This is the attendee who is there on Sunday because he or she is infatuated with the personality of the preacher. The Overshoe disciple is usually following men and not Christ.

The Overshoe disciple is sometimes as the hunter who had a confrontation with a bear. The bear asked the hunter, “Why do you want to shoot me?”

The hunter replied, “I need a fur coat in order to keep warm.”

The bear replied, “Well then, all I need is breakfast.” So the two sat down and made a compromise. The bear eventually got up alone, having eaten his breakfast. And the hunter had his covering of a fur coat.

Contrary to the nature of Overshoe disciples, Paul exhorted, “Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might” (Ep 6:10). In order to stand strong in the Lord, Paul continued to exhort, “Put on the whole armor of God so that you may be able to stand against the schemes of the devil” (Ep 6:11).

Overshoe disciples are always limp when it comes to standing for truth. They are as children “tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of teaching” (Ep 4:14). Because they do “not receive the love of the truth so that they might be saved,” God allows them to be deluded with lies (2 Th 2:10,11).

The Overshoe disciple stands for nothing, and thus falls for everything. He or she is embarrassed to take a stand for what is right. It was about Overshoe disciples that Paul wrote 2 Timothy 4:3,4:

For the time will come when they will not endure sound teaching. But to suit their itching ears, they will surround themselves with teachers who will agree with their own desires. And they will turn away their ears from the truth and will be turned to fables.

D. House Shoe Disciples:

We slip on house shoes in order to walk around the house on carpets and cleaned floors. These are shoes we wear inside the house when we have finished our work for the day, and then want to lounge in the lounge. We put on our house shoes, lay back, and sit idly as the world goes by.

House Shoe disciples could be identified with the word “lackadaisical.” The lackadaisical disciple is not excited about anything, and thus feels no urgency to accomplish any work. This is not the disciple who has a mind to work, for he feels that he has completed his work. He is the part time disciple who has often grown “weary in doing good” (Ti 3:13). In his “couch potato Christianity,” he has not seized the opportunities to do good to all men (Gl 6:9). The House Shoe disciple has not heeded the words of Paul: “Behold, now is the acceptable time. Behold, now is the day of salvation” (2 Co 6:2).

House Shoe disciples are certainly not like the disciples in Philippi. They had searched for an opportunity to help Paul on his journeys in order that they might preach the gospel to the world through him. When they eventually found him—he was in a Roman prison—they sent support to him through Epaphroditus (Ph 4:18). Paul then wrote to them the following words: “But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly that now at last your concern for me has flourished again; though you were concerned, but you lacked opportunity to show it” (Ph 4:10).

The Philippians never slipped on their house shoes and forgot about their responsibility to evangelize the world when Paul left town. As living sacrifices who were totally committed, they never slipped off their responsibility to accomplish the work of God. House Shoe disciples need to heed the exhortation of Amos: “Woe to those who are at ease in Zion” (Am 6:1).

E. Sandal Shoe Disciples:

Sandal shoes are the skeleton of a shoe. They leave a major part of the foot exposed because they are only the remnants of a shoe. Sandals are composed of only the basics of a shoe, and yet are considered a shoe.

Sandal Shoe disciples are not complete. They have not grown “in the grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ” in order to become a mature disciple (2 Pt 3:18). They do not want to “grow up into Him in all things, who is the head, even Christ” (Ep 4:15). The problem is their lack of desire to grow in order to be complete in Christ.

Sandal Shoe disciples are satisfied to remain as incomplete disciples. Instead of being “strong in the Lord and in the strength of His might,” they are satisfied to remain as they are without putting “on the whole armor of God” in order to be considered a complete disciple (Ep 6:10,11). They are simply satisfied with putting on partial armor, while at the same time, they claim to be disciples who are totally committed to being a living sacrifice.

Peter exhorted some Sandal Shoe disciples to grow from immaturity as children of faith, to that which would guard them against the onslaught of error by which every Christian is continually bombarded: “As newborn babes, desire the sincere milk of the word so that you may grow up to salvation” (1 Pt 2:2). If there is no growth beyond the first principles of the faith (See Hb 6:1,2), then one will suffer what was happening to the Hebrew disciples, many of whom were Sandal Shoe disciples. The Hebrew writer rebuked these disciples with strong words:

For though by this time you ought to be teachers, you have need that one teach you again the first principles of the oracles of God. And you have come to need milk and not solid food (Hb 5:12).

The Hebrew writer was not addressing those who were novices in the faith. He was speaking to those who had been disciples for many years, and yet, were remaining novices in knowledge and faith. He was speaking to those who had previously undergone many hardships for their faith (See Hb 10:32,33). And yet, these disciples had not grown beyond questioning the deity of the Son of God (Hb 1,2), His high priesthood (Hb 4:14-16), and many other fundamental teachings concerning Christ and Christianity.

Their beliefs were not strong enough to endure the intimidation of the Jewish culture in which they lived. They were thus on the verge of falling back into spiritual destruction (See Hb 10:38,39). For this reason they needed the exhortation of the Hebrew writer: “For you have need of endurance, so that after you have done the will of God, you may receive the promise” (Hb 10:36).

Sandal Shoe disciples must grow in their knowledge of the word of God in order not to fall. They need to put some “meat teachings” on their spiritual skeleton in order to enjoy the fullness of the faith and inherit the promises.

F. Sneaker Shoe Disciples:

Sneaker shoes are quiet. They are used to quietly move around without the noise of a fully constructed shoe.

Sneaker Shoe disciples have convinced themselves that they can sneak around without God’s notice. We laugh at what some Muslims in Afghanistan do in reference to drinking alcohol. They will build a small covering, under which they will sit and have a little sip of whiskey or beer. When asked why they do this, they reply that Allah cannot see them drinking under the covering.

Sneaker Shoe disciples are likewise deceived. When a Sneaker Shoe disciple is on vacation, he will involve himself in some behavior that is contrary to the moral principles of God. A traveling Sneaker Shoe disciple will watch pornographic movies and read pornographic magazines when he is outside the presence of his fellow disciples. He believes he is sneaking around the omnipresence of God.

What the Sneaker Shoe disciple has forgotten is that God knows the hearts of all men (Lk 16:15). The Sneaker Shoe disciple forgets how God looks on men: “For the Lord does not see as man sees. For man looks on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart” (1 Sm 16:7). And for this reason, Paul warned some Sneaker Shoe disciples in Achaia, “If anyone is confident in himself that he is Christ’s, let him consider this again in himself” (2 Co 10:7).

If one thinks he is sneaking around God, and thus considers himself a disciple of Christ, then he should be honest with himself. It may be a time when one should confess his faults (See Js 5:16). If one feels sneaky in reference to his relationship with God, then he has no relationship with God.

G. Sunday Shoe Disciples:

This is not a particular style of shoe. However, most of us grew up with these special shoes that were reserved only for Sunday morning. They were reserved for an outward show of exquisite dress that was for Sunday morning assemblies. Sunday shoes were for dressing outwardly in order to give the appearance that one was respectful and proper for an assembly before God. However, all of us knew that we were dressing for one another in order to give an appearance of holiness.

The Sunday Shoe disciple is focusing on the outward appearance. As the Sneaker Shoe disciple, he too forgets that God looks on the heart, not the outward appearance (1 Sm 16:7). He also forgets that discipleship is 24-7. The living sacrifice is not sacrificed on Sunday alone, and then off the altar after the “closing prayer.”

If one seeks to conceal himself with stylish dress on Sunday morning, then he has deceived himself into thinking that his behavior outside the “worship hour” is free time for possibly unrighteous behavior. If one seeks to “dress up for God on Sunday,” then he has truly deceived himself into thinking that God cannot see his heart on Monday through Saturday. Fine dress on Sunday morning may conceal our hearts from our fellow members, but God can see right through fancy clothes.

Disciples who have given themselves to be a living sacrifice focus on dressing themselves with Christ. They are those who have been “baptized into Christ,” and thus “have put on Christ” (Gl 3:27). They are “clothed with humility” every day of the week (1 Pt 5:5). They take up their crosses daily (Lk 9:23). They study the word of God daily (At 17:11). They teach daily (At 5:42). And they sacrifice their lives for the Lord daily (1 Co 15:31). There are no special occasions for the disciples of Divinity to give the appearance that they are especially righteous on that occasion.

H. Combat Boot Disciples:

Boots need little description concerning their purpose. They are for rugged and productive living. And sometimes, they are meant to trudge through difficult terrain. Combat boots are designed strictly for battle. A soldier does not wear loafers, or sandals, or Sunday shoes into battle. He is assigned and given the best boots possible in order to engage the enemy. In contrast to all the preceding “shoe disciples,” this is the disciple we must be.

Combat Boot disciples get down to work. They set their mind to winning the war against Satan and his hosts. They are prepared to walk right over the most difficult times of life, right into the heat of the battle. It is as the singer, Nancy Sinatra, who uttered the lyrics of the 1960 song, Boots. And as she sang the song in reference to being jilted by a lover, we would use the words in reference to a battle cry against Satan,

These boots are made for walkin’, and that’s just what they’ll do.
One of these days
these boots are gonna walk all over you.

Combat Boot disciples are tough and strong. They are “steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord” (1 Co 15:58). They will be faithful unto death on the battle field (Rv 2:10). They are courageous and will take a stand for that which is right (Ja 1:7). And they get to work doing that which must be done (Jn 9:4). When it comes to laboring in kingdom business, Combat Boot disciples are always ready for action (1 Pt 3:15). They engage the enemy of the gospel without wavering from the mission. They are as Paul when he wrote, “I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course” (2 Tm 4:7).

As disciples of Divinity, we must always have our combat boots on and be engaged in the warfare of the Lord. As disciples of our Lord Jesus, we will sleep in our combat boots.

DISTURBING DISCIPLESHIP

The behavior of certain disciples that affect the organic function of the body of Christ was discussed in the previous chapter. Herein we dig deeper into the character of the dysfunctional disciple. We again use a play on words in order to identify what the Holy Spirit would consider dysfunctional members who cause harm to the organic function of the body.

A. Miss Quotation:

Paul identified this sister in 1 Timothy 5:13. Miss Quotation and her sisters “learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but also gossips and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not.”

Someone called up the house of Miss Quotation, and her roommate answered the telephone: “Miss Quotation is not at home at this time. Would you care to leave a rumor?” Miss Quotation is known for majoring in rumors, being driven by gossip and assumptions to twist the character and beliefs of others. She is the one who would say, “I won’t go into all the details. In fact, I’ve already told you more about it than I know.”

Miss Quotation is invariably one who talks too much, and in her much talking, she speaks of things about which she knows little or nothing. Or, in order to dominate a conversation, she embellishes that which she does know, and thus makes a falsehood out of what she communicates to others.

When God instructed Israel concerning their function as individuals in a community of people, He commanded, “You will not go up and down as a talebearer among your people” (Lv 19:16). Doing so causes community tension. Talebearing separates one neighbor from another. Solomon was right: “He who goes about as a gossip reveals secrets, therefore do not associate with him who flatters with his lips” (Pv 20:19). “A perverse man sows strife, and a gossip separates best friends” (Pv 16:28). This is true because “the words of a gossip are as wounds, and they go down into the innermost parts of the body” (Pv 18:8). Miss Quotation takes pleasure in gossiping “about the pain of those” who have been wounded (Ps 69:26). She does so because there is a flaw in her character. Either she feels inferior to others because she has little self-esteem, or she is trying to exalt herself over others, or both. In either case, she is the cause of much of the relational dysfunction among the members of the body of Christ.

B. Miss Alliance:

Miss Alliance seeks to compromise in order to avoid confrontation. She lacks a strong spirit in the faith in order to stand for that which is right. Miss Alliance was certainly in the mind of Jesus when He said,

No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and wealth (Mt 6:24).

Miss Alliance must decide whether she wants to be a totally sacrificed disciple, or if she wants to compromise Jesus for something that is of this world. Jesus would say to her, “He who is not with Me is against Me. And he who does not gather with Me, scatters” (Lk 11:23).

Miss Alliance must make a choice whether to be totally committed to Jesus, or compromise Jesus in her life by being a friend of the world (See Js 4:4). She must decide whether to have friends who are a part of the body of Christ, or be friends with those who would lead her to compromise her faith. She must determine whether to take a stand for the truth of the gospel, or compromise her faith, and thus, be led to her destruction. One important point about being the totally sacrificed offering to God is there can be no fences in one’s life that he or she would straddle.

C. Miss Behavior:

The Holy Spirit certainly had Miss Behavior in mind when He issued the following mandate:

In like manner also, that women dress themselves in modest clothing, with decency and sobriety, not with braided hair or gold or pearls or costly clothing, but rather that which manifests women professing godliness through good works (1 Tm 2:9,10).

Miss Behavior thinks that she can sow wild oats throughout the week, and then show up with the saints on Sunday and pray for a crop failure. When one becomes a disciple of Divinity, the old behavior must be put away. The old man who was buried in the grave of baptism must be kept there (Rm 6:6). Paul reminded his readers of his own life, and also their former misbehavior in sin: “For we ourselves also were once foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving various lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another” (Ti 3:3).

This was the former life-style of Miss Behavior. However, she seems not to have buried the behavior of the old man. Things must change when one becomes a disciple. Paul explained, “The older women likewise are to be reverent in their behavior ...” (Ti 2:3). They are to be such because love “does not behave unbecomingly” (1 Co 13:5). If one was known for misbehaving while living the old man (woman) before obedience to the gospel, then as a disciple one must be known for behaving as a new creature in Christ (2 Co 5:17).

We are fortunate to have the written word of God today because we can read how we ought to behave before God. Paul explained, “I write so that you may know how you ought to conduct yourself in the house of God” (1 Tm 3:15). If one walks like a duck, quacks like a duck, and flies south every winter like a duck, then he is a duck. If one walks like a disciple of Christ, speaks like a disciple, he will eventually fly away to his heavenly home because he is a disciple. Miss Behavior must be reminded of this.

D. Miss Disposition:

Miss Disposition behaves as if she were baptized in vinegar. She seems to be married to a man with the same disposition. As her husband walked out of the house one day going to work, she yelled out, “Do you have everything? Your wallet? Your keys? Your snarl?”

Jude may have had Miss Disposition in mind when he wrote, “These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts. And their mouth speaks great swelling words, flattering people to gain advantage” (Jd 16).

Someone once said, “Contentment sometimes depends on a person’s position, but more often on his disposition.” When one is not content in the state in which he or she lives, it is often manifested to others through bad attitudes. But Paul rebuked such attitudes, “Do all things without grumbling and disputing” (Ph 2:14). And in addition to this, “Be hospitable one to another without grumbling” (1 Pt 4:9). Therefore, we must “receive him who is weak in the faith, but not to judgments and disputable thoughts” (Rm 14:1). The poet was right:

‘Taint what we have, but what we give,
 ‘Taint what we are, but how we live;
 ‘Taint what we do, but how we do it,
 That makes life worth going through it.

E. Miss Advise:

Miss Advise lacks wisdom. The result is that she often gives some bad advice. James had Miss Advise in mind when he encouraged such people, “If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask of God who gives to all liberally and without reproach. And it will be given to them” (Jas 1:5). It is true, as someone said, “There’s no fool like the fool who is always taking advice, except the fool who is always giving it.” In the religious world today, religionists spend millions on self-help books, when they should be going to the greatest self-help book that has been around for centuries. The self-helps of the Bible are just as relevant today as they were when the ink first dried on the original autographs.

If one seeks wisdom, then he must realize that the source for unquestionable wisdom is God. When we ask for advice, we must first ask from God. It is always wise to ask for advice from others, but it is wise to ask advice from the experienced. Paul was undoubtedly given the correct advice from God for some sailors not to continue on a particular voyage into dangerous weather. Nevertheless, the pilot and owner of the ship decided against his advice. And subsequently, it was not a good voyage (See At 27:9-12). Miss Advise may have been on board also giving advice. Because of some bad advice, the voyage ended with all those on board being shipwrecked on the island of Malta. When asking for advice from inexperienced people, one should be prepared for a shipwreck.

F. Miss Conclusion:

The problem with Miss Conclusion is that she does not get all the facts before she makes a decision. Or, she speaks before she understands all the events and facts that surround that about which she speaks. Then again, because she is too much a friend of Miss Disposition, she takes everything wrong.

This was the problem with some of the Christians in Rome. Some believed an erroneous doctrinal/behavioral theology concerning grace. Paul repeated in question what they had erroneously concluded: “Will we continue in sin so that grace may abound?” (Rm 6:1). Some had concluded that if we are saved by grace alone, then we can sin in order that grace may abound in our lives. They came to the wrong conclusion.

Paul explained throughout the book of Romans that grace is not a license to sin. There were some in the early church who turned “the grace of God into licentiousness” by thinking, and thus behaving, contrary to the word of God (Jd 4). They concluded that since they could not fall from the grace of God, then they could sin without endangering their eternal destiny. Some today continue with this erroneous conclusion by teaching that if the Christian has been predestined to eternal life, then no sin can detour him from this destination.

But this was not the conclusion about which Peter wrote. He wrote that if we “escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord,” and we are “again entangled in them and overcome,” then we are as the dog who “returns to his own vomit” (2 Pt 2:20-22). The Hebrew writer was also specific: “For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift ... if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance” (Hb 6:4-6).

They were able to fall away because they were first “OK” through their obedience to the gospel. However, they were not once saved, and then in a state where it was impossible for them to lose their salvation. There is no teaching in the New Testament that teaches that once one is saved, he is always saved. If one believes such a doctrine, then he has listened to Miss Advise and fallen into the company of Miss Conclusion, and subsequently, become a theological Miss Fit.

G. Miss Fit:

Paul identified Miss Fit among the disciples with whom Timothy was associated. These disciples, “having swerved, have turned aside to meaningless discussion, desiring to be teachers of the law, understanding neither what they say, nor what they affirm” (1 Tm 1:6,7).

Dictionaries define a “misfit” to be a person who is not suited to the position in which he or she is. These teachers about whom Paul wrote were not fit to be teachers because they did not know the law of God. They misunderstood that which was central to Christianity, that is, grace.

In order to guard against “misfit” teachers, James cautioned, “My brethren, let not many of you become teachers, knowing that we will receive the stricter judgment” (Js 3:1). Miss Fit should have listened to this advice. Because of her lack of knowledge of the Scriptures, she was not qualified for the position in which she desired to be.

Miss Fit should heed the exhortation that Paul wrote to the Philippians: “Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Ph 1:27). If we say that we are disciples of Jesus, then our behavior should fit the identity of discipleship. This was the principle about which Jesus spoke in John 13:35: “By this will all men know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another.” Miss Fit will not fit in as a disciple if she does not learn to love the brotherhood (1 Pt 2:17). If one would seek to live the sacrificial life of a disciple, then he or she must read and follow the Rule Book on what is required to fit in as a disciple of Divinity.

H. Miss Cellaneous:

Miss Cellaneous is a many-sided person. One might say that she is a little schizophrenic. We never know who she is going to be on any particular occasion. There is little consistency in her personality because she allows her environment to affect her personality. And because of this, people usually do not put much trust in Miss Cellaneous. She is so moody that they never know when she will be in a mood for suggestions or help.

If Miss Cellaneous is to be a consistent disciple of Divinity, then she must pattern her behavior after the unchangeable God of whom she claims to be a disciple. The Hebrew writer addressed this point because there was a great deal of Miss Cellaneous’ influence among the disciples to whom he wrote. His readers were thinking about returning to the Levitical priesthood of the Sinai law because of the religious intimidation of the society in which they lived. But the writer reminded them of the God to whom they had given allegiance through Jesus Christ: “Therefore, God, desiring even more to show to the heirs of promise the unchangeableness of His counsel, confirmed it by an oath” (Hb 6:17).

If the God of our promises does not change in the promises He makes to us, then we have no right to change in our commitment to Him. God does not change His promises, nor does He fall short in fulfilling His promises. He does not because of “two unchangeable things in which it is impossible for God to lie” (Hb 6:18). For this reason we “have a strong encouragement, who have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us” (Hb 6:18).

We can trust in God because He does not change. Spiritually stable people can be trusted. Because Miss Cellaneous lacks stability in her personality, people have a difficult time trusting what she says. Because she allows the religious community to sway her beliefs, she is doctrinally unstable.

The personality problem of Miss Cellaneous is also that she often catches herself in a lie. She says she will do something, but contrary to the character of God, she changes her mind, or worse, she forgets that she made a commitment.

Our advice to Miss Cellaneous is to “hold fast the pattern of sound words that you have heard” (2 Tm 1:13). Hold consistently to the word of God, and in doing this, one will find consistency in his or her life. Establishing one’s life on the unchanging word of God adds stability to one’s life. There must never be any religious schizophrenics among the disciples of Christ.

I. Miss Lead:

Paul spoke of Miss Lead in a warning to Timothy: “For of these are those who creep into houses and lead captive gullible women weighed down with sins, led away with various lusts” (2 Tm 3:6). This would be those of the Sea Beast in Revelation who led people away from the Lord. John also warned those who are of the work of the Sea Beast to lead people away from God. They must remember, “He who leads into captivity will go into captivity” (Rv 13:10). Every disciple, therefore, should utter the following plea in prayer to God, “And do not lead us into temptation, but deliver us from evil” (Mt 6:13).

Miss Lead always represents the way that is broad “that leads to destruction” (Mt 7:13). Miss Lead is one of the “blind leaders of the blind” (Mt 15:14). If one would guard himself or herself against such blind leadership, then one must be on guard with the word of God lest one be “tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of teaching” (Ep 4:14). Miss Lead is a blind leader. “And if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch” (Mt 15:14).

If a religious leader is ignorant of the word of God, then he or she is a blind leader. If one is led by a blind leader, then he or she is a blind follower. Both will end up in the ditch of destruction. It is for this reason that the disciples of Divinity are avid students of the One who has the words of life. We therefore take seriously the following words of our Lord Jesus Christ that should be heeded by Miss Lead. “He who rejects Me and does not receive My words, has one who judges him. The word that I have spoken, the same will judge him in the last day” (Jn 12:48).

TATER DISCIPLESHIP

Leaders of the Lord’s people have throughout the years been very positive about encouraging members of the body to function in a manner that benefits the whole body. Books abound around the world that focus on positive discipleship. The books have flourished so abundantly, however, that we often forget that the epistles of the New Testament were written to correct dysfunctions in the body. Sometimes “feel good” books are written with a total disregard for the Holy Spirit’s instructions on how to correct dysfunctional discipleship.

It is great to think positive about the whole of discipleship, but in order to so think, we must identify and correct dysfunctional behavior that hinders the growth of the body. One of the means by which preachers and Bible teachers have done this throughout the years is to use words of the English language on which a reminder can be tagged to illustrate good and bad characteristics of discipleship.

We preached almost a half century ago a lesson on the “Tater” family. If one would go to the Internet, he will discover many preachers who have used this play on words of the English language in order to identify and correct relational dysfunctions in discipleship. We have done the same.

God revealed to Isaiah in reference to the reconstruction of Israel, “And one will say, ‘Built up! Build up! Prepare the way. Remove every obstacle out of the way of My people’” (Is 57:14). In order to build again, every obstacle must be identified and removed from a building site. Our application of character obstacles that are presented here, therefore, are done so in order to build up the body of Christ. It is as Paul instructed in the context of Ephesians 4. Ministries of the word of God (apostles, prophets, evangelists and shepherd/teachers), were designated in the early church in order that the members not be as “children, tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of teaching” (Ep 4:11,14).

The body of Christ is about relationships, but we must never forget that these relationships are based first on a common belief in and obedience to the truth of the gospel (See Gl 2:5; 1 Jn 1:3). Since the body of Christ is about relationships that are based on a common obedience to the truth of the gospel, then there are certain personality obstacles that must be corrected in order to construct healthy relationships that identify the loving nature of the disciples of Divinity (See Jn 13:34,35).

Belief in and obedience to a common truth is necessary. However, our initial obedience to the gospel does not iron out our behavioral dysfunctions that we often harbor while we struggle to live as a living sacrifice. Correcting behavioral dysfunctions is a lifetime project. Therefore, we must be cautious not to allow such dysfunctions to remain unchallenged in the body of Christ, and thus hinder the growth of the body. So here, with a play on the word “potato,” we introduce to you the “Tater” family, using the colloquial word “tater” that is often used in America to refer to potatoes. These members are those who pose different challenges to the organic function of the body of Christ.

A. Dick Tater:

Dick Tater is autocratic and controlling. He seeks to be the boss, and thus, enjoys telling everyone what to do instead of showing them through the example of his own behavior. In the early church, the behavior of Diotrephes illustrates the autocratic behavior of Dick Tater. Diotrephes loved to be first among the disciples (3 Jn 9). And because he loved to be preeminent, his behavior was contrary to Christian leadership principles. He went so far in this dysfunctional behavior, that when he could not get his way among the members, he threatened to excommunicate those who would not submit to his control (3 Jn 10).

Dick Tater's scheme to gain and maintain dictatorial control over the members must be clarified because some leaders are unaware of their autocratic behavior. Dick Tater accomplishes his preeminent scheme through many means. He possibly announces to the members that “God told Him” through special means what to say or do. Or, he may announce to the church, “I had a dream.” Or because of his position among the politicians of the land, he possibly feels that he should be held in high esteem among those of the church. And then there is his smooth and fair speech by which he beguiles the hearts of the innocent (See Rm 16:18). He is possibly a good speaker, and thus, through charming words he holds captive those who succumb to his charismatic persuasion (See 2 Tm 4:3). Or, it may be through his success in the business world that he feels that he has a financial advantage over the whole of the members. He may use his money to determine the direction of the works of the church by contributing only to those works in which he believes.

The behavior of Dick Tater is certainly contrary to one very specific mandate of Jesus concerning Christian leadership. It is a mandate that is crystal clear, but often so clearly violated by those who consider themselves leaders:

You know that those who are recognized as rulers over the Gentiles exercise lordship over them. And their great ones exercise authority over them. But it will not be so among you (Mk 10:42,43).

Dick Tater should have these words written on a piece of paper and tagged on his refrigerator. This is a mandate that should be engraved on his mind. Dick Tater, and all his cousins, should not be functioning among the disciples of Divinity until they humble themselves under the mighty hand of God (1 Pt 5:5,6). They must realize that King Jesus has all authority among His disciples on earth (Mt 28:18).

B. Imi Tater:

Now we must give credit to Imi Tater. She can imitate that which is good. Paul wrote, “Be imitators of me even as I also am of Christ” (1 Co 11:1). The shepherds of the flock must leave an example for the sheep to imitate (1 Pt 5:3). By imitating that which is good, Imi Tater is giving heed to the instructions that Paul gave to Timothy: “But you, O man of God ... follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness” (1 Tm 6:11).

Unfortunately, Imi Tater also has a tendency to follow the crowd. She likes to “get on the bandwagon” and enjoy the company of those who may be going in the wrong direction. The problem with “bandwagons” is that the people on these wagons are often out of tune with the instructions of God. Religious bandwagons are directed more by society, than by the word of God.

The crowd is allowed to determine what is culturally correct on the bandwagon, and thus what is supposedly religiously correct. For this reason, the idiomatic expression “bandwagon” is used more in a negative sense than in a positive manner. Imi Tater is on that wagon in order to follow the bad example of others simply because everyone is there, and she does not want to be left out.

Imi Tater has a problem with standing alone upon God’s “bandwagon” of truth and integrity. Because of her weak character, therefore, she yields her behavior to the social pressures that are contrary to the will of God. Because she is weak in the word of God, she easily follows the social religious beliefs of the crowd.

C. Common Tater:

Common Tater has the problem of wanting to comment on everything. He thinks he knows it all. He is the friend of too many of the sisters who were mentioned in the previous chapter.

One might say that Common Tater is a walking radio broadcast about all the affairs of the body of Christ. He is like the crows that were once flying off the pump handle of a local farm water pump. As the farmer sat quietly, he noticed several crows perched on the handle of his well pump. As each crow launched into flight, he also noticed that a crow would give out a loud squawk. Common Tater squawks about everything. He has a comment to make about more things than he knows. He is as someone stated, “It is better to let people think you are a fool than to open your mouth and prove it.”

Common Tater should heed the advice of Paul: “Let your speech always be with grace, seasoned with salt” (Cl 4:6). And he should listen to James: “Therefore, my beloved brethren, let everyone be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath” (Js 1:19). So we ask when Common Tater should speak, and about what he should speak? Peter would reply,

But sanctify Christ as Lord God in your hearts and be ready always to give a defense to everyone who asks you a reason for the hope that is in you, yet with meekness and fear (1 Pt 3:15).

D. Irra & Aggie Tater:

These two sisters are twins. And in being twins, their dysfunctional behavior in the family continually causes stress among the members. They are constantly stirring up feelings. They do not speak with speech that is seasoned with salt, but with speech that is seasoned with pepper. Where there are no problems, they have a talent to generate problems and tension. They wander about “from house to house,” being “gossips and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not” (1 Tm 5:13).

Solomon warned about these two sisters: “He who goes about as a gossip reveals secrets, therefore do not associate with him who flatters with his lips” (Pv 20:19). Irra and Aggie have forgotten the exhortation of Solomon: “Death and life are in the power of the tongue, and those who love it will eat its fruit” (Pv 18:21). They have forgotten that one will give account of every idle word he has spoken (Mt 12:36), “for by your words you will be justified, and by your words you will be condemned” (Mt 12:37).

James had Irra and Aggie Tater in mind when he wrote the context of James 3:2-12. In this context there were some stern warnings concerning one’s use of his or her mouth. Primarily, the exhortation of verse 8 is pertinent to the behavior of Irra and Aggie: “But no one can tame the tongue. It is an unruly evil full of deadly poison.” Those who do not realize this truth are the ones who often misuse their tongues.

E. Medi Tater

Medi Tater is the family member about whom Paul thought when he wrote the words, “Awake you who sleep and arise from the dead, and Christ will give you light” (Ep 5:14). Medi Tater spends a lot of time in meditating, but little time in getting the job done. He is inactive. He is slow. He is a dormant deadbeat in the work of the Lord. He is the member who must realize that we should make “the most of the time because the days are evil” (Ep 5:16). He is the one about whom also James wrote, “But be doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves” (Js 1:22). Medi Tater will often be there faithfully every Sunday. However, when the “closing prayer” is uttered, the rest of the members must not expect any work from him throughout the week.

Sometimes a group of members will convince themselves that a “Sunday Morning Christianity” is all that is needed to get one through the pearly gates. They have deceived themselves into believing that faith without works will enable one to slide through the judgment into what is God’s final rest. They have forgotten, however, that heaven is a rest (Hb 4). But in order to enjoy the rest of heaven, one must have worked diligently to deserve the rest.

The character of Medi Tater often shows up in his work, if indeed he is energized to leave the security of his own father and mother in order to work to support himself. Christianity is about “earning one’s keep.” Paul explained his behavior as a disciple when he was with the Thessalonians. “For you yourselves know how you ought to follow us, for we did not behave ourselves disorderly among you” (2 Th 3:7). The word “disorderly” is a military term. It was used in the military of the day in reference to one walking out of step with the rest of the soldiers.

In Paul’s use of the word, therefore, there is an “orderly” walk in reference to discipleship. And in the context of 2 Thessalonians 3, the orderly walk refers to working for one’s own sustenance. Paul continued, “... nor did we eat any man’s bread without paying for it” (2 Th 3:8). Paul did not freeloader off the people. In this case, he felt no entitlement in reference to preaching the gospel to unbelievers. He reminded the Thessalonians, “But we worked with labor and hardship night and day so that we might not be a [financial] burden to any of you” (2 Th 3:8). (A lot of preachers need to read this statement again.)

Indeed, Paul did have the right to receive support from believers for teaching (1 Co 9:14; Gl 6:6). But he reminded the Thessalonians that when they were unbelievers, he preached the gospel to them without asking for a contribution. He did this in order to leave them an example of working with their own hands to support themselves. And when they were obedient to the gospel, and thus became members of the body, his mandate was that these disciples “with quietness they work and eat their own bread” (2 Th 3:12). And if they did not work, then the working disciples must change their relationship with all those who were friends of Medi Tater: “And if anyone does not obey our word in this letter, note that man and have no company with him so that he may be ashamed” (2 Th 3:14).

Therefore, “if anyone is not willing to work, neither let him eat” (2 Th 3:10). Discipleship is about being busy in providing for one’s own needs. In providing for one’s own needs, he then has the opportunity to help provide for the needs of others until they are trained to provide for their own needs (See At 20:34,35; Ep 4:28). The conclusion to New Testament instructions for Medi Tater is that if he does not get to work to provide for his own needs, then he is to be disfellowshipped from the body of disciples (2 Th 3:6). He is walking dysfunctionally in reference to discipleship. He is out of step with the soldiers of Christ

F. Hesa Tater:

Hesa Tater suffers from apprehension. His problem is that he is so afraid of making a mistake, he ends up doing nothing lest he make a mistake. He has no dreams, for he allows all his fears of making a mistake to discourage him and others from launching out. He is the one during the meeting of the saints to plan work who always says, “Let me play the devil’s advocate.” And truly he does in reality function as the devil by posing all sorts of obstacles in the minds of others that certain things cannot be done. His negative attitude during work meetings often results in work never getting done.

After the resurrection of Jesus, and while the disciples were on the sea of Galilee, Jesus appeared to them on the beach (See Jn 21:1-14). They had fished all night and accomplished nothing. Then one of the disciples looked up in the early morning hours and recognized Jesus at a distance standing on the beach beside some fish He was cooking. The disciple yelled out, “It’s the Lord!” Upon hearing these words, Peter threw himself into the water and headed for Jesus.

We would do well to repeat to ourselves the words “It’s the Lord” so many times that our ears ring with a desire to throw ourselves into His work. If we sit around apprehensive as Hesa Tater, opportunities will pass us by.

When we worked in the West Indies in the early 70s, one could freely walk down any mountain path and up to any house. He could ask if the occupants would like to study the Bible. The residents of nine out of ten houses in those days would cordially invite a stranger in to study the Bible. Those days are past. It is now that the occupants of nine out of ten houses will shut their doors to a study of the Bible. An opportunity passed by where there were few laborers to reap the receptivity of the day. There were too many Hesa Taters sitting on mission committees who hesitated to send laborers to those who were hungering and thirsting after the word of God.

G. Speck Tater:

The twin brother of Hesa Tater is Speck Tater. We all know the behavior of Speck Tater. He is willing to be a spectator of other people’s work, but he or she sits idly by, often taking glory for the work of other disciples. There were some Speck Tater members in Corinth, for Paul rebuked them with the words in reference to his own labors, “We are not boasting of things beyond our measure, that is, of other man’s labors” (2 Co 10:15).

Speck Tater is willing to allow others to build the church while he sits and watches. When the work is done, he will take credit for the work with the actual workers who accomplished the work.

One of the fatal theologies of Speck Tater is the erroneous belief that his discipleship is determined by his spectator attendance at the assemblies of the saints. Or, he may believe that he is someone important if he attends important meetings and lectureships of the leaders of the saints, but does nothing at home to build the body.

Speck Tater fails to understand that attendance does not define discipleship. Attendance at meetings of the disciples reflects obedience to attend, but it does not determine the participation in the work of all those who attend. There were many brothers of Speck Tater in the early church. They first developed a “faith only” theology in order to pacify their laziness. James rebuked these spectators by revealing that their “faith only” was actually a dead faith (See Js 2:14-26).

The problem seemed to go beyond the theology of “faith only” to the point that Speck Tater did not show up at the assemblies of the saints. He did not because doing so meant that he would be intimidated into going to work. So the Hebrew writer answered Speck Tater with the statement, “Let us consider one another to stir up love and good works” (Hb 10:24). Speck Tater is not considerate of his brothers and sisters in Christ. He does not desire to be in any assembly wherein love and good works are encouraged. In such meetings, he would be the brother who would be encouraged to get to work. Because he developed the habit of not showing up, the Hebrew writer was more direct: “... not forsaking the assembly of ourselves together, as is the habit of some ...” (Hb 10:25).

Because he is inconsiderate of other disciples, Speck Tater developed a bad habit. He would not show up at any assembly where love and good works were encouraged. He stayed away, and thus denied his discipleship of Divinity. No disciple can consider himself or herself a disciple of Divinity if he or she stays away from the family of disciples who would encourage them to love others, as well as become involved in the function of the body.

H. Rot Tater:

There is no English word on which we can make a play to describe Rot Tater. The character of Rot Tater simply comes from the old proverbial statement, “He is a rotten potato,” meaning that in the potato sack, one potato is rotten, and thus, should be discarded. And so should Rot Tater.

Rot Tater could be the traditional disciple who seeks to legally bind behavior and beliefs where God has not bound (See Rm 16:17). Or, he could be the lazy disciple about whom Paul spoke in the context of 2 Thessalonians 3. And then, he could be following his sister Miss

Fit. What we would say to Rot Tater are the words that Paul wrote to a few Rot Taters in Colossians 3:12,13:

... put on as the elect of God, holy and beloved, a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another and forgiving one another. If anyone has a complaint against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also should you.

After repeating these words many times in his mind, Rot Tater should pray, “And forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors” (Mt 6:12).

I. Sweet Tater:

Sister Sweet Tater is the example for us all. She has followed the example of the early evangelists about whom Paul wrote to the Thessalonian disciples: “We were gentle among you, even as a nurse tenderly cares for her own children” (1 Th 2:7). She is the sister who has “a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, longsuffering” (Cl 3:12). Her character is as some poet once wrote:

Just a friendly word or two,
Or a sympathetic smile;
And glad courage comes anew,
Shortening the weary mile.
Just to know that others care,
If we fail or if we fall;
And the ills that brought despair,
Will soon matter nothing at all.

EXAMPLE DISCIPLESHIP

The historical sections of the New Testament focus mostly on how people responded to the person and mission of Jesus Christ. It is not that we bind as law the examples of their obedient responses to the law of God. If we would do this, then it would be justification for us doing the same in reference to binding our own example of obedience on others. And if we did this, we would bring into bondage those who would admire our example. We would thus minimize obedience to the law of God. Those who followed our examples would be encouraged to ignore God’s law in order to keep our traditions, and thus, they would give up their own freedom in Christ (See Mk 7:1-9; Gl 5:1). It is the binding law of God that must be obeyed. The New Testament is filled with examples of how people obediently responded to the will of God.

In recording the obedient example of the early disciples, the Holy Spirit is trying to encourage and challenge us. We read the examples of the first century heroes of faith as illustrations, or challenges to better our own discipleship. When we see the effect that Jesus had on their lives, we are challenged to be transformed into a better living sacrifice that is offered to God. If the early disciples responded in such a marvelous manner to the resurrected Son of God, then we also can do the same.

What is very encouraging is the extent, or extremity, to which the early saints committed themselves to live a totally sacrificed life in daily worship of the One who released them from the burden of their sins. Barnabas was one of these disciples. A definitive statement of his character and “spiritual worship” was written of him by the Holy Spirit:

Then news of these things came to the ears of the church that was in Jerusalem. And they sent Barnabas off to Antioch. Now when he came and saw the grace of God, he was glad. And he encouraged them all that with purpose of heart that they remain faithful to the Lord. For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Spirit and of faith. And many people were added to the Lord (At 11:22-24).

Every disciple of Divinity would desire that such be said of them in their ministry for the Lord. Before the announcement that Jesus was the Christ and Son of God on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30, and before he obeyed the gospel in response to this truth, Barnabas was an ordinary man just like the rest of us. His original name was Joseph, but he was later named “Barnabas” by the apostles (At 4:36). He was the cousin of John Mark (Cl 4:10). He was a Levite from Cyprus, and a former owner of land (See At 4:36,37).

It was not that Barnabas was a unique person. He simply responded uniquely to the person of Jesus in order to be a dedicated disciple. Because the Holy Spirit wanted all of us to recognize the totally committed response of Barnabas to the gospel, He recorded in Holy Scripture the example of his life. Since we have a New Testament record of Barnabas’ living sacrifice, the Holy Spirit is asking us to be encouraged by what we see in Barnabas.

A. Barnabas was an evangelistic disciple.

Barnabas “... having land, sold it and brought the money and laid it at the apostles’ feet” (At 4:37). The historical context of this contribution is what made Barnabas’ action of giving so thrilling in reference to world evangelism.

Jewish and proselyte visitors came from throughout the world to be at one or more of the annual Pentecost celebrations in Jerusalem (See At 2:5-12). They came with money and supplies for the fifty-day celebration. But when the visitors arrived on the A.D. 30 Pentecost, God had a surprise for them.

On the A.D. 30 Pentecost, there were about 3,000 people baptized in response to the announcement of the resurrection and reigning Jesus, whom the apostles declared to be the Messiah (Christ) and Son of God (At 2:29-38,41). At the following Pentecost a year later in A.D. 31, we would expect that the crowd was even greater, for Isaiah, 600 years before, had prophesied that the word of God would go from Jerusalem (Is 2:1-4). Once the word (gospel) was initially announced at the A.D. 30 Pentecost, it motivated the first respondents to broadcast the good news to synagogues throughout the Roman Empire. One can only imagine the multitude of people who went forth into all the known world with the news of the resurrected Jesus in their hearts. They went forth to announce to the world the good news that the apostles had declared in the streets of Jerusalem.

Through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the apostles were the “Bibles” who declared the fulfillment of prophecy concerning the Messiah, as well as God’s instructions for those who were now His new creation in Christ (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). The apostles thus stayed in Jerusalem for as long as fifteen years in order to greet Jews who continued annually to come to the Pentecost feasts. It was a “lectureship” for the returning Jewish saints, but an opportunity to evangelistically reach out to those Jews, who for the first time, would encounter Jesus through the apostles’ teaching.

The need for support for these visitors who came from all parts of the world, became critical for the local disciples. The local disciples knew that the visitors needed to continue “steadfastly in the apostles’ teaching and fellowship” (At 2:42). Because everyone knew that the gospel must be preached to every creature of the world (Mk 16:15), the local Christians partnered financially with the visitors in order to keep the visitors at the apostles’ feet to be taught for as long as possible. When these disciples returned home throughout the world, they would preach Jesus in their synagogues and communities.

For this reason, the local Christians responded to the financial needs of the day. “Great grace was upon them all” (At 4:33). Therefore, there was no one “among them [the visitors], who lacked, for as many [local disciples] as were owners of land or houses sold them and brought the proceeds and the things that were sold” (At 4:34). And Barnabas was right in there among those who sold their possessions. “Barnabas ... having land, sold it and brought the money and laid it at the apostles’ feet” (At 4:36,37). Barnabas, too, believed the prophecies and mandate of Jesus that the gospel must be preached to all the world.

Since Jesus’ prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem would in the near future take away all the possessions of the Judean Christians, and depopulate Judea of Jewish residents, the local disciples believed Jesus, and subsequently they disinvested in Palestine (See Mt 24). Barnabas as well, believed Jesus and sold out. He joined with the other disciples in putting his money into world evangelism.

This is just a small window into the heart of a true disciple of Divinity. In reference to finances, Barnabas had his priorities in order concerning what was most important in reference to preaching the gospel to the world. The following words of Jesus continued to ring in his ears: “You cannot serve God and wealth” (Mt 6:24). Barnabas chose to serve God. He knew that it was better to die poor, than to leave an inheritance that could be wasted away by heirs who loved wealth.

Barnabas was a disciple who understood the continued work of the One of whom he claimed to be a disciple. Throughout his life as a disciple, he not only gave to support the preaching of the gospel, but he also personally did the work by going with Paul on Paul’s first mission journey (At 13, 14). True disciples of Divinity both support missions, and sometimes, they are missionaries themselves. If they cannot go to other fields, they make sure that someone does (See Rm 10:14,15; 3 Jn 5-8).

B. Barnabas was an exhorting disciple.

Because Joseph was gifted with the personality and ability to encourage people, the apostles changed his name. They changed it to “Barnabas,” which name means “The Son of Encouragement” (At 4:36). This makes one think. If we were in contact with the apostles, and they really knew who we were, then what name would they give us? Would our new name be “The Son of Joy”? Or possibly, it might be “The Son of Optimism.” Or maybe it would be, “The Son of Despair,” or, “The Son of Discouragement,” or even, “The Son of Lazy.” If our name were changed by our friends, then what name would they give us?

Barnabas had the gift of encouraging others because he was an encouraging personality. The room became brighter when he entered. Because Barnabas had the spirit of encouragement, God could use him for unique ministries. For example, when the disciples in Judea heard that there were new disciples in Antioch, “they sent Barnabas off to Antioch” (At 11:22). And when Barnabas arrived, “he encouraged them all that with purpose of heart that they remain faithful to the Lord” (At 11:23).

When in a mission area where boldness was needed to preach the gospel to unbelievers, Barnabas was there.

And when many believed what Barnabas and Paul taught, the two speakers “persuaded them to continue in the grace of God” (At 13:43). But when the opposition saw that the people were giving heed to what Barnabas and Paul were preaching, the two evangelists “grew bold” (At 13:46). On their return to cities to which they had first preached the gospel, Barnabas and Paul “taught many ... confirming the souls of the disciples and exhorting them to continue in the faith” (At 14:21,22).

Barnabas was one who certainly implemented in his life the mandate of the Hebrew writer: “But exhort one another daily, while it is called ‘Today,’ lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin” (Hb 3:13). Barnabas was one with all those saints who were for “encouraging one another, and so much the more as you see the day approaching” (Hb 10:25).

One of the tasks of a good evangelist is to encourage the disciples wherever they are encountered. When Paul and Silas left Philippi, “they encouraged” the brethren (At 16:40). Aquila and Priscilla encouraged Apollos to continue on in his personal mission to Corinth (At 18:27; see 1 Co 16:12). Even when Paul was in the midst of a storm at sea, he encouraged everyone who was on board the doomed vessel by revealing to them that they would all survive (At 27:33).

One of the signals of true discipleship is manifested in how we affect people in a positive manner. And there is no greater gift in human relationships than to be one who brings encouragement to the disheartened.

Christianity is about mutual encouragement. Paul wanted to visit the disciples in Rome, so that, he wrote, he might be “encouraged together” with them (Rm 1:12; compare Rm 15:4,5; Ph 2:1). As a Christian, Barnabas realized his responsibility was to always encourage those in whose company he was at any particular time.

C. Barnabas was a good disciple.

We find the following statement most incredible in reference to God commending a man. It is a statement of the Holy Spirit in reference to the character of Barnabas: “For he [Barnabas] was a good man” (At 11:24). This is God making a statement concerning the character of one of His precious children.

If the Holy Spirit referred to Barnabas as “a good man,” then certainly we would want to know what was necessary in order that we too be considered good by God. We would certainly say that Barnabas was considered good by God because of feeling the needs of others, for he gave his possessions (At 4:37). He was one who perceived the heart of God to preach the gospel to the world, for he both gave to missions, and then he gave himself as a missionary (At 13,14; see 3 Jn 5-8). And he was right in his faith, for he, being a Levite, believed and obeyed the gospel. In one's life as a disciple, he or she is either portraying Christ or betraying Christ. Barnabas was a shining example of what the Holy Spirit would declare to us as one who portrayed Christ. Because he portrayed Christ, he was a good man.

If one were carrying a bucket of water from the well to his house, and was accidentally bumped by his neighbor, he would spill only what was in the bucket, that is, water. Life is full of bumps. We are often bumped daily as we walk along life's journey. It seems that in Barnabas' case, he spilled only goodness. And because he spilled only that which was good, the Holy Spirit identified him as a good man. If we are filled with the Spirit, then we will be considered by God to be good, and thus, spill only good when we are bumped.

D. Barnabas was a man full of the Holy Spirit.

Most people today misunderstand what being "full of the Holy Spirit" means. It helps to understand being full of the Spirit by reasoning what it cannot be. Reference cannot be to degrees by which the Spirit dwells within the Christian, for we all have Him the same. The Holy Spirit does not present the opportunity for any disciple to glory in reference to how much the Spirit works in his life, for the Spirit does not work to give one the opportunity to glory in himself. Being filled with the Spirit cannot refer to one's gifts being marginalized, or overpowered by His influence. If this were the case, then the Spirit would become a respecter of persons in that He would enhance one person's gifts, but ignore another's. Being filled with the Spirit cannot refer to one being more "spiritual" than any other disciple. Again, this would be saying that the Spirit shows respect of persons. We would wonder why He would empower one disciple and ignore another. And if one disciple claimed to be especially empowered directly by the Holy Spirit, then a fellow disciple would feel that he was marginalized by the Spirit because he was neglected or overlooked by the Spirit.

Understanding "being filled with the Spirit" as it is used in several New Testament contexts might help. John the Baptist was "filled with the Holy Spirit, even from his mother's womb" (Lk 1:15). This certainly had no reference to baby John speaking in tongues, preaching marvelous lessons, being spiritually minded, or giving spiritual counsel. We can only assume from this statement that as a babe, John was a good infant. There was something about his demeanor, even as a babe, that signaled to everyone that there was something special about this child. And certainly, when he was able to speak, things started to happen in his life.

Those who were filled with the Spirit conducted their lives with sobriety. The demeanor of their behavior commanded the attention of others. In this way, they were led by the Spirit, for they followed a course of ministry to be useful to the Holy Spirit to both live and speak the word of God.

Any who would be filled with the Spirit would speak out for God. They would not be timid. Elizabeth, John's mother, "as filled with the Holy Spirit. And she spoke out ..." (Lk 1:41,42). "Zacharias was filled with the Holy Spirit. And he prophesied ..." (Lk 1:67). "Then Peter, filled with the Holy Spirit, said to them ..." (At 4:8). "Then they were all filled with the Holy Spirit. And they spoke the word of God with boldness" (At 4:31). "Paul, filled with the Holy Spirit, ... said ..." (At 13:9). Get the point? Barnabas was filled with the Spirit, and thus used his gift of encouragement to speak forth the word of God to the people. He was an encouraging person, both in the demeanor of his life and by the words he spoke.

The behavior of Barnabas identified him as a Spirit-filled person. It was as Paul later wrote to the Ephesians: "And do not be drunk with wine, in which is debauchery, but be filled with the Spirit" (Ep 5:18). Being drunk will lead one to do all sorts of senseless things. According to Paul's statement to the Ephesians, when one is emotionally behaving senselessly, he is not filled with the Spirit. Losing control of one's emotions is like being drunk. But the opposite is true for those who are filled with the Spirit.

When a disciple behaves soberly, it is then that his behavior reveals that the Spirit is directing him through his obedience to the word of God. Those religionists who writhe on the ground in senseless nonsense are as those who are as one drunk with wine. They are not filled with the Spirit because they are emotionally out of control. Because of his sober behavior, on the other hand, people could see that Barnabas was a man filled with the Spirit. And because his demeanor was under control, people listened when he spoke.

E. Barnabas was a man full of faith.

The Holy Spirit tagged Barnabas as a man "who was full ... of faith" (At 11:24).

1. He had faith in the mission of Jesus: The extent of his faith was revealed through the contribution he made to the mission of preaching the gospel to the world. The text reads, "... having land, sold it ..." (At 4:37). The indication is that he sold all his land. He did not sell some of his land, and deceptively hold back some as Ananias and Sapphira did in reference to the sale of their possessions (At 5:1-11). But as a land owner, he sold all of that which many considered to be the one possession that is most difficult to release ... land!

The extent of Barnabas' faith was not revealed in what he gave, but in how much he kept back for himself. He sold it all and kept back nothing for himself. It was as someone said, "Generosity is not a sum in addition. It is a sum in subtraction." And the sum in subtraction in reference to the contribution of Barnabas' land was 100%. He believed that the land belonged to God. Whether he had personal control over his land, or the church to which he contributed the proceeds of the sale, he believed that his possessions always belonged to God.

2. He had faith in people: Barnabas also had faith in people. Something happened in the early life of Barnabas as a disciple that manifested his faith in people. After his conversion in Acts 9, Saul (Paul) eventually returned to Jerusalem. However, it seems that the fear of him as a persecutor of the church continued to prevail among the saints in the city. Luke recorded, "And when Saul had come to Jerusalem, he tried to associate with the disciples, but they were all afraid of him" (At 9:26).

Having faith in people is sometimes difficult, especially if a particular person has been one's enemy. Of all the saints in Jerusalem who knew that Saul formerly persecuted the church, it seems that Barnabas stood alone and above the crowd. Luke continued the record of this event, "But Barnabas took him [Saul] and brought him to the apostles" (At 9:27). This is the epitome of a disciple of Divinity. The following is the example of what Divinity did for us:

For when we were still without strength, at the right time Christ died for the ungodly. For scarcely for a righteous man will one die, yet perhaps for a good man some would even dare to die. But God demonstrates His own love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us (Rm 5:6-8).

And such was the example Barnabas followed in reference to loving one who was once his enemy in the faith. His faith in people illustrated his faith in God, for by his faith in God he was able to overlook the wrongs of one who was once his enemy.

The faith of Barnabas moved him to be patient with people. Many years later, when he and Paul were going on Paul's second mission journey, Barnabas wanted to take with them his cousin John Mark. But on the first journey, Mark had departed from Barnabas and Paul (At 13:13).

Paul knew that they were again going into hostile territory on the second journey, and thus thought it not wise to take Mark (Acts 15:36-41). An argument ensued and Barnabas ended up patiently taking Mark with him back to familiar territory where they had previously visited.

Barnabas' faith in Mark eventually paid off, for at the end of Paul's life, and while in prison, Paul called for Mark to bravely come to what would be the future seat of persecution (Rome) (2 Tm 4:11). Paul needed Mark for ministry in Rome.

Barnabas seems to have always recognized something good in people. Because he always looked for the best in people, he treated people accordingly. And for this reason he reassured everyone he met that he considered them for the good they were and not for the wrongs of their past. Barnabas made a decision to always remember the good about the past, and thus he sweetened the present through his sweet memories of the past. Maybe we should have more sessions with one another wherein we say in one another's presence all the good that we know about one another.

When we think about Barnabas, we think of a disciple who sought to emulate in his life the character and actions of the God who loved us so much that He gave His only begotten Son (Jn 3:16). Barnabas would take the side of the downcast in order to draw from within them their greatness which they could use for the glory of God. We remember what John exhorted Gaius to do: "Imitate that which is good" (3 Jn 11). And Barnabas is a good disciple we should imitate.

FOOD DISCIPLESHIP

Different fruits and vegetables affect different people in different ways, depending on their tastes. And so it is with our personality and character. How we portray Christ to others often depends on the tastes of those in whose presence we are. And for this reason, it is important for every Christian to fine tune his personality and character in order to manifest, as Paul said, "the aroma of His knowledge through us in every place" (2 Co 2:14).

Our influence on others is as Paul continued in his letter to the Christians in Achaia, “To the one we are the aroma from death to death, and to the other the aroma from life to life” (2 Co 2:16). We thus work on how we present ourselves to others for a very important purpose: “For we are to God a sweet fragrance of Christ, in those who are being saved and in those who are perishing” (2 Co 2:15). It is our goal to present to others the sweet fragrance of Christ in order that others be attracted to Christ, and thus, come to life.

One of the purposes for our close relationship with one another in Christ is that we are offered the opportunity to check one another’s personality and character. The closer we become, the more our personalities are identified by one another. Assets are discovered, and detriments are discouraged. As disciples of Divinity we are relational in order that we can fine tune our personalities and characters for a better presentation of the radiant aroma of Christ to the world.

In our travels around the world, we have encountered hundreds of fruits and vegetables that often identify the personality and character of Christians. In a metaphorical application, some of the following fruits and vegetables may not be fully understood by every reader, simply because a particular reader may not have eaten the fruit or vegetable. Nevertheless, in the definition of the tastes of the selected fruit or vegetable, we hope to describe metaphorically a particular personality or character that we may have encountered or portray ourselves.

A. Breadfruit disciples:

Breadfruit is a fruit that originated in the South Pacific. Once discovered as a fruit that could be eaten, the tree was planted in many places of the world in order to provide food for slaves. When we were in the West Indies we ate breadfruit. When eaten straight from the tree, this fruit is so bland that it needs a great deal of help to be pleasing to the tastes. It is thus cooked in every possible way in order to make it palatable. It is simply a bland fruit that always needs help in order to make it acceptable.

There are some very bland disciples who need a lot of help with their personality. These are disciples who need to heed the words of the Holy Spirit: “Awake you who sleep and arise from the dead, and Christ will give you light” (Ep 5:14).

There may be some who are bland simply because they have grown disheartened. These disciples need to listen to the Hebrew writer when he spoke in reference to the hardships of Jesus: “For consider Him who endured such hostility by sinners against Himself, so that you not grow weary and faint in your minds” (Hb 12:3). And, “My son, do not despise the disciplining of the Lord, nor faint when you are rebuked by Him” (Hb 12:5).

If one feels that he needs help in order not to become weary and faint, then it may be that he has become dull of hearing the exhorting word of God that is able to build us up (At 20:32; Hb 5:11). If the word of God is able to build up our faith—and it is—then when our faith is not being built up, we must assume that we are not into the word as we should be (See Rm 10:17).

A good point to remember is what Paul wrote in Philippians 4:13: “I can do all things through Him who strengthens me.” If one’s life is bland because he or she has become weary and fainthearted, then it is time to wake up and smell the coffee. All disciples go through times when life seems bland. It is not wrong to sometimes be down, but it is wrong to stay down. If we stay down, then one is not allowing Christ to strengthen him. The problem is not in what causes us to be bland, but our rejection of that which is able to build us up. When one becomes excited about the seed of the kingdom, the result is that he becomes excited about the spiritual needs of others. And when one is excited about the needs of others, he will become more excited about the Seed. Seed and need build one up in spiritual strength (See At 20:32).

B. Squash disciples:

There are numerous types of squash throughout the world. But there is one thing that is common with every squash in reference to being used as a food. Once cooked, every squash is squashed. The name of the food is appropriate. Squash is made to be squashed as a food, and thus in being squashed, it loses its identity. Unless one has identified the food before it was smashed into an eatable food, one would not know if it were squash, a pumpkin, a potato, or some root.

Some Christians lose their identity when “squashed” by the heat of persecution, or simply by a trying situation in which they find themselves. Such was the case with the disciples to whom the Hebrew writer gave instructions to stand strong in Christ. He wrote the following to these disciples who were on the verge of apostasy: “For the earth which drinks in the rain that often comes upon it, and brings forth herbs useful for those by whom it is dressed, receives blessing from God” (Hb 6:7).

The point: We receive God’s blessing when we faithfully produce. However, there was a problem with these disciples. The recipients of this exhortation, who were being intimidated to return to the Sinai law, were in the process of losing their identity as Christians, and thus, their salvational blessing from God.

The writer continued, “But if it bears thorns and thistles, it is rejected and near to being cursed, whose end is to be burned” (Hb 6:8). If these Christians were “squashed” by the “thorns and thistles” into apostasy, then they would eventually be burned. Therefore, they must “imitate those who through faith and patience inherit the promises” (Hb 6:12). In other words, without faithfulness, there is no blessing of the promises.

This is critical in reference to our salvation, “for if we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins” (Hb 10:26). Squash disciples, therefore, must be cautioned about losing their identity as Christians, and thus, their inheritance of the promises. They must not allow the world in which they live to weaken their identity as disciples of Divinity, and thus, rob them of their salvation.

One can lose his identity as a Christian if he follows after any faith that is not identified as true by the will of God (See Mt 7:21). One can lose his identity as a Christian if he becomes a friend of the world (Js 4:4). If one is squashed into the image of the world, then certainly he has lost his discipleship of Divinity, and subsequently, his eternal salvation.

C. Radish disciples:

The first bite of a radish is hot. It looks good on the outside because it is red. But when eaten, it is often too hot for some people to be eaten alone. It must be mixed with another food, possibly in a salad.

Some disciples are like this in their personality. They have a hot temper. They forget that their hot temper is too close to danger. But someone advised, “If you are patient in one moment of anger, you will escape a hundred days of sorrow.” One hot word will often cool a relationship.

The radish disciple is in need of patience. Solomon would admonish him with the words, “He who is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he who controls his spirit than he who takes a city” (Pv 16:32). “Therefore, my beloved brethren,” James exhorted, “let everyone be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath” (Js 1:19).

Radish disciples have one of the most difficult personalities to overcome. It is hard to overcome because they have usually been this way from their youth. Others have allowed them to get away with their outbursts of anger. And now in an age of social media, their hot temper shows up as “online bullying.” They are very critical, and subsequently, they make heated remarks in response to something they read on someone’s timeline.

Hot tempered people are known for speaking (writing) before they think. They will make their critical statements on social media because they know that no one will be able to give them a face-to-face response with which they must deal personally. They become social media trolls who are in search of some innocent victim to vent their “radish personality.”

These are those disciples who have lost their aroma of Christ, and thus, people do not desire to be around them, lest something is said that sets them off. They are opinionated to the point that others are in fear of voicing their own opinions, lest the discussion digresses into debate. These are those disciples who need to heed the Holy Spirit’s advice to “let your speech always be with grace, seasoned with salt” (Cl 4:6).

A wise writer once wrote the following short story of a radish disciple:

Once upon a time there was a fellow who got very angry at something that was done to him in the church. So he said, “I’ll never go back to that church again. I’ll die and go to hell first.” And so he did.

D. Grapefruit disciples:

Ever just take a big bite of a grapefruit? It makes one cringe.

Some personalities are like this. When encountered, they make one cringe. Not only do grapefruit personalities cause others to cringe, they sometimes cringe themselves at the word of God when they learn something in their Bibles that conflicts with their behavior. Therefore, one must be very cautious around a grapefruit disciple, because if something is said or read that sets him off, then he brings tension into the discussion.

1. Cringed by harsh words: Grapefruit people react with caustic statements, wherein the audience becomes shocked, stunned and quiet. The sad thing about the grapefruit disciple is that one day he eventually wakes up and finds himself alone. People are too frightened about even calling him on the telephone. His personality does not encourage people to gather around him for encouragement. By his speech he repels people. We might say that he is opposite to the personality of Barnabas who was the “son of encouragement” (At 4:36).

2. Cringed by the word: Jeremiah once wrote a message from God to King Jehoiakim. The message was written on a scroll and read before the king. But when Jehoiakim heard the message, he reacted:

So it came to pass when Jehudi had read three or four columns, he [the king] cut it with a penknife and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the scroll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth” (Jr 36:23).

Sometimes, grapefruit disciples are cringed by the word of God, and thus, react to the word in a similar manner as Jehoiakim. The Holy Spirit would say to those who negatively react to God’s word, “Do not quench the Spirit” (1 Th 5:19). “Do not despise prophecies” (1 Th 5:20).

If they continue on their course of life, grapefruit disciples eventually lose their identity as disciples of Divinity. They do so because they reject that which identifies one as a disciple. If the word of God is rejected, then that which is God’s instructional manual for discipleship can no longer be the guide of the one who poses as a follower of God. The disciple who despises the word of God, either through lack of study, or just plain rejection of the word, becomes a religionist. He becomes a wolf among the disciples because he does not know the word of God. It would be this person about whom Jesus was possibly thinking when He made the statement: “... because you are lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew you out of My mouth” (Rv 3:16).

E. Onion disciples:

The response of others when they come into contact with the personality of this disciple is obvious. The onion disciple makes you want to cry. This is the pessimist with pains, and to be sure, he will explain every pain in his life, whether in body or in his relationships with others. This disciple is as someone said of him: “The guy who feels bad when he feels good because he is afraid he will feel worse when he gets to feeling better.”

The onion disciple thinks that every day is “National Frown Day,” and thus he brings a dark cloud of sadness to those he encounters throughout the day. He is like the boy who was given grapes, but complained when he found that they had seeds.

In a hospital there were two patients lying in recovery from their illnesses. When one of the patients was asked how he was feeling, he responded, “I am better today.” When the other patient was asked how he felt, he responded, “I was worse yesterday.” Our personality is portrayed to others in how we respond to the circumstances in which we find ourselves. Our personality can be identified by how we would respond to rain. One person might respond, “This rain will make mud.” The other would say, “This rain will cause the crops to grow.” Our personality is sometimes revealed by what two men said when looking at a bush. One said, “This bush has thorns.” The other said, “This bush has a rose.” Our personality will determine the quality of our relationships with others.

Paul would say to the onion disciple, “Rejoice in the Lord always. And again I say, rejoice!” (Ph 4:4). We must not allow ourselves to respond in a negative manner to the environment in which we live. One person may be stung by a bee, but still call it a honey bee. But the onion disciple would call the bee a stinging bee. A disciple who is rejoicing always in the Lord will always say, “I am glad that I get to live for Jesus.” But the onion disciple is pessimistic. He would say, “I’m sorry that I must die.” Pessimism may creep out of us when we react to our environment. We might say, “I am glad that my social environment is not worse.” But then we might say, “I’m sorry that it is no better.”

The personality of the onion disciple is that his discipleship is mixed with too much negativism, whereas the life of the rejoicing disciple is mixed with just a little sadness that comes his way. Nevertheless, he continues to rejoice in the Lord. He has the personality about which James wrote, “My brethren, count it all joy when you fall into various trials, knowing that the trying of your faith produces patience” (Js 1:2,3).

F. Carrot disciples:

Carrots are hard and brittle. Because of their nature, they have little taste. Carrots are usually eaten only when mixed with some other food, or when cooked.

There are disciples like uncooked carrots. One might say that they have a stilted personality that is hard and crunchy. They may be suffering from a hardened heart because of past experiences. They are as Pharaoh who hardened his heart against the work of God (See Ex 7:22). Nebuchadnezzar also hardened his heart (Dn 5:20). Those disciples to whom the Hebrew writer was directing his admonition were in danger of hardening their hearts as the rebellious Israelites who came out of Egyptian captivity. The writer admonished, “Do not harden your hearts as in the rebellion” (Hb 3:8). On the contrary, the Hebrew writer exhorted, “Today if you will hear His voice, do not harden your hearts as in the rebellion” (Hb 3:15).

The carrot disciple must allow himself to be cooked in the aroma of Jesus in order to loosen up. Once loosened up, he is palatable. When one finds himself becoming hardened by the circumstances around him, then he needs to be cooked by Christ. He needs to give himself over to God, and allow God to mold him after His holiness (See 1 Pt 5:5,6).

G. Wild olive disciples:

The first time we tasted an olive directly picked from the tree was the last time we ate an olive directly from the tree. It was so bitter that we could not get its remnants out of our mouth fast enough. It is the oleuropein in the olive that is tremendously bitter. Therefore, the olive must be “cured.” It must be soaked in brine, salt or lye, with the added flavoring of wine vinegar, before it is transformed into a delightful food to be eaten. Once processed, olives are just great in a host of foods.

There are some bitter olives in the world. They are as rotten apples, bitter in personality, and just grouchy. They often carry a “chip on their shoulders.” But something great will happen in their lives when they become disciples of Jesus. They can be transformed from a sour and bitter olive into that which is palatable. When one encounters and obeys the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, he is changed into something that is delightful. Paul wrote of some of these former bitter olives. After explaining their former toxic character, he reminded them, “Now such were some of you. But you were washed. But you were sanctified. But you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus and in the Spirit of our God” (1 Co 6:11). These former bitter olives, who “once behaved in times past in the lusts of our flesh,” had allowed themselves to be morphed (transformed) by the renewing of their minds (Rm 12:2). Those who have transformed their thinking are no longer wild olive disciples. They focus their minds on those things that are above, and thus they become the living sacrifices that offer up a sweet fragrance of worship to God.

H. Banana disciples:

One word could be used to describe a banana ... pleasing. It is not hard like a carrot. It is not hot like a radish. It is not bitter like an uncured olive. A banana is simply delightful to eat.

People like to hang around a banana disciple. They are not afraid of something being said that will offend. They are not afraid of offensive words that either embarrass or hurt. This is the disciple who always speaks with grace (Cl 4:6). The reason for this mellow and appealing personality is that the banana disciple has given heed to Paul’s words in Colossians 3:12,13:

Therefore, put on as the elect of God, holy and beloved, a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another and forgiving one another. If anyone has a complaint against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also should you.

We all come to Christ as wild olives. We are often bitter, being embittered by the world. But the beautiful aroma that comes from the Son of God will mellow us in Christ. We will be transformed into the living image of Jesus. Our personality changes because our character is changed as the word of Christ richly dwells in us (Cl 3:16).

I. Mango disciples:

Many people in cold climates have not had the privilege of tasting a mango. They have missed out on a little bit of heaven on earth. All we have to say about mango discipleship is that this is what we would be. If you have eaten a mango, you will understand that our characters should be as mangos. Yummy!

Sometimes we use a particular fruit or vegetable in one phrase to explain the character or personality of different people. Ever hear this: “He’s a rotten apple”? Or maybe on the positive side, “She’s a peach.” And then there are those who are simply “sour grapes.” Or simply, “He’s fruity,” or just “full of beans,” or “nuts.”

The objective of every disciple of Divinity is to allow his or her personality and character to be transformed into the aroma of Christ. This is a lifetime project. It is spiritual growth that takes place over years of constant struggle. We thus study continually the behavior of Jesus in order to be as He is. By being as Him, we draw others closer to Him. This is what Paul meant when he wrote, “Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Ph 1:27). And when our behavior is worthy of the gospel, it is then that the words of Paul are understood in 1 Corinthians 11:1: “Be imitators of me even as I also am of Christ.” As the apostle Paul lived the gospel, so we must also live according to his example. The Holy Spirit gave him the right to make this statement because of his walk in gratitude for the gospel of Jesus.

The preceding is the same exhortation that Peter gave to elders. They were to present their lives as an example of how we should live the gospel (1 Pt 5:3). In contrast to leadership by lording over the flock, the leaders of the flock must give the sheep an example of how to live the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. This is allowing the mind of Christ to be in us as disciples of Christ (Ph 2:5-8).

MILITANT DISCIPLESHIP

When James said, “Show me your faith without your works, and I will show you my faith by my works,” he essentially said, “I won’t believe what you believe until I see how committed you are in putting your faith into action” (Js 2:18). “Walk the talk” is more than a cliché when applied to Christianity. In reference to the disciples of Jesus, the commonly used phrase is crucial to identify those who are truly disciples of Divinity.

In today’s political use of the word “militant,” people usually cringe with visions of terrorism, guns and bombs. But preachers have been using this term for centuries in reference to the diligent actions of the disciples of Christ. And before the preachers, there was the Holy Spirit. We do not, therefore, shy away from using the term, especially since the militancy of the disciple of Divinity is almost the entire opposite of the actions of carnal terrorists who kill innocent people.

Both the carnal terrorist and the disciple of Jesus are moved by intense beliefs. However, the outcome of each is entirely different. One reaches for a gun or bomb, but the other reaches for the word of God in order to better his own life and the lives of others. One strikes fear in the hearts of citizens, but the other generates love. One repels and the other attracts.

The New Testament is loaded with military terms that are used as metaphors to explain the militant zeal of the Christian. The disciple of Jesus understands that the metaphors are simply figures of speech that are used by the Holy Spirit to ignite our faith into action. The metaphors were never given as a motive to implement a carnal military crusade as was typical of the Roman Catholic Church during the Middle Ages. In fact, the metaphorical meaning of the military terms are opposite to someone generating any carnal warfare based on one nation or faith militarily conquering another. On the contrary, the implementation of the mighty force of Christians makes the world a place of peace, not fear.

The dictionary definition of “militant” would be one who seeks to fight for his faith by engaging in war against the enemy. As a soldier of his commander, the militant maintains a combative character in order to engage the enemy. He is ready and willing to fight for his faith. In reference to the disciple of Divinity, the militant soldier of the cross seeks to engage the enemy of all unrighteousness. And thus, his life as a disciple is constantly in conflict with the powers of evil. Paul explained:

For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war according to the flesh. For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but powerful through God for the pulling down of strongholds, casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ (2 Co 10:3-5).

Christians “put on the whole armor of God so that” they may be able “to stand against the schemes of the devil” (Ep 6:11). They are willing “to fight the good fight of the faith” (1 Tm 6:12). And thus, they are willing to “endure hardship as a good soldier of Christ Jesus” (2 Tm 2:3), so at the end of their lives they can say as Paul, “I have fought the good fight” (2 Tm 4:7).

The nature of the disciple’s life, therefore, is conducted under the shadow of what Jesus said in Matthew 10:34: “Do not think that I came to bring peace on the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword.” Jesus used the word “sword” as a metaphor to indicate that those who would become His disciples would suffer persecution because they, with the “sword” of the word of God, would engage the world of unrighteousness. When the early evangelists went throughout the world preaching the gospel, they taught the new converts “that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God” (At 14:22). When the sword of the Spirit is swung across the world of evil, tribulation will ensue.

The result of the militancy of the early church was amazing. For two thousand years, preachers and Bible teachers have used the example of the New Testament disciples to illustrate what it means to be a totally committed living sacrifice. While living under harsh oppression, the gospel went forth throughout the Roman Empire. By A.D. 61,62 Paul could write from a Roman prison that the gospel message “was preached to every creature that is under heaven” (Cl 1:23). The early disciples “turned the world upside down” for Jesus (At 17:6). We today often wonder how they did this, when at first they suffered from the oppression of the Jewish religious establishment, and then by the state opposition of the Roman Empire for over two hundred years. We offer the following reasons for their success:

A. They exalted the one God.

Christianity was born into a world of idolatry. This idolatry was the religion of most people of the world at the time when the early Christians proclaimed that there was only one true and living God. In fact, it could be stated that only the Jews maintained a belief in only one God. The rest of the world was idolatrous.

At one time on one of his mission journeys, Paul went right into one of the seats of idolatry. He went to Athens, Greece. He encountered there the most rigid idolaters of the day, that is, philosophical idolaters. Nevertheless, these idolaters reasoned that for there to be a true God, then this God must be beyond the comprehension of man. The Greek citizenship believed in many gods, but the Greek philosophers reasoned that there must be out there only one “high” God.

When Paul passed through the streets of Athens, he noticed many idols that had been made to honor the different gods of the Greek’s imagination. But when he stood before the Greek philosophers on Mars Hill, he said, “... as I passed by and observed your objects of worship, I found an altar with this inscription, ‘TO THE UNKNOWN GOD’” (At 17:23). These Greek philosophers were wise enough to know that if they could figure out the behavior of the gods that men conceived in their own minds, then they certainly could not conceive the “god of gods” through the reasoning of men. Therefore, Paul said to them, “The One whom you worship in ignorance, Him I declare to you” (At 17:23). This statement sparked their interest.

If a disciple of Divinity would be militant for Christ, then there must be no doubt in his mind concerning the existence of the one true and living God (Ep 4:6). This God must be defined by the revelation of His description (the Bible). Any other source of definition will not do. In order to endure the tribulation that comes with bearing the sword of Christ, one must be totally committed to the one God of heaven. One’s faith in God must be the foundation upon which he or she will stand in the heat of any persecution.

B. They believed that Jesus was the only Savior.

The early disciples believed that there was eternal salvation only in Jesus Christ. This was an absolute in their thinking. Peter expressed this belief in the following proclamation before some unbelieving religious leaders: “And there is salvation in no other, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved” (At 4:12). In order to be militant for Christ, there can be no compromise in this belief. If Jesus is one of many options, then He is no option at all. The salvation of all men since the cross will be determined by people’s response to the word of Christ (Jn 12:48), for through His word will all men be judged (At 17:30,31).

We live in a world of “acceptable multiple religiosity.” It is the belief of the political liberal to accept all faiths as valid, Christian or non-Christian. This movement is especially true in reference to modern-day democracies around the world. In a democracy, every faith must be respected and accepted, but when approaching God, only the faith that is defined by His word is acceptable to Him. God is no respecter of persons. “But in every nation he who fears Him and works righteousness is accepted by Him” (At 10:35). It is the responsibility of every man on earth to find this God whom all men must fear and obey.

God accepts all those who manifest their fear of Him through their work of His righteousness. This means that no man has a right to invent his own righteousness by which he would seek to be acceptable to God. Christians are militant to teach the righteousness of God, for they know that “God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth” (Jn 4:24).

C. They took ownership of their Christ-ordained jobs.

The early disciples received their job description from what Jesus said in Mark 16:15: “Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature.” This is exactly what they did. “Therefore, those who were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word” (At 8:4).

In order to accomplish their job description, Paul outlined in 1 Corinthians 3:6 what the early disciples did: “I [Paul] have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase.”

1. The disciples’ job was to plant. Paul first planted the seed of the kingdom in Corinth (At 18:5,11). His first message wherever he went was to preach the gospel, which thing he did in Corinth and Achaia (1 Co 15:3,4). The result of his preaching the gospel was that men and women were “brought you forth through the gospel” (1 Co 4:15).

After the example of the early disciples, it is our job to preach the gospel to the world. It is about this job that the early Christians were concerned, because they knew that no one could be saved without obedience to the gospel of Jesus. Only He was the way, truth and life (Jn 14:6). They knew that Jesus would eventually come “in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those who do not know God and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Th 1:8). And if the righteous are scarcely saved through their obedience to the gospel, then there was no hope for those who did not obey the gospel (See 1 Pt 4:18). They believed, therefore, as Paul: “For woe is me if I do not preach the gospel” (1 Co 9:16).

Since the early Christians knew that there was salvation by no other means other than through Christ, then their commitment to accomplish their job as disciples was expressed in the words of Paul: “So as much as in me is, I am ready to preach the gospel to you also who are at Rome” (Rm 1:15).

2. The disciples’ job was to water: Apollos encouraged the saints whom Paul had fathered through the preaching of the gospel (At 18:27,28). It was his job as a disciple to build up the body of Christ through teaching (See At 20:28). What was on the mind of every teacher and shepherd of the first century was the thinking of the shepherd who stood up and said before the assembly, “We ain’t what we ought to be, and we ain’t what we’re gonna be, but thank God we ain’t what we used to be.” In realizing this, Barnabas was the “son of encouragement” in action. He, as well as many others, assumed their job of edifying the body of Christ because they were thankful that they were not what they used to be because of the grace of God.

The ministries of the word of God that Paul mentioned in Ephesians 4:11,12 were for the purpose of edifying the body of Christ. As newborn babes in Christ (1 Pt 2:2), the early teachers of the body built up the body by teaching the word of God (At 20:32). The early church grew across the Roman Empire because the early disciples assumed their job to build up the body with the word.

3. They trusted that God would do His job by giving the increase: Paul reminded the Corinthians in 1 Corinthians 3:6 that it was God, not them, who gave the increase. He said this in the context of some who were trying to take credit for the increase of the church throughout Achaia. These presumptuous leaders, who sought to take glory for Paul’s work, needed to be reminded that it was Paul who planted the seed which came forth in their hearts (See 2 Co 10:11-16). It was Apollos who watered the seed. But it was God’s job to give the increase.

Christians must worry about their jobs, not God’s. Unfortunately, too many Christians do not do their jobs (planting and watering), because they are worried about God doing His job. Therefore, they conclude that they should not do their job because they figure that God will not give an increase to their labors. As disciples of Divinity, we must never forget that we are only the vessels through whom God works to accomplish His job. If there is no planting and watering by the vessels, then God cannot do His job of giving the increase.

Christians should desire to do as Jerry McCaghren once wrote in reference to his ministry in the slums of the inter city:

Some people want to live, within the sound of church and chapel bell;
I want to run a rescue shop,
Within a yard of hell.

If no one in our area is obeying the gospel, then there is only one reason why they are not. The Christians in the area are not doing their jobs of teaching the gospel and edifying the newborn babes in Christ. We need to have less worry about God doing His job, and more about us not doing ours.

D. They believed that the message of the gospel was not just another religious philosophy of men.

In the 1930s, H. W. Tilman rode a bicycle alone across the middle of Africa from Mombasa, Kenya to the west coast. He encountered several people along the way and had many fantastic experiences with people in the 42-day trek. In 1938, and after he climbed Mount Kenya, he published a book on the adventure that was entitled, Snow On The Equator, which book we have in our library and have read twice.

When riding through the French regions of the Congo, Tilman spent one night with a radically committed missionary couple, a Norwegian with a Swiss wife. Tilman related that the couple received him with great hospitality for the one evening he spent with them. He also wrote that at the time of his visit the wife was holding their very frail-looking child. When he asked about the child, the couple told him that they had buried four of their other children “out back.”

As part of the Basel Missions of Africa, this couple was totally dedicated to the message that they were bringing to Africa. They knew their message would change Africa. And it did. Africa is a better place today because thousands of dedicated missionaries as this buried their children and loved ones “out back.” Their commitment to get the job done changed the entire continent of Africa. Some might question such commitment today. But the missionary Paul would answer, “What do you mean by weeping and breaking my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem [and in Africa] for the name of the Lord Jesus” (At 21:13).

Paul once walked into Athens with the message of the gospel on his heart. At least this is what the Athenian philosophers perceived, for they said to him, “May we know what this new teaching is about which you speak? For you bring certain strange things to our ears. Therefore, we want to know what these things mean” (At 17:19,20). The Athenians “spent their time in nothing else than to tell or to hear some new thing” (At 17:21). And what Paul was speaking was something they had never before heard. It was new, and to them, it was strange.

If the center of philosophy of the world at the time was Athens, then the world had never before heard something as the message of the gospel. The early disciples believed that the gospel was the sole medium unto salvation (Rm 1:16). And because it was something that they had received directly from God through Jesus, they would never compare it with any philosophy of this world. There were no philosophies or religious systems of either thought or works that could be substituted for the gospel. Because the early disciples were totally convinced that the gospel was God’s power unto salvation, they were totally convicted to preach it to every creature on earth. And for this reason, they had a great number of conversions because of the greatness of their conviction in the saving message of the gospel. They too were willing to bury their children “out back” in foreign soil.

E. They preached the gospel everywhere.

Acts 5:42 explains the daily schedule of the early disciples in fulfilling the requirements of their job description: “And daily in the temple and in every house, they did not cease teaching and preaching Jesus as the Christ.” Acts 8:4 explains the territory into which they journeyed in order to preach that Jesus was the Christ: “Those who were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word.” And Acts 8:12 explains the results of their preaching: “When they believed Philip preaching the things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ, they were baptized, both men and women.”

We would certainly conclude from their evangelistic life-style that the first Christians were excited about preaching Jesus as the Christ because they were excited about the fruit that God produced from their preaching. God could do His job because they did theirs. And because they migrated across the first century world, God was able to increase the body of Christ throughout the world.

F. They were loyal to one another as the body of Christ.

One of the most important relational concepts concerning the dynamic of the early church was that everyone was on the same page in their objective to be the one organic body of Christ. “Now all who believed were together and had all things in common” (At 2:44).

Peter once addressed a letter to Christians throughout five different provinces of Asia Minor (1 Pt 1:1). In reference to all the Christians in these provinces, he exhorted them to “love the brotherhood” (1 Pt 2:17). The early Christians were loyal to one another in a hostile world that was contrary to what they believed. They encouraged one another by being committed to one another as the one church.

All disciples of Divinity compose the worldwide body of Christ, over which Jesus is the only head and center of reference (Ep 1:22,23). Every Christian has been baptized into this one universal body (1 Co 12:13). Since each member was baptized into the one body, and the body is composed of many members, then each member was baptized into a relationship that demands they all work together as one organic body (See Ep 4:11-16).

The church is the called-out assembly of all those throughout the world who have committed their lives to Christ. In committing their lives to Christ, they have committed themselves to one another. As His body, Jesus has purchased them with His own blood (At 20:28). And thus, He is the Savior of all those who have been baptized into the one body of members (Ep 5:23). Knowing this truth spurred the early members on to bring as many people as possible into this worldwide community.

The early members of the body knew that there was no salvation outside the body, and thus, they were eager to give everyone an opportunity to be a member of the body that Jesus will save when He comes again. They believed that every soul was a mission field, and this made every member of the body a missionary. For this reason, they were willing to bear their crosses for Christ (Lk 9:23,24). They were willing to die for the One who died for them, and if necessary, to bury their children “out back.”

It is the nature of the good news (gospel) to be announced to the world. Therefore, inherent in the gospel is the drive to preach it to everyone. The early disciples understood this. The problem with religion is that deep inside we know that we have laden ourselves with religious rites and rituals that identify our particular religion. It is difficult, therefore, to become inspired about sharing our religion with others. But the gospel is not religion, and thus we willingly share it with others. We are excited about sowing the seed of gospel because we are excited about the gospel.

MULTIPLE DISCIPLESHIP

An English writer was once writhing in a dream. His distortions and slurred speech were so that his wife became quite concerned, so she awoke him. Once the man had come to his senses out of a deep dark dream, he complained to his wife as to why she had awakened him. He told her that he was having a scary dream that would be a great plot for a book. And so it was. From that small spark of an idea in a dream, Robert Louis Stevenson began to write. In 1886, he eventually published the novel, The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Dr. Jekyll was a person of refined qualities who sought to do that which was good. However, when his environment changed into darkness, he became the evil Mr. Hyde. Stevenson's concept in print has become a part of worldwide literary culture, for we all often confess up that there is a little Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde in us.

If we were to ask different people who we were, we would receive different answers. Depending on the occasion, circumstances, and our company, we are different people. It is the task of the disciple of Divinity to be the same person at all times, and in all circumstances. But this is sometimes quite difficult. The following people would judge us differently according to the situation in which we find ourselves:

A. The Stranger:

When we meet a stranger, we are often different in our first contact than after we get to know that person. Therefore, we should ask the stranger, who might become our friend, what his first impression of us was. Were we focused on him? Were we avoiding direct conversation? Were we shy and introverted? We must keep in mind that a stranger often knows us differently than who we really are.

If we were the stranger being introduced to another person, how would we be judged by the person we met for the first time? One principle is always true in reference to meeting a stranger: First impressions are almost always inaccurate. They are inaccurate because we naturally seek to make a good first impression. But in doing so, we often put on a show. And it is hard to keep up the show. It is a good principle never to judge a person by first impressions.

Since our first contact with someone can be flawed, there is a particular principle to remember. One should not assume that he must trust every word of a stranger. Paul had this in mind when he wrote to Timothy, "Lay hands hastily on no man" (1 Tm 5:22). A stranger will judge us according to first impressions, but we should not be so presumptuous to expect him to place his trust in us as we would a lifetime friend. After all, Jesus warned, "Beware of false prophets who come to you in sheep's clothing" (Mt 7:15). It is not that we question every stranger who comes our way. It is simply wise to first "get to know" someone before entrusting ourselves to them.

There were once two of us in a vehicle driving across Africa. One of the common officiating practices of African countries is to have police road blocks at different locations along the roads. So here we were, two preachers, approaching a police road block. We pulled up to the policeman who would check our papers, rolled down the window, but continued our conversation with one another. The first thing the policeman said was, "Are you two preachers?" Maybe we looked like preachers. Maybe we had a preacher look on our faces. Maybe we talked like preachers. Whatever the case, our first impression by the stranger was that we were preachers. We have tried to look and talk like preachers ever since.

B. The Enemy:

Because of our reaction to our enemies, usually no person is what his enemies think he is. Nevertheless, our enemies judge us to be a particular person. They do so because we have the tendency to react to our enemies, and thus, we are usually not our real selves. Our response to those we think are our enemies is often a distortion of our real personality. Our negative response to the attacks of our enemies sometimes stirs up hatred or prejudice, so much so, that our virtues are hidden behind our reactions.

The evidence of our wrong reactions to our enemy is that we usually feel a sense of guilt after we have encountered our enemy in a manner that is not characteristic of our true self. This was certainly behind the reason why Jesus made the following instructions in Luke 6:27: "But I say to you who hear, love your enemies. Do good to those who hate you."

Loving one's enemy is an opportunity to be consistent in our response to others. A loving reaction may change the attitude that our enemy has toward us.

Though our enemy perceives that we are a certain person, a loving response will usually confuse our enemy, or at least make him question his impressions of who we really are. At least, a loving response will encourage our enemy to reconsider his relationship with us. The best way to destroy one's enemies is to make them our friends.

C. The Neighbor:

In the Western world our neighbors are often close, but distant. We can live in a house across the street from our neighbor, but the closest we are to our neighbor is a friendly "hello" from a distance, with the wave of a hand. Our neighbor recognizes us as friendly, but not as a close friend. There is the occasional conversation, but no secrets are revealed or commitments made. There is a common courtesy between neighbors that one neighbor will not dump his or her garbage on the other's garden. And when we are in trouble, our neighbor often comes to our aid. Our neighbor is there when we need him. But this is an estranged relationship that we have with our Western neighbor. It is a relationship that does not allow him into the deep recesses of our true self.

D. The Friend:

We confide in our true friends. We trust them. We spend time with them. The result is that our friends usually perceive who we are on a day-to-day basis. Santayana was right when he said, "One's friends are that part of the human race with which one can be human."

Masks fall off in the face of true friends. If not, then the friends will see hypocrisy, and in a kind manner, will ask us to be "real." When the mask is off, then we can perceive that one is a true friend. When we make our inevitable mistakes, it is then that we will know who our true friends are, for they will still be there for us. True friends always hang around even when all masks are off. And then it might be as someone said of a true friend who really knows us, "When a friend won't loan you $50, then he's probably a close friend." True friends know who we are. They will stay with one even when all our warts are revealed. We will give to the true friend, but it will usually not be a loan. The gift is simply given without conditions.

It is the function of fellowship among members of the body to move past masks and pretenses. If the function of the body of members does not allow members to know one another as true friends, then there is a dysfunctional relationship among the members. "Church" must function in a way that others can know us as true friends, not just "Sunday morning acquaintances." True discipleship will move us beyond "foyer friendships" to become friends for life. Solomon would conclude, "A man who has friends must show himself friendly" (Pv 18:24).

Being friendly comes with a great amount of responsibility in reference to loving one's neighbor as himself. It takes a great deal of work to create a true friend, and it takes even more work to maintain a true friend. So it is sometimes as E. D. McKenzie said, "Some people make enemies instead of friends because it is less trouble."

Jesus' instructions to start a friendship were expressed in the following words: "For I was hungry and you gave Me food. I was thirsty and you gave Me drink. I was a stranger and you took Me in" (Mt 25:35). Every person seeks to have those friends who stay with one when the world falls apart. These are people who increase our joy, but also share our grief. These are the friends who know us. Remember the old Russian proverb: "An old friend is better than two new ones."

E. The Wife/Husband:

Make no mistake on this point, our spouses know who we really are ... usually. Husbands and wives have their individual secrets, especially of those things in their past before they met. However, strangers do not know the person to whom we are married. And certainly, the person our spouses know is different from the perception of our enemies. True friends are close, but our spouses know us when all the shields are down when we are at home alone with them.

One of the assets of a good spouse was mentioned by Peter: "And above all things have fervent love among yourselves, for love will cover a multitude of sins" (1 Pt 4:8). This statement was made in reference to the relational function of members of the body with one another. It is a statement of wisdom that is also true in good marriage relationships. Our spouse knows that we have a "multitude of sins." And yet, our spouses still love us. Relational love keeps spouses together for life. Through all our faults and arguments, a loving spouse will hang in there. Our spouses will stay with us regardless of all they know about us. It is what fervent love does.

F. You:

This may be the person who has the most difficulty in knowing who we really are. This is true because James said that we can “deceive yourselves” (Js 1:22). Jesus had this in mind when He said, “First remove the beam from your own eye, and then you will see clearly to remove the speck from your brother’s eye” (Mt 7:5). Because of many unfortunate motives, we have great difficulty in extracting that beam. And because we are blinded by that monstrous beam, we reveal to others someone we are not. And truly, Solomon pronounced the correct judgment upon every “beamer”: “Every way of a man is right in his own eyes” (Pv 21:2). One feels he is right in his own eyes because he cannot see past the beam.

If we are true to ourselves, then we will confess our weaknesses. Discipleship is about reexamining oneself. Self-examination begins first by each one of us not thinking “of himself more highly than he ought to think” (Rm 12:3). If one thinks of himself too highly, then he will be guilty of doing what Paul wrote to the Galatian disciples: “For if anyone thinks himself to be something when he is nothing, he deceives himself” (Gl 6:3).

If we think too much of ourselves, then we have the tendency to magnify our own virtues while we minimize the virtues of our brother or sister in Christ. We must guard against “empty conceit,” Paul wrote, “but in humility of mind let each esteem others better than themselves” (Ph 2:3). These are often difficult words for the conceited person to follow. But Paul goes beyond these words: “Let each one not look out merely for his own interests, but also for the interests of others” (Ph 2:4).

As a disciple of Divinity, we seek to see ourselves for who we really are. “To our own selves we seek to be true.” We must not be as those who compare themselves with themselves (See 2 Co 10:12). If we compare ourselves with others, then we run the risk that others may be off their spiritual track, and thus, we would lead ourselves astray by trying to stay on their wayward track.

Over half the New Testament is written of Jesus, His teachings and behavior. The Holy Spirit was trying to send a message. Our standard for discipleship must be Jesus. We are to examine ourselves (2 Co 13:5), but our examination must be made according to the measure and stature of Jesus. In doing this, we can discover who we really are, and then, make life corrections according to the standards of Jesus. We must always seek to live up to the description of who we claim to be, that is, “disciples.”

G. God:

God knows us better than we know ourselves. This is true because of what the Holy Spirit stated in Proverbs 21:2: “Every way of a man is right in his own eyes, but the Lord weighs the hearts.” The Spirit continued, “And there is no creature that is hidden from His sight. But all things are naked and opened to the eyes of Him to whom we have to give account” (Hb 4:13; see Ps 90:8).

Others may not know the deep demons within us. And we may deceive ourselves into justifying inner unrighteousness with which we struggle to overcome. We may admit to ourselves that we are overcome by those emotions that are not in tune with a Christlike spirit. But we must take comfort in the fact that God knows all these flaws. Regardless of all our emotional inadequacies, we can be assured of one very beautiful reality concerning our walk as a disciple of Divinity. The Holy Spirit wants us to remember our very precious covenant that God has made with us. Paul worded it in the following manner: “But God demonstrates His love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rm 5:8).

If God so loved us while we were unrighteous in sin (Jn 3:16), and before we signed up as His disciples, then how much more does He love us as His children, regardless of our frail humanity? This truth brought amazement in the mind of Paul as he inscribed the following words from our Father:

If God is for us, who can be against us? He who spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how will He not with Him also freely give us all things? Who will lay anything to the charge of God’s elect? It is God who justifies. Who is he who condemns? It is Christ who died, yes, rather who was raised again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also makes intercession for us (Rm 8:31-34).

Since the Son of God died for us while we were still in sin, He will not let us go as we walk in His cleansing blood (1 Jn 1:7). Even though God knows us better than we know ourselves, He will allow nothing of this world to separate us from Him (Rm 8:35). We may separate ourselves from Him, but He will not go away. The Lord Jesus loves us regardless of our dysfunctions as His disciples. People around us may at times have difficulty knowing who we are. But God knows who we really are, and thus He continues to love us. We may fall out of love with Him, but He will never stop loving us. He is not willing that any of His created creatures should perish (2 Pt 3:9). And for this reason He is continually working in our lives to keep us close to Him. We must simply wake up and see His wondrous work to bring all things together for our good.

ENVISION THE SUMMIT

*“And seeing the multitudes,
He went up on a mountain.
And when He sat down,
His disciples came to Him.”*
(Matthew 5:1)

“And after six days Jesus took Peter, James and John his brother, and led them up on a high mountain by themselves.”

In 1942 Felice Benuzzi was gazing intently at Mount Kenya through the barbed-wire fence of a prisoner-of-war camp in Nanyuki, Kenya. He was in the World War II prison camp because of the Allied Forces' conquest of Abyssinia (Ethiopia) in 1941. After the conquest, the Italian population of Abyssinia was rounded up and taken to British prison-of-war camps in Kenya.

But there was Benuzzi, gazing at the majestic summit of Mount Kenya. He reminisced of his early years as a young boy who was the child of an Italian man married to an Austrian woman, both being very accomplished mountaineers. He too became the same as a young man, and thus his hypnotic gaze at Mount Kenya stirred within him childhood memories, and thus he longed to stand on the mountain summit.

Over a period of weeks his infatuation with the mountain became too much. So in the middle of 1942, he made a determined decision to escape and climb. But in order to do this, he first had to escape from a prison camp. He knew that a great deal of preparation was needed, and so for six months Benuzzi prepared to satisfy his urges to escape bondage and find freedom on Mount Kenya.

In the prison at the time, cigarettes were the units of “monetary exchange.” So he stopped smoking in order to use the camp issued cigarettes to buy supplies and make equipment for the venture. Unbeknownst to the prison guards, Benuzzi orchestrated fellow prisoners into helping him make the necessary ice-axes, crampons, save food, make rucksacks, and collect together all other needed supplies for a team of three prisoners to make a fourteen day excursion up Mount Kenya. During his months of preparation, he also recruited two other daring prisoners to make the adventurous risk with him.

Benuzzi and his team left a note for the commander of the prison camp that read, “We’ll be back in 14 days.” He did not disclose where he and his team were headed. The team of three left their identity cards with the note so that the commander would not have to fret about who escaped, but also to relieve the other prisoners from having to “spill the beans” on their three fellow inmates at roll call.

For the first six to seven days, the team could climb only at night, lest they be spotted by someone in the area, or through binoculars by guards at the camp. With their heavily laden rucksacks of food for two weeks, they laboriously trudged through knee-deep marshes, squeezed through bamboo forests that were almost impassible, waded up streams and conquered glaciers. It was an extremely tortuous climb.

They knew of only two or three people who had climbed the mountain before. Their only “map” to scale the mountain was an artist’s drawing on a Kenylon brand meat and vegetable can, and what Benuzzi had mapped out in his mind in his observance of the mountain through binoculars. It was thus a formidable trek of nightly struggle, coupled with unbelievable tenacity, just to get to the treeline. Nevertheless, the team was determined to realize their dream of conquering the summit of Batian, the highest peak of the 17,040 foot mountain.

After establishing their base camp, Benuzzi, with fellow team mate, Giovanni Balletto, would make their assault on the summit. The third member of the team, Enzo Barsotti, remained in the comfort of the base camp. On their attempt to reach the summit of Batian, the two exhausted men eventually called it quits. A relentless snowstorm had broken out on the mountain and subsequently drove them back to base camp. When they finally returned to base camp, they fell to the ground exhausted after an 18-hour day of climbing. Though food supplies were severely low, they determined to try for the sister peak of Lenana the following day, which was unfortunately not the highest peak of the mountain. But the two men had starved themselves for lack of sufficient food, and thus felt they had no strength to make another assault on Batian.

After a day to recuperate from the previous struggle for Batian peak, it was on the ninth day after they had escaped the prison camp, on February 6th at 1:30<sup>AM</sup>, that Benuzzi and Balletto began another assault, but this time for the summit of Lenana. After hours of laborious climbing, they reached the summit of Lenana at 10:30<sup>AM</sup>. The months of preparation, and the days of struggle had paid off as the two men stood victorious on Mount Kenya. They planted the flag of Italy to memorialize their feat. (No Picnic On Mount Kenya, 1952, Felice Benuzzi.)

No summits can be reached in our quest to be the best disciples of Divinity that we can be without great struggle and a concentrated effort to mold our lives after our Lord Jesus Christ. This was the message that older disciples gave to new disciples in the first century: “We must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God” (At 14:22). “Yes, and all who desire to live godly in Christ Jesus will suffer persecution” (2 Tm 3:12).

In order to stand on spiritual summits, we must bear down and prepare. We must release ourselves from past obstacles that hinder spiritual growth in order to make our way up torturous slopes. Jesus ascended on high in only a few moments. It will take most of us a lifetime of struggle to get there. In our quest, we must remember that we must first escape the prison of our past in order to free ourselves for the future. It is so with our past life of religiosity that was often wrapped in the rags of superficial validations of what we considered discipleship. It was in this context of religiosity that Jesus came with a new vision for His disciples: “A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another .... By this will all men know that you are My disciples” (Jn 13:34,35).

Love was not new, but the extent to which the disciples would be called on to love one another would be new. They were to love one another “as I have loved you” (Jn 13:34). Every time a disciple looks at a cross, he must envision the extent of the new love that he or she must have for other disciples.

Because the commandment is new, Christian discipleship is a paradigm shift in love. It is not something magic that happens in one's life upon obedience to the gospel. It is something into which one grows. Remember what Jesus said to husbands? “Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for it” (Ep 5:25). This is the summit to which we must stringently aspire. An aged couple who have been married for decades may putter around the house mumbling to one another and manifesting no “jump-up-and-down” excitement about being together. They may not lavish one another with passion and carry on as a couple who have been married for only a week. But they are still there together after decades, after passion has turned to sacrificial love, and when frivolous youthful passions have faded into a distant memory. However, if a stranger would break into their house and threaten the wife, that love “just-as-Christ-also-loved-the-church” would instinctively break forth in the husband to protect his wife at even the cost of his own life.

This is a love that is beyond even a friend dying for a friend. It is beyond loving our neighbor as ourselves. It is a love that has, over the years, grown into a response that is as natural as scratching an itch. It is into this paradigm of love that disciples of Divinity seek to venture. It is a summit of love that blinds one to the multitude of faults in our brothers and sisters in Christ. It is a love with results that have matured over years of constant focus and struggle. It is this love that moves us out of the bondage of the past in order that we reach the peaks of being a true disciple of Divinity.

Unfortunately, the paradigm of the new love into which Jesus calls His disciples is hindered by some skeletons of past religiosity. Our “churchianity” of the past has often bound our efforts to love without shackles as we seek to walk with Jesus as His disciples. So the Hebrew writer exhorted some disciples who had been held up at base camp for too many years:

... let us lay aside every weight and the sin that so easily entangles us, and let us run with endurance the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith ... (Hb 12:1,2).

Discipleship involves identifying those weights and sins that have come over us and have entangled us in our struggle to scale away obstacles for spiritual growth. We have sought in this book to identify the “weights” and “sins” in order to successfully mature in our efforts to reach the summit of the new love. We must now identify some of the most difficult shackles of bondage that increasingly hold us back from reaching the spiritual peaks with Jesus. These are hindrances to spiritual growth into which we often grow. We find ourselves held up and frustrated at base camp and cannot seem to get beyond stagnation. We see the summit of where Jesus wants us to be. But to get there, we must recognize those areas of religiosity that often hold us back, and are often very deceptive. They are deceptive because we are tempted to excuse behavior that falls far short of the summit we seek to reach. We satisfy ourselves with residence at the base camp when we should be making an assault on the summit.

A. The bondage of base camp:

The base camp is established by mountaineers as the supply depot from which they make their final assault on the summit. The climbers will awake early in the dark hours and begin their final climb to the summit, and then they will return to base camp in the same day.

We have often cursed ourselves with a “base camp” of four walls and a roof in which we have boxed in our discipleship. It is comfortable at this “base camp.” It has pews or benches, and as long as we occupy space on one of these pews or benches once a week, we judge ourselves to be faithful disciples. Outside this “base camp” box, and after a “closing prayer,” we feel free to carry on with our former lives before we entered the “church house” box a little over an hour before. We have conveniently boxed Jesus in there with the “church house furniture,” and thus, we can leave Him there when the box is locked. And as long as Jesus stays in that box, we are free to behave as we please throughout the week.

Some may feel that we have focused in this book too much on our time in the box. We have for good reasons—and we are not concerned about being redundant. When “leaders” are sanctimonious during the “hour of worship,” but turn into ravenous caged wolves after the “closing prayer” when they meet during the “business meeting,” then we know that something is definitely wrong in our definition of discipleship. When prayers and hymns are characteristic of these “leaders” during the “worship hour,” but power and harm are vented during the “business meeting,” then we must challenge ourselves concerning what we understand discipleship to be.

What a “dichotomous disciple” does is validate his discipleship by what happens in the box. We may validate that we are disciples by what we might call “serial performances” (“the order of worship”). We legally establish for ourselves a series of “acts” that must be performed in order that we be classified as the “scripturally true church.” We would even argue over the “order of worship”—during the business meeting, of course—in order that everyone eventually feels comfortable that the rituals of the assembly have been faithfully performed. In this way we can claim that we are faithful disciples or righteous leaders. Once the performances of the assembly have been successfully conducted, and signed off with a “closing prayer,” then we can leave the box with the satisfaction that we are faithful disciples of Jesus. We can even enter the “business meeting” and argue at will.

There are others who have trashed any order of assembly by running through Jerusalem to emotional chaos. These are those who seek to generate in the box an emotional euphoria in order to validate their discipleship until another concert is conducted the following Sunday. The attendees of this boxed worship do not focus on a system of legal acts to validate their discipleship. They claim discipleship on the basis that they can unleash an emotional outpouring in a charged assembly of energetic performers who entertain the boxed audience. Unfortunately, while the youth may enjoy this system of validation for their discipleship, the older folks appear to have “lost the Spirit” in their quietness and inability to manifest any exuberant outward appearance of euphoria. They thus show up at the box that is designed for “senior worship.”

When one seeks to use any assembly of disciples as the validation for his discipleship, then he or she will have great difficulty in transitioning into the paradigm of the new love by which Jesus has loved us. When assemblies are focused on us, then they train us to be religious narcissists in the Sunday morning box. What should be worship of God turns into assemblies that are focused on what we want. This is true because our discipleship is being validated by the presence and performance of others, not by falling to our knees in worship of God. We must be careful about seeking outside influences in order to generate inward worship.

Some churches bring in and prop up a cross in their boxes in order to give a pretense of their “cross-bearing in the box.” But Jesus’ cross was not in a box. It was outside the city on a hill, a place where thieves were crucified. He drug His cross up the slope of Mount Calvary in order to be crucified outside. A boxed in validation of discipleship often loses its power when we walk outside the box doors in order to reach the summit. Disciples cannot lock the cross in a church house. They must drag it daily in their struggle to the summit. Jesus reminded His disciples, “And whoever does not bear his own cross and come after Me, cannot be My disciple” (Lk 14:27). On another occasion He said to His audience, “If anyone will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow Me” (Lk 9:23).

It would be axiomatic to say that the more we use our assemblies to validate our discipleship, the less our discipleship reflects that for which Jesus calls. If one feels a sense of release after the “amen” of a “closing prayer,” then he or she should know that something is wrong. When we feel a sense of release and freedom from the “hour of worship,” then we know that something is wrong when we step outside our boxed religiosity. Discipleship is about daily living, not legal assemblies or euphoric performances.

We must be honest with ourselves. If for some unfortunate reason, maybe because of travel or sickness, we were not able to be in a regular weekly assembly with the saints for several weeks, would our faith grow? Or, would it weaken?

Remember Acts 8:4? “Those who were scattered abroad went everywhere preaching the word.” At the time this migration of disciples happened, there were no assemblies of the saints “everywhere” they went. Think about Paul and Barnabas on their first missionary journey (At 13,14). The first part of the journey was at least one year in length. On this journey, the two disciples did not go from one assembly of the saints to another assembly. There were no assemblies of the saints in the places to which they went! They were initially alone in towns and cities, as all the other disciples in the Acts 8:4 case who went forth because they were scattered throughout the Roman Empire.

The discipleship of Paul and Barnabas was not validated by either a legal performance of assemblies, or by some emotionally charged hysterical euphoria. There was no “two-or-three-gathered-together” in the places to which they went until someone obeyed the gospel. And yet, in being alone in their travels, the faith of these early disciples did not diminish. The results of their evangelistic success proves that their faith actually increased.

If our relationship with Jesus must be validated by some assembly of the saints, then we have not yet stepped into the paradigm of daily discipleship into which Jesus calls us. Christianity is not about assemblies. It is about daily cross-bearing which means daily discipleship. It is a life-style.

Some will say, “You are discouraging people from attending the assembly.” By posing the objection, they have proved the point. They have confessed up to their attendance-oriented definition of discipleship. And this is the problem. We have relegated discipleship to be a check on an attendance chart at “base camp.” We have moved from daily discipleship to weekly “hour of worship” discipleship. The assembly of the disciples is a problem only when the disciples make the assembly all there is about being a disciple.

B. The bondage of unrealized preparations:

When some Christians make their assemblies all that there is about being a disciple, then they will seek to establish a theological outline of order by which each assembly is validated as legally correct. When one has walked through the legal performances of the assembly, then his discipleship is confirmed. He can step outside the legal assembly after the “closing prayer” and feel that he is a legally validated disciple, and thus has no responsibility to work for Jesus.

What the legal assemblologist has forgotten is that the assembly of the saints is the result of our discipleship. We are disciples of Divinity before we show up at any assembly. If the validation of our discipleship were based on assemblies, then we would be forced to establish some theological basis for what would be a “scriptural” assembly. Once we performed the “scriptural” assembly, then we would feel reassured that we have scripturally proved our discipleship without manifesting our faith through ministry to others (See Js 2:14-26). The result of this thinking has in the past led some into a quagmire of debate as to whose assembly is scripturally correct, regardless of how one behaves outside the “hour of worship.”

If discipleship is determined by the doctrinal correctness beyond fundamentals, and in the area of religious opinions, then we are still in the arena of debate because we too often try to sneak into our theology our opinions as fundamental, and then make our opinions a standard by which we determine faithful discipleship. This leads us to make judgments concerning whose opinions are “scriptural,” and whose opinions are “false doctrine.” And the debates continue endlessly.

Two contexts of discipleship in the New Testament might help settle most of the debate. The first is Acts 2 and the second is the book of Hebrews. In the first, there were about 3000 on the day of Pentecost who were added by God to the number of disciples, the number of which was only about 120 at the beginning of the day. But by the end of the day, God had added to this number about 3000 who believed on Jesus as the Son of God and were baptized into His name (At 2:38,41). Their knowledge of “New Testament doctrine,” therefore, was quite limited.

The second case scenario is on the other end of a lifetime of discipleship. These were the Jewish (Hebrew) disciples who had been Christians for many years (See Hb 10:32,33). These disciples were on the verge of forsaking the fundamental truths concerning who the ascended Jesus was and what He now does in the life of the Christian. They were Jewish disciples who were returning to the Levitical system of the Sinai law.

Now compare these two cases. The new disciples in Acts 2 were added to the number of existing disciples upon their belief in what Peter announced on that day for the first time in history, the message of the gospel of the reigning Son of God (At 2:22-36). They were disciples of Jesus before their first assembly of the saints the following Sunday. They were added to the church of disciples by God before the church had its first assembly.

Other than their knowledge of Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah, and what Peter preached in Acts 2:22-36, the 3000 responded and were baptized. After Peter’s message, the audience responded to the apostles, “Men and brethren, what will we do?” (At 2:37). Then came the instructions of Acts 2:38: “Re- pent and be baptized.” And, “with many other words he testified and exhorted ...” them on that same day (At 2:40).

Now in a brief time—Peter had to leave room in the day for the actual baptism of 3000 people—these 3000 heard, believed and obeyed, and were subsequently added to the body of disciples (At 2:47). There could not have been much time for the continued schooling in the truth on that day since 3000 were baptized. It seems that their initial discipleship was not based on a great deal of knowledge in reference to who Jesus is or what the church was.

The point is clear. These initial 3000 disciples had little teaching concerning the new covenant before they were claimed as disciples by God and added to the other disciples (At 2:47). Discipleship does not depend on knowing a complicated outline of “proof-text scriptures.” Knowledge of books on “theology” are not necessary to be a disciple of Divinity. No church manuals or books on “church doctrine” are necessary to be a disciple. All that one needs to get started in his or her trek of discipleship can be communicated in a matter of minutes, or at the most, an hour or so, for that was all the time Peter and the apostles had on the day of Pentecost before they started immersing about 3000 people in the same day.

Those who heard the gospel were discipled to Jesus (See Mt 28:19,20). They were subsequently baptized into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. In response to what they initially heard to become disciples, was the beginning of their lifetime of discipleship that involved continued study of the word of the One after whom they claimed to be disciples.

Now consider what the Hebrew disciples were changing in the context of the book of Hebrews. These disciples were going back into the bondage of the Sinai law. And in order to do this, they had to give up the fundamentals of what the disciples on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2 had accepted. The reason for their turning back from the One into whose name they had been baptized was that they failed to study as disciples, and thus, grow in the faith (See Hb 5:11; 2 Pt 3:18).

The Acts 2 disciples accepted the fact that Jesus was the prophesied Son of God who was resurrected from the dead and was sitting at the right hand of God (At 2:24-28). They accepted Him as the only Lord over all things (At 2:34). He was the Messiah (Christ) who fulfilled all the prophecies of the Old Testament concerning His coming and priesthood (Lk 24:44; At 2:36). Because of their lack of spiritual growth, the Hebrew disciples were giving up all these things. And for this reason, they were going back into destruction (Hb 10:39).

If one gives up those initial fundamental truths concerning who Jesus is and what He now does, and fails to grow in the grace and knowledge of Jesus (2 Pt 3:18), then he will lose his discipleship. All the 3000 who were baptized on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30 were Jews, many of whom were visiting from locations in Asia Minor. The book of Hebrews was written many years later to Jewish Christians. It makes one wonder if many of the 3000 Jews who were baptized in A.D. 30 on the day of Pentecost failed to continue their growth in the grace and knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ. At least this was the exhortation of Peter when he wrote to Jewish Christians who were living in different provinces of Asia Minor, some of whom may have been among the 3000 during the A.D. 30 event (See 2 Pt 3:18).

One may be added to the body of saints upon acceptance of the fundamentals of who Jesus is and His function as our high priest. But if we do not move on from the first principles of the faith (Hb 6:1-3), then we will fall back into our past religious heritage as those to whom the Hebrew writer was addressing his warning. If one does fall back into his old religious heritage, then he will lose his discipleship of Jesus, and thus fall back into destruction (Hb 10:39).

The Acts 2 disciples accepted the fundamental truths concerning who Jesus was. The Hebrew disciples were forsaking these fundamentals. Therefore, our discipleship in reference to belief is based on the fundamentals of who Jesus is and what He presently does in reference to His high priesthood. Our response to who He is generates discipleship by what He does through the continual cleansing of our sins by His blood (1 Jn 1:7).

We begin our journey as His disciples, not because of a knowledge of a complex outline of scriptures on the “identity of the church,” but on the fundamental fact of who Jesus is. Once one is discipled to Jesus as the reigning Son of God, he is then baptized into Christ in order to begin his or her life as a studious member of a universal body of disciples who have likewise responded to King Jesus (See Gl 3:26-29). The Holy Spirit’s letters of the New Testament were written to help us climb the mountain of discipleship. They were not written to prove that we are disciples of Jesus. According to what Jesus said in Matthew 28:19, we are baptized disciples. One is discipled to Jesus, and then baptized.

We commit ourselves to follow Jesus before we apply His cleansing blood at the point of baptism in order to have our sins washed away (At 22:16). The letters of the New Testament were written in order to give us the road map to continue growing in our discipleship until we reach the summit of where He is on high.

C. The bondage of a past religious heritage:

If one's faithfulness to his religious heritage (traditions) is the validation for his discipleship, then he can identify with the Jews of Jesus' day who had almost 2,000 years of heritage from the day of Abraham. Of course, between Abraham and the Jews who lived at the time Jesus came into the world, a host of traditions had been added to the Jews' heritage. These traditions of their heritage posed a significant obstacle for most Jews in reference to becoming disciples of Jesus.

During one encounter with Jesus, the guardians of the Jewish heritage (the Pharisees and scribes) complained to Jesus about the behavior of Jesus' disciples: "Why do Your disciples not walk according to the tradition of the elders ..." (Mk 7:5). Jesus' answer was quite unsettling. "All too well you reject the commandment of God so that you may keep your own tradition" (Mk 7:9).

Our traditional religiosity (heritage) has a significant influence on how we define discipleship. In fact, if our heritage in some way comes into conflict with our relationship with Jesus, then we often display a greater commitment to our religious heritage than we do to Jesus. At least this is what happened in the lives of most of the Jews of the first century.

Our traditions often become a crutch for our discipleship, if not the definition of how we relate to Jesus. However, we must keep in mind that any tradition of our heritage that conflicts with our discipleship of Jesus must be sacrificed in order for us to be the living sacrifice that God desires of us as disciples of Jesus. Discipleship, therefore, often calls on certain necessary sacrifices that must be made in order to become and maintain one's discipleship.

The problem with the traditions of our heritage is that submission to traditions perpetuates our religious heritage. And if our heritage is in some way contrary to the commandments of God, then we are in trouble if we are not willing to sacrifice any conflicting traditions. Without Jesus, our heritage is simply a religion that has been fabricated according to our own traditions. When our religious traditions are the foundation of our faith, we are simply being submissive to the "traditions of our fathers." This was the challenge of the Jews when Jesus walked into their lives.

When submission to Jesus came into conflict with the traditions of the Jewish fathers, the Jews had great difficulty in making the sacrifice that was necessary in order to become disciples of Jesus. But because the initial disciples of Jesus were willing to exalt Jesus over tradition, the Pharisees and scribes recognized in the disciples' behavior some things that were contrary to the religious practices of their fathers. We would rightly conclude, therefore, that it is not wrong to have traditions, but when those traditions that support our faith are contrary to being a disciple of Jesus, as were some of the traditions of the early Jews, then those traditions must be sacrificed. Any religious traditions of man that would hinder our discipleship must be sacrificed in order to submit totally to Jesus.

Each person comes to Jesus with the baggage of his or her own religious traditions. Any of those traditions that would hinder our discipleship must be sacrificed in order that we obey the will of God. Only those traditions that are not contrary to the will of God may remain, as long as those traditions do not divide disciples from one another. If a particular tradition is used to divide disciples from one another, then that tradition also must be sacrificed. It must be sacrificed in order to maintain unity among the saints.

Each potential disciple, therefore, must sacrifice some religious traditions that were once valuable in maintaining a past religion that was contrary to the will of God. But if one is not willing to make these sacrifices, then he will remain in the bondage of his own religious heritage, as well as infringe on the freedom that we all have in Christ (Gl 5:1).

VICTORY ON THE SUMMIT

When we were in high school, one of our new school classmates who grew up in the city, and after observing our stout physic, asked my brother and me, "Do you guys work out on weights?" We answered "no," realizing that our father had "grown a gym" on a Kansas farm where he "worked us out" every day. We grew up on a farm just this side of horse-drawn implements—our father had walked behind a horse pulling a plow in his early years. But on our "farm gym," we had 35 kilogram hay bales that we had to deal with from hay cutting time to cattle feeding throughout the winter months. The advantage we had in growing up on the "farm gym" of our father was that we developed arms and legs for mountains.

My wife, Martha, and I eventually moved to Africa in 1989. In our early years in Africa we climbed our share of mountains, but none as Mount Kenya and Kilimanjaro—they are on the bucket list. (Fortunately, I have lost that bucket.) Nevertheless, in our adventure to climb mountains in South Africa, one particular mountain almost did us in.

Knowing that we liked to hike and climb mountains, a good friend of ours studied a particular mountain that she thought would be a challenge for us. So a team was put together, plans were made, and the day arrived for our assault on a mountain summit in 1992.

It was easy to get to base camp. We drove our cars. (OK, we cheated.) But with a good night's sleep at base camp, we were up at 6:00<sup>AM</sup>, rucksacks packed, and the team of eight trekked toward what we thought was the summit of a challenging mountain.

Hours went by as we trudged a rocky pathway around the mountain that gradually steepened as we made our way up the south side. The temperature that day at base camp would eventually rise to 40 degrees Celsius (104 degrees Fahrenheit). After laboring and sweating in the lower rising heat, we began to climb into the cooler temperatures of higher altitudes. But we were a long way from the “summit” that we could see at our level.

After eight hours of laborious struggle, I looked back at Martha and saw that she was somewhat fatigued, but gallantly trudging on in good spirits. Such could not be said for some of the other team members. Nevertheless, we were all determined to carry on.

The wife of one team member was almost at the end of her endurance. So I offered, as any strong-legged farmer, to carry her rucksack. I placed it on my chest, which balanced out my own rucksack on my back. We continued to climb.

From the lower altitudes, we could see what we all first believed was the summit of the mountain. So onward we encouraged one another to go. Because I was the faster of the lot, I went on before the team to walk the way up in order to encourage the exhausted mountaineers below that they could make it to the summit. So for about an hour I labored on up the mountain toward the top. But as I neared what we thought was the summit, I realized that it was not the summit at all. It was only a high ridge that hid the real summit that was much further on up. As I neared the summit of that ridge I was amazed at how much higher the actual summit extended into the heavens.

It was a moment of emotional deflation. I was somewhat disheartened about my discovery. I stopped to ponder the predicament of the exhausted team below. I calculated that the rest of the team was nearing the end of their physical abilities, as I was close to mine. I looked back and could not see them beyond a ridge over which I had just climbed. So with my best yell at the top of my voice, I cried out, “Go back! Go back! This is not the summit!” I cried out the command over and over.

I then assured myself that they had all heard my pleas that they return to base camp. Nevertheless, I was determined to conquer the real summit of this mountain. I convinced myself that I could do this mountain. So on I went, up to the “deceptive summit,” and then down into a valley that was between the two summits. Fortunately, in the valley there was a small stream of water. I was in desperate need of water because I was at the end of my supply. I drank like a camel and then threw myself on the ground exhausted just to have a moment of recovery. That was a mistake. Cramps set in and my “farmer legs” stiffened with excruciating pain. I was there alone and surmised that rescuers would eventually find this forty-five year old body sprawled out on the ground with a distorted face lying stiffened by a creek of water.

After some time, however, I recuperated, stood up, and worked out the rest of the pain as my body emptied the toxins that had cramped my belabored leg muscles. I remember, however, having this feeling of peace because I was sure that the team had surely heard my pleas that they return to base camp. I could go in peace alone to the summit, and then make the descent the following day to reunite with them at base camp. Solitude at the time was truly the best company.

It was now about 6:00<sup>PM</sup>. I finally reached the real summit and celebrated my victory with a cooked can of beans from a camper's rucksack cooker. I was at peace and exhilarated by the fact that after eleven hours of climbing I was victorious over the mountain. It was now time to sleep a full night in the tranquility that only summits can offer.

So at about 7:00<sup>PM</sup> I laid my worn and wasted body down with the setting sun for my prayers of the night. During my conversation with God, I heard this still small voice. It was as if it were coming from a great distance away. “Roooooger! Roooooger!” the voice cried out. It raced across my mind, “God, is that You?” And there it was again: “Roooooger! Roooooger!” After I theologically readjusted myself, I perceived that the voice was that of Martha, my beloved wife. What? How in all the world, I thought, was the voice of Martha making its way up from the base of the mountain to the summit where I had convinced myself that I was alone with God? Had I become delirious in my fatigue?

After coming to my senses and overcoming my shock, I jumped up and headed through the twilight hours back down the trail toward the echo of the pleading voice. After about a half kilometer of hurried walk, I saw in a distance this woman seated calmly on a rock. As I hurriedly drew closer to the “woman on the rock,” I identified her in the twilight as my devoted wife. Thoughts raced through my mind: What in the world is she doing up here? Did she not hear my pleas that the team return to base camp?

But there she was, having trudged on before the other team members, two of whom had to give up the quest and return to base camp. She was somber on that rock. She had neatly combed her hair. She had put on lipstick, straightened her clothing, and sat there calmly on that rock. When I approached her, she had this solemn appearance, being totally exhausted of all emotion and physical strength, but totally ready to give herself over to God. She was at the edge of the agony of defeat.

She later explained to me her mental state of mind at the time, “I knew I was going to die on that mountain. And when the search party found my body, I didn’t want to look bad.”

To say the least, that was the day that I truly understood that there was more in the woman that I married than I thought, more than even she herself knew. (Mountains have a way of revealing to ourselves who we really are.)

Having not heard my pleas to the team to return to base camp, and because of some marital instinct and independence, she went alone before the remnants of the team and followed her adventurous husband to the summit of a mountain where she was willing to give herself in death that she be by his side. And by his side she was that night on the summit that both of us had conquered. And when darkness eventually crept upon the face of the earth that surreal night, and as we lay cradled in one another’s arms under a canopy of eternal stars, both of us had a greater admiration for the other, me more than she, for to this day I still wonder at how she agonized her way alone to her husband and the summit.

Discipleship is about following Jesus unto death.

In order to celebrate our victory on the summit, we must lay aside anything that would hinder our quest to get there. And so we remember the Spirit’s words:

Do not fear those things that you will suffer. Behold, the devil will cast some of you into prison so that you may be tested. And you will have tribulation ten days. Be faithful unto death and I will give you the crown of life (Rv 2:10).

All preparations must be made to climb through all the trials that we will incur along the way in our quest to grow as disciples of Jesus. We seek to be aware of our hindrances in order to change or rearrange, or simply discard unnecessary baggage. Every successful mountaineer has a rucksack full of all those things that are necessary in order to be successful. And because weight is one of the most critical aspects of a successful climb to the summit, it is important to discard any unnecessary articles that would weigh one down in his or her quest.

We must be willing to break out of the bondage of past religiosity. Religiosity must be sacrificed for Christianity. Those things that obscure one’s vision of the summit of spiritual growth, must be left behind. Old appendages of religiosity may encumber our growth in Christ. We must be willing, therefore, to make all changes that are necessary in order to establish a greater relationship with King Jesus on our way to the summit. There can be no growth in the knowledge of Jesus if one remains in the bondage of biblical ignorance or laden with fake religiosity (See 2 Pt 3:18).

There is no cheap trek to the peak where Jesus is seated at the right hand of God as King of kings and Lord of lords (1 Tm 6:15). Some have held up or stalled their accent by claiming to have reached a “personal relationship” with Jesus. This statement is never made in the New Testament, and thus, we need to be cautioned about the use of the phrase lest we deceive ourselves into reaching a spiritual summit that is far short of greater heights above. We may be claiming a victory that is short of what God has offered for us to enjoy. In claiming a “personal relationship” with Jesus, we are actually weakening the authority of Jesus’ word in our lives and His promises that we must experience. And if we do this, we weaken the strength of His word and promises to empower us in spiritual growth (See Hb 4:12).

The claim of a “personal relationship” with Jesus is commonly made in a world of confused religionists who have little knowledge of the Bible, especially those passages that read with the meaning of what Jesus said in John 12:48: “*He who rejects Me and does not receive My words, has one who judges him.” The Judge is Jesus. The standard of judgment is His word. If one uses the phrase “personal relationship” to define his relationship with the Judge, then he must seriously consider a very important point lest he establish for himself a manual on discipleship training that is weak and inactive, and thus will hold one up and stalled on a lower summit. In other words, if one does not consider the word of the Judge authoritative in determining his beliefs and behavior, then certainly he will not respectfully respond to it as the final standard for discipleship training. One's "personal relationship" with Jesus would make Jesus equal with everyone else with whom we have a "personal relationship." Doing this is a similar theological apostasy as the Hebrews who were making Jesus equal with angels, but no greater (See Hb 1).

We have a "personal relationship" with our friends and spouses. In this relationship we are buddies. We are partners. We have one another's back in times of crisis and trials. This definition of a "personal relationship" with Jesus is usually based only on one's understanding of who Jesus was in His incarnate state with the early disciples who knew Him as they walked down the Galilean pathways. They talked with Him. They conversed, and possibly they played a game or two with Him. They had a "personal relationship" with Jesus on earth. Our relationship with Jesus is all this, save for the personal encounter with Him. But our relationship with Him is far greater.

On the night of His betrayal, and during His final hours with His disciples, Jesus prepared the disciples for a paradigm shift in their relationship with Him. He said, "You call Me Teacher and Lord. And you are right, for so I am" (Jn 13:13). During His personal ministry with them, the disciples grew to the point of calling Him Teacher (Rabbi). They had also progressed spiritually to calling Him their Lord. But before making this statement to the disciples, and on the same occasion, Jesus had said to them, "*He who rejects Me and does not receive My words, has one who judges him. The word that I have spoken, the same will judge him in the last day" (Jn 12:48). Our friends with whom we have "personal relationships" would never say this to us. Spouses, between whom there is a "personal relationship," would never say this to one another. Only one who was God could make such a statement, and our relationship with God is far different and greater than our personal relationship with anyone on this earth.

What the disciples of Jesus did not know at the time when Jesus was personally with them, was that He was about to ascend to the right hand of God as King of kings and Lord of lords. Paul later confessed that God "has appointed a day in which He will judge the world in righteousness by the Man [Jesus] whom He has ordained" (At 17:31). It is this Judge who is coming again. And it is with this Judge that we must establish a relationship. But the relationship is beyond simply "personal."

By the time Paul made the preceding statement, his relationship with Jesus had changed from the time when he thought Christians were only a religious sect of this world. At the time he made the statement, Paul had an obedient relationship with the Judge who was King of kings and Lord of Lords. He had this relationship in mind when he wrote,

The Lord Jesus will be revealed from heaven with His mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those who do not know God and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ (2 Th 1:7,8).

Now when we use the phrase "personal relationship" in reference to our discipleship of Jesus, it is this Lord Jesus Christ before whom all men will give account of their sins, "for we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ" (2 Co 5:10). In order to stand before the judgment seat of the Lord Jesus, we must have an obedient relationship with Him in reference to His word by which we will all be judged (Jn 12:48).

Discipleship of Divinity must move beyond the "personal relationship" that the disciples had with Jesus before He ascended to the right hand of God. Our knowledge of the Lord Jesus must include more than the information provided by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. One must move on to the ascension of Jesus, and then into the epistles wherein it is declared that the Father raised Jesus . . .

. . . from the dead and seated Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principality and power and might and dominion and every name that is named, not in this age, but also in that which is to come. And He put all things under His feet ..." (Ep 1:20-22).

We must not settle for a cheap discipleship that sparks no fear deep in our souls in reference to standing before the Lord Jesus in judgment. Our personal friends may forget a multitude of sins because of their love for us. Our spouses may do the same. But if one is not obediently walking in the light of the word of the Lord Jesus, then His blood will not cleanse him of sin (See 1 Jn 1:7). And if we stand before the Lord Jesus in judgment without His cleansing blood, then we are in serious trouble.

As the first disciples who walked with Jesus moved on from a personal to an obedient relationship with a reigning King, we too must move on as disciples to the summit of our King Jesus (See Ep 1:20-22). This the early disciples did. And because they did, the word of King Jesus empowered them on to higher summits. This we also must do. Jesus is now the ascended Judge at the right hand of God who is coming to judge the world. It is this Judge with whom we must now have an obedient relationship. When this relationship with Jesus is established, then we too will be able to declare with Paul, “I can do all things through Him who strengthens me” (Ph 4:13). And to mountaineers this means, “We can reach all spiritual summits through the One who empowers us.”

The early disciples of Jesus made this paradigm shift. Paul explained this transition in the lives of the first disciples: “Even though we have known Christ [personally] according to the flesh, yet now we know Him thus no more” (2 Co 5:16). The first disciples had a personal relationship with Jesus when they walked with Him “according to the flesh” during His earthly ministry. But that all changed when Jesus ascended on high to the right hand of God. Knowing that the Lord Jesus now has all authority is comforting (Mt 28:18). Knowing that the Lord Jesus is head over all things is empowering (Ep 1:22). Knowing that the Lord Jesus upholds all things by the power of His word is reassuring (Hb 1:3).

Our discipleship with Jesus is based on love, but it is a love about which John wrote: “My little children, let us not love in word or in tongue, but in deed and in truth” (1 Jn 3:18). Our love must go into action. We know that we are God’s “little children,” therefore, “when we love God and keep His commandments” (1 Jn 5:2). “For this is the love of God, that we keep His commandments” (1 Jn 5:3).

Our discipleship of Divinity is now based on our obedience to the commandments of our Lord. Our obedience is always flawed, but our flaws are covered by His grace. We cannot ignore commandments by focusing on grace, lest we turn the grace of God into a life of disobedience (Jd 4). True disciples of Divinity love God through their love of His commandments. It is for this reason that a true disciple is discovered by his or her obsession with the word of his Lord (See At 17:11). A true disciple seeks to be knowledgeable of the “climbing manual” of the Judge before He shows up at the court house for judgment (Hb 9:27).

When the love of God’s commandments reigns in our hearts, fellowship between Bible loving disciples happens. And when the fellowship of obedient Bible lovers happens, then we are brought together in assembly to sing the praises of our Lord and Savior.

Once we clear away all the religiosity that may have been handed down to us through our fathers, we are then on our way to the summit of an unadulterated relationship with the Judge who is seated at the right hand of God. The first disciples transitioned in their relationship with Jesus from personal to the One who reigns as King over all things (At 17:31). If we would have an obedient discipleship relationship with this Lord Jesus, then we too should say as Eli instructed Samuel the next time he heard the still quiet voice from the Lord, “Speak, Lord, for your servant hears” (1 Sm 3:9).

Do not forget these words from Jesus: “Come to Me all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest” (Mt 11:28). When times get tough on “discipleship mountain,” and when you think you have spent your last efforts to scale the slopes, having dressed yourself with Christ, have handy also a comb and some lipstick.

Fasting

While living on a Kansas farm in Middle America in our youth, we experienced a natural phenomenon in animal behavior that is common among all animals. It was an inborn behavior of healing that was at first puzzling to us who were in our early years learning life behavior from animals. On numerous occasions, we experienced animals on the farm that manifested the same behavior when they were injured in some way. We thus concluded that this was the way God made animals . . . and humans.

As an example, we had this adventurous dog that we had named Pepper. Pepper was not one of those dogs who would remain at home as a spoiled house pet. On the contrary, he was sometimes a nuisance when he habitually followed us for the adventure and freedom of the field. He followed us continually as we farmed the land with farming equipment that was not that kind to animals. He was astutely brave, and thus, sometimes lacked a spirit of caution that eventually caught up with him on different occasions. On one occasion when he was following us on the tractor, one of his front legs was severed by a mowing machine behind the tractor.

The gallant dog let out one “yip,” and that was the end of his complaints of pain. So we gently cradled the brave victim in our arms and took him to the farm house. We lovingly made a comfortable “hospital” box in which he could lay to recuperate . . . or die. As compassionate nurses, we faithfully brought him food and water. After the first day, Pepper had not touched the water nor sniffed the food. The second and third day were the same. Being somewhat concerned, on the fourth day we brought him a fine rare cooked fillet steak from our dinner table. He would have nothing to do with it, though he did start lapping some water. We were worried that our beloved dog would starve himself to death. He gave no sounds of pain, though in his eyes we could see pain. For about five days Pepper did not even sniff food.

But then on the sixth day we were relieved when our frail-looking Pepper finally nibbled on some food. What the body of Pepper was doing, that we did not understand in those days, was that it shut down its digestive system. His digestive system shut down in order that his body focus all its energy on the healing of the wound of that severed leg. As a result, Pepper eventually rose from his sick bed, and was again in the fields behind the tractor hobbling along with three and a half legs. Nothing would detour Pepper from the adventure of the field.

On another occasion Pepper’s back hip was run over and crushed by a truck. He went through the same process of healing. The joints in his hip healed, but fused together. Nevertheless, after healing, this now two and a half legged dog could still run the fields. It was an amusing sight to see him run, but nothing would detour Pepper from the freedom of the field. On the farm, Pepper taught us a great deal about life. When you are cut down, or knocked down, don’t ever stay down.

Doctors have now told us that the human body uses about 65% of its energy in digesting a large meal. At least Pepper’s body knew one thing about healing itself. When wounded, body energy was not to be wasted on digesting a fillet steak while it was repairing itself. What God did in creating the body to heal itself, it has taken man a long time to discover through modern medicine. Fasting is a natural mechanism by which the body heals itself.

Fasting is one of those “medical practices” that has long been ignored by self-indulgent humans. Fasting is not something that is commanded by God, but something that is the natural behavior of those who have a deep seated desire to depend on God, and as a serendipitous blessing, reap physical healing. People have discovered throughout millennia of fasting that the body reenergizes itself through the process of fasting.

The Bible never goes into the health benefits of fasting. Throughout centuries of fasting, however, the physical benefits of fasting were discovered when godly people in fasting focused on spiritual matters. The Bible was never meant to be a science book on health, but it is a book on the science of living. And in the science of living, fasting played a very important role in the lives of godly people throughout the centuries.

We seek to understand both the health benefits and spiritual benefits of fasting. In an overindulgent world, fasting is quite difficult to restore in our behavior as the people of God. Fasting is the forgotten behavior in a world where obesity is characteristic of the majority of people in the developed world that has gorged itself into spiritual poverty. In the lives of the religious in the developed world, it is almost unknown. Nevertheless, when we read through the Scriptures, fasting was naturally connected with prayer, and subsequently was a major spiritual behavior of the saints of old. If fasting will take us to a higher level of spiritual being, we want to go there, for we understand that fasting is more than missing a meal.

When our prayers become monotonous, and seem to reap no results, then it is a time to restore in our personal life the dedication of fasting that is coupled with our prayers. When one has exhausted every option to grow spiritually, and to dig oneself out of the pit of despair, there is only one option. That option is to fast until the spiritual conquers the physiological, until the spirit overcomes the supper. We seek in fasting to walk into the presence of God. And thus, we will stay there until we renew our relationship with a long forgotten Friend.

LISTENING TO THE DOCTOR

Fasting affects every part of our physical and spiritual being. We wish that the Bible had given more details on this matter. If it had, we would probably fast more for physical reasons than spiritual reasons. Fasting is the result of a spiritual commitment that has marvelous physical benefits. Since we are almost always focused on the physical, and if God had explained all the health reasons for fasting, then we would surely neglect the spiritual in order to accomplish the physical results. Nevertheless, God made our bodies in a marvelous way in that it reenergizes itself when we fast. For the Christian, however, fasting is primarily about spiritual matters. Nevertheless, we do not ignore the physical health benefits of fasting that have been learned throughout history.

As an introduction to our study of the historical cases of fasting by the children of God, upon our doctor’s advice, it is good to identify some of the physical benefits of fasting that are connected with the spiritual. Only in the last century has the modern medical world “discovered” many of the physical benefits of fasting that many people have known for centuries. We only assume that those who fasted in ancient times understood some of the physical benefits that modern medicine has now confirmed. Though we do not assume that the ancients fasted primarily because of physical benefits, we do assume that they realized many of the health benefits of fasting. At least in the biblical context where fasting is mentioned, there is no mention of physical benefits, though we could assume that the physical benefits played a part in the fasting. As we study case examples of fasting in the Bible, we will assume that the people had naturally discovered many of the physical benefits of fasting.

Generally speaking, some of the mental and physical benefits of fasting that have been discovered by modern medicine and Christians are the following: (1) In fasting, the spiritual part of man has the opportunity to refocus on the mental. (2) The result of focusing on the mental in fasting is that we have better clarity in thought processing. (3) When we focus on the mental (spiritual), our thoughts are trained to focus clearly on tasks that are at hand. (4) In reference to the Christian, when one focuses in fasting on the spiritual, his or her focus becomes more aware of God's participation in our lives. (5) Fasting gives our digestive system a break. (6) When our digestive system is idle, then the body has the opportunity to cleanse itself through detoxification. (7) The energy saved from digestion is directed to repairing the body. (8) Through fasting our body has the opportunity to refocus on restoring itself in order to be energized after the fast is terminated.

Some doctors have stated that fasting is the "miracle healing" for many of our most common ailments. In his book, Staying Healthy with Nutrition, Dr. Elson Haas mentioned twenty-four different health and spiritual benefits that result from fasting. These include a better resistance to disease, better sleep, better creativity, improved senses, more energy, purification of the body and physical rejuvenation. Haas continued to explain that the body has the ability to heal and maintain itself through periodic fasts. Fasting frees up energy to be directed to the healing processes of the body. The old saying, "You must eat to get better," is not necessarily true. If one loses his appetite, his body is saying, "Give me a break so I can heal myself." Listen to Pepper.

Fasting from specific foods and drinks will produce limited results. When we fast from those foods or drinks that we crave, then our mind is being reprogrammed not to depend on those craved foods and drinks. Cravings are a dysfunction of our life-style behavior. When we fast from cravings, we are training our minds to consume all things in moderation.

In America over 50,000 people die every year because of opioid overdose. This overdose of a drug should be a resounding call for fasting from those who are addicted to any drug. The same should be said of the alcoholic and those addicted to smoking. If one is in the bondage of coke or coffee, he or she too is in need of fasting from these cravings in order to know that something outside their bodies does not have control over mind and body.

Fasting is a blessing to the health of both mind and body. During a prolonged fast the body frees up energy to detox and to redirect energy to repair cells, organs and skin tissues. Fasting reprograms the mind to detour the craving for drugs. This is especially true in reference to long fasts. As in the case of Pepper, it took a long fast in order that the body repair the wound of a severed leg. Lengthy fasts redirect the healing processes of our body and reprogram our minds. Fasting for a long period of time gives our bodies the opportunity to detox in order that the cleansed body better use its own healing processes. In fasting, our minds are delivered from the bondage of outside influences.

Detoxification is one of the greatest physiological benefits of fasting. After about two days of fasting, and when one has progressed through the common "detox headache," he or she knows that their body stored up toxins that had to be eliminated from their system. Fasting cleans out stored toxins. When the headache is gone, then the toxins are gone.

Detoxification is only one benefit of fasting where the body is doing some house repair in order to come back with more energy after the fast. Those who fast for health reasons must remember that the body is storing up a great deal of toxins from the medication that is consumed on a regular basis. These toxins must occasionally be flushed from the body.

Fasting gives the body an opportunity to readjust itself to normality. Our bodily functions are rebalanced in order to function unhindered in order that the body heal itself with its own power. For this reason, fasting is given credit for allowing the body the opportunity to clear up many allergies, help with arthritis, digestive disorders, skin conditions, cardiovascular disease and asthma. Eating excessively on a regular basis hinders the body from functioning normally in guarding and healing itself. When one is an excessive eater, his or her body is storing away toxins and postponing normal body function to eliminate toxins. It is as if the body is waiting for a time of rest from digestion.

Two thousand years ago obesity was not a problem in societies throughout the world. Archaeological discoveries reveal no fat statues or inscriptions. However, in these modern times of wealth and prosperity, obesity characterizes the majority of many Western societies. When artists paint a true picture of the typical modern person, there is a bulge hanging over the belt. If the world is here a thousand years from now, we wonder what archaeologists then will conclude from their discoveries of the sculptures and art of this generation.

Some would fast solely for the purpose of losing weight. In fact, many people with whom we have discussed fasting name this as their primary reason for fasting. There is some benefit of fasting for physical goals. But if fasting is solely for the purpose of losing weight, but with no change in mental attitude, then the weight loss is usually undone soon after the fasting. The point is that if one's mind is not connected with the fast, then no mental change is made. Subsequently, one's normal mental attitude toward food will continue after the fast as it was before. And since one's body goes into "starvation mode" when in a fast, immediately after the fast almost all the food intake is consumed by the body. Therefore, regardless of the reason for fasting, one should eat lightly for some time after any fast.

The body can be trained to fast. We have discovered that when fasting on a regular bases, the body can easily go into a two to three day fast without all the agony that comes with initial fasts. Once the body and mind are trained to fast, then it is easy to fast. The Pharisees who fasted twice a week knew this (Lk 18:12). Nevertheless, that first fast is a struggle. The reason so many people give up on fasting is that they cannot mentally get past all the struggles they experienced with their initial fast. But be patient, fasting becomes easier the more one fasts.

Fasting will change your tastes. We once fasted from all carbonated drinks for two years. After about two weeks into the fast, water started tasting better. We were amazed. We just could not drink enough water. What fasting does is also turn one's tastes more toward natural and wholesome foods. We found that fasting moved us to love salads, a food that we were not previously overenthusiastic about eating. It was an interesting experience, discovering that God evidently created our bodies first to be vegetarian.

Since fasting gives one greater mental clarity and energy, then the conclusion is obvious. Before one seeks to accomplish a particular task, then fasting should be one of the first things to do in order to clarify one's mind. If the task is physically related, then fasting gives the body the opportunity to rejuvenate itself before engaging in the physical task. If one desires to have a clearer perspective of what is to come, then fasting helps one to think more clearly.

Some tasks that are before us demand a clear focus by the mental/spiritual side of our being. Since our physical being is inseparably linked to our mental being, then fasting refocuses our attention to clarify our objectives. This is one reason why fasting is often linked with prayer in the Scriptures. Fasting helps us to focus in prayer. Instead of gorging ourselves into spiritual frailty, fasting restores our focus on spiritual things.

Prayer becomes more intense when we are on a prolonged fast. When Epaphras "labored fervently" in prayer, we assume that his prayer was connected with fasting (Cl 4:12). The Greek word that the Spirit used to define his fervent prayer was the word that was also used to refer to the labor pains through which a woman goes during childbirth. Fasting will take one to the level of agonizing in prayer. If one is having difficulty with his or her prayer life, then fasting is the cure.

We keep in mind these benefits of fasting as we study various texts of the Bible where the people of God fasted. Knowing what modern medicine has discovered helps us better understand why some fasted in the Bible in reference to great tasks that were set before them. Though there are no commands in the New Testament to fast, there are enough examples to lead us into this behavior as the children of God.

MOURN, FAST AND ATTACK

The context of this event of fasting on the part of God's people is explained in 1 Samuel 7:2: "Now it came to pass while the ark remained in Kirjath Jearim that the time was long, for it was twenty years. And all the house of Israel mourned after the Lord." Samuel's answer to test the sincerity of the mourning of the people was his following mandate:

If you do return to the Lord with all your hearts, then put away the foreign gods and the Ashtaroths from among you, and prepare your hearts for the Lord, and serve Him only. And He will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines (1 Samuel 7:3).

Realizing that one has strayed from the Lord should stimulate sincere mourning. But in order to mourn sincerely, one must know the Lord from whom one has strayed. And there is only one way to know the Lord. "So then faith comes by hearing and hearing by the word of Christ" (Rm 10:17). One can mourn in ignorance of the word of God, but such mourning is useless in “putting away foreign gods.” Acceptable mourning must be founded upon the word of God from which one has strayed. Sincere mourning is characteristic of those who hunger and thirst after the word of God (See Mt 5:3-6).

In the case of the people in the historical event of 1 Samuel 7, Samuel commanded that the people turn from the gods they had created after their own imagination (1 Sm 7:4). Their next action was to take action. Samuel directed, “Gather all Israel to Mizpeh and I will pray to the Lord for you” (1 Sm 7:5). The people immediately obeyed the orders of Samuel to gather at Mizpeh. “And they fasted on that day and said there, ‘We have sinned against the Lord’” (1 Sm 7:6). Their mourning provoked fasting and confession that they had strayed from the will of the one true and living God. Therefore, in order to prepare their hearts and bodies for war, they fasted. This was a day fast, probably ending in the evening, for on the following days they were going into battle (See Jg 20:26).

In preparation for this fast, they first took ownership of their sin that they had forsook God. They were mourning over something that was wrong in their lives, that is, they had forsaken the will of God for the will of foreign gods. As a result of their apostasy, God allowed the ark of God to be taken from them. The objective of their fast, therefore, was first to restore themselves to God, and then, restore the ark of God to its proper place.

When righteous people realize that they are not spiritually right with God, it is a time for mourning. But mourning must be followed by action. Feelings profit nothing if they are not objectively carried out in our lives. Once the people of Israel heeded the call to do that which was right, they fasted an entire day in order to prepare themselves in body and mind to engage the Philistines in battle.

This incident reminds us of the physical benefits of fasting that the people surely knew at the time of this conflict. It was not a time to gorge oneself with a heavy meal, and then try to engage the enemy on the battlefield. It would be quite difficult to go into battle and pursue an enemy on a full stomach. The imminent conflict called for a fast in order to energize their bodies and minds for battle.

When the Philistines heard that Israel was serious about retrieving the ark of God, they were terrified. Israel was empowered both mentally and physically through their fasting. They prepared themselves to run great distances in pursuit of the Philistines. They “went out of Mizpeh and pursued the Philistines. And they smote them down as far as below Beth Car” (1 Sm 7:11). The end of the story was recorded in 1 Samuel 7:12: “Then Samuel took a stone and set it between Mizpeh and Shen. And he called the name of it Ebenezer, saying, ‘Thus far the Lord has helped us’” (1 Sm 7:12).

If the saints of God today would raise a stone to commemorate their victories for God, then mourning and prayer over that which is not right in their lives must begin. Next comes action and fasting, and action again. Our fasting objectively reveals the sincerity of our mourning and prayers. If we would have God heed the call of our prayers, then our mourning must be in response to His word and will. Religious people who are ignorant of the word of God have no idea what the will of God is, and thus, their pleas to God to act in their lives goes unanswered. And thus, their mourning is in vain in that it is not in response to the word and will of God.

Many years later, Israel again sinned. And again God punished them. On this particular occasion, King Saul had taken apostate Israel into battle with the Philistines. In this battle, the Philistines won because Saul had moved away from the will of God. Consequently, King Saul and his sons were slain in the battle. To disgrace Saul and his sons, the Philistines hung their bodies on a wall at Beth Shan.

Fortunately, there were some valiant men in Jabesh Gilead who “arose and went all night and took the body of Saul and the bodies of his sons from the wall of Beth Shan. And they came to Jabesh and burnt them there” (1 Sm 31:11,12). When these righteous men had accomplished this good deed, they fasted seven days (1 Sm 31:13; 1 Ch 10:12). This fasting was in respect of God’s anointed, but also their cleansing from handling dead bodies. The sincerity of their deed was manifested for seven days in their fasting. When good men do good things, a fast in appreciation for God working through them to accomplish good works for His glory is in order. The valiant men of Jabesh Gilead would teach us a lesson on fasting when we accomplish good things because God worked in our lives.

FASTING FOR LIFE

Because he allowed himself to be tempted, David committed adultery with another man's wife. The prophet Nathan confronted David on the matter with a parable, and with the following concluding words: "You have killed Uriah the Hittite with the sword and have taken his wife to be your wife, and have slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon" (2 Sm 12:9). Nathan's judgment of David was not unfruitful. David repented with the words, "I have sinned against the Lord" (2 Sm 12:13).

But this story was not over with the repentance of David. When Nathan departed from the house of David, "The Lord struck the child that Uriah's wife [Bathsheba] bore to David, and he was very sick" (2 Sm 12:15). Whether David knew that the Lord had taken a direct hand in the matter to strike the child sick, we are not told. We are told, however, that David "inquired of God for the child. And David fasted and went in and lay all night on the ground" (2 Sm 12:16).

David evidently concluded that this was a life-threatening sickness. His love for the child moved him to fast in his petitions to the Lord on behalf of the child. A parent who has not had this experience cannot fully understand the helplessness that David felt for his child. We are told that he fasted. Whether intentional, or because of intense worry, we are not told. But a parent who has a child who wavers between life and death will feel no desire to eat. We view David's fast in this context to be both the result of intense worry that was combined with his intense prayer that God save the child.

David's fast was prolonged. "The elders of his house arose and went to him, to raise him up from the ground. But he would not, nor did he eat bread with them" (2 Sm 12:17). Realizing that David was as a mourning father on the ground before his sick child, the elders sought to comfort him by raising him from the ground. The elders offered to eat with him in order to bring comfort to this concerned father.

"Now it came to pass on the seventh day that the child died" (2 Sm 12:18). We assume that this was the seventh day after the child first fell sick, and for the same amount of time, David was on the ground before the child in fasting and agonizing prayer.

There are those times in a parent's life that fasting is the right thing to do. When our children are in danger, it is a time for agonizing prayer that is coupled with fasting. We would fast as David until a solution is realized. Unfortunately, in David's situation, the result of the sickness of the child was death. Since it was God who struck the child with sickness, we wonder why He allowed the child to remain alive for seven days before he died. It could be that God wanted to impress on David the great shame that he, the king, had brought on the people of God through his adultery with Bathsheba, and subsequent elimination of Uriah, the husband of Bathsheba, by death in battle (See 2 Sm 12:14). The sin was grievous, and thus the time for sorrow was also to be grievous. And because we have a biblical record of this sin, God would admonish each one of us never to involve ourselves in such a scheme, which in this case, led to the death of both an innocent man, Uriah, and an innocent child.

FAST FOR FAVOR

When concerned people realize that things are not right, they mourn, fast, pray and take action. Such were the actions of Nehemiah in reference to the spiritual condition of God's people while they were residing in the land of their captivity and the condition of a remnant that had returned to Palestine.

When a delegation of men eventually came from Palestine to Nehemiah, who was the cupbearer for the Persian king in the palace of Shushan, Nehemiah asked them concerning the condition of Jerusalem and the returned remnant of God's people who were in the land of Palestine. The delegation replied through Hanani, "The remnant that is left from the captivity in the province is in great distress and reproach. The wall of Jerusalem is also broken down and its gates are burned with fire" (Ne 1:3).

Godly people are not insensitive to the deplorable situation in which God's mission sometimes exists at any place or time in history. It was God's plan to work through Israel in the haven of the promised land to eventually bring the Messiah and Savior into the world. But according to the report of Hanani who testified concerning the condition of the people of God in the land of Palestine, the situation was deplorable. Those who were in the land were composed of those who were left in Palestine after the captivity of 586 B.C., as well as a remnant of captives that joined them with the restorations led by Zerubbabel in 536 B.C. and Ezra in 457 B.C. Restoration in those days was started on the city, but was eventually terminated.

Godly leaders respond, as Nehemiah, to situations that are wrong in reference to the work of God. “Now it came to pass when I heard these words that I sat down and wept. And I mourned many days, and fasted and prayed before the God of heaven” (Ne 1:4).

The historical setting of this report is crucial in reference to Nehemiah’s response. With the return of captives to Palestine that were led by Zerubbabel and Ezra, the rebuilding of the temple was completed in 515 B.C. (Ez 6:13-16). However, opposition arose against the returnees to the point that they ceased rebuilding the city (Ez 4:1-5,24). God then sent Haggai and Zechariah to motivate the people to continue the rebuilding of the city (Ez 4:24; 5:1ff). But because of opposition, the rebuilding was still not completed. It was not until the coming of Nehemiah in 444 B.C. that the city reconstruction was started again and completed. This was over ninety years after the initial return of captives in 536 B.C. Now we can better understand Nehemiah’s tearful response to the report of Hanani that the city was still in ruins.*

In his weeping prayer and fasting to God in response to the report of Hanani, Nehemiah first confessed the sins of the people that had led to the condition in which they existed in the land (Ne 1:6). He prayed, “We have dealt very corruptly against You and have not kept the commandments” (Ne 1:7).

Nehemiah confessed that their predicament was the result of their own sin. In his confession, he remembered the pronouncement that God had made to Israel through Moses before they entered the land over one thousand years before: “If you transgress, I will scatter you abroad among the nations” (Ne 1:8). But in the warning concerning transgression and exile, there was also a promise.

But if you turn to Me and keep My commandments and do them, though your outcasts be in the uttermost part of the heavens, yet I will gather them from there and will bring them to the place that I have chosen to set My name (Ne 1:9).

Nehemiah realized that if the people of God would be restored to their mission to continue the purpose of God, then it was a time for mourning, confession, fasting and prayer. The sincerity of Nehemiah’s prayer for the restoration of Israel was revealed in his mourning and fasting over the past sin of the people. Because of his intense emotional response to the report of the men from Palestine, he took a lead in setting the example for the people to do likewise. His reaction to the report was a call for mourning, fasting and prayer on the part of the people.

Nehemiah realized that he must first lead in mourning and fasting for the people in order to plead with God that restoration occur. Nehemiah’s prayer, therefore, was backed up with the intensity of his fasting. After he had fasted, he prayed,

O Lord, I beseech You, let now Your ear be attentive to the prayer of Your servant and to the prayer of Your servants who desire to fear Your name. And make Your servant prosper today and grant him compassion before this man [the king of Persia] (Ne 1:11).

Results happened in answer to Nehemiah’s fasting and prayer. Nehemiah subsequently was released from his duties as cupbearer to the king in Shushan. He then led a group of repentant captives back to Palestine. Ezra had previously led in restoring captives to the land not long before Nehemiah’s restoration. It was a time in Israel’s history for rejoicing. It was a time of reading from the word of God in the land. But it was also a time for action. Prayer and fasting produce results when those who pray and fast do their part. The theology to pray and fast, and then wait on God to act, is a self-deception. James was right, “Faith without works is dead” (See Js 2:17).

In order to activate the request of their desires, the people gathered together in the land for a special assembly. They called on Ezra to bring and read the law of the Lord (Ne 8:1-3). The people also “assembled with fasting and with sackcloth and dust on them” (Ne 9:1). For one-fourth of the day at this special assembly, Ezra “read in the book of the law of the Lord their God” (Ne 9:3). The people realized that their obedience must be according to the word of God.

The people also realized that their situation in captivity was the result of their fathers’ forsaking the word of God. And now that they were restored to the land, they understood that in order to stay in the land to accomplish the work of God through them, they must stay close to the word of God. Fasting and prayer for restoration can be profitable and sure only when people are driven to the word of God for direction. It is only the word of God that will keep people close to God, and consequently, God close to their desires to work to His glory.

All these events happened in fulfillment of a promise that God made to Israel many years before when they were still in the midst of apostasy in the land. God promised through Isaiah, the prophet at the time, that upon their return to Him, they would be restored from captivity:

Then your light [after captivity] will break out like the dawn and your health will speedily spring forth. And your righteousness will go before you. The glory of the Lord will be your reward. Then you will call and the Lord will answer. You will cry and He will say, "Here I am." (Is 58:8,9).

Because of Nehemiah's righteous leadership, he and the captives saw in their lives the fulfillment of God's promise through Isaiah. In captivity, the people mourned over their sin. They prayed and fasted and the Lord heard. When they were restored to the land, they fasted and prayed in thanksgiving. They made a commitment to stay close to the word of God lest they repeat the apostasy of their fathers.

God had answered their prayer for restoration because they mourned and fasted over their apostasy from

Him. The people, through the leadership of Nehemiah and Ezra, committed themselves never to make the same mistake of turning from the word of God. The sincerity of their commitment was based on the intensity of their prayers and fasting. It could be concluded that their fasting kept them in prayer and their prayer kept them close to the word of God. And when people stay close to the word of God, they stay close to God.

We glean a great deal from the events of this historical account of Nehemiah in reference to the importance of fasting in our lives. Prayer was the communication of the people to God concerning their repentance and desires. But it was fasting that communicated to God the intensity of their requests. Their requests through the communication of prayer was made sincere through their fasting, and by fasting their prayer was made complete.

Through fasting they were able to clearly focus on their goal of rebuilding the wall of the city. We might conclude that the success of their focusing through fasting was that "the wall was finished in the twenty-fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty-two days" (Ne 6:15).

After this period of rebuilding the temple and city of Jerusalem, the Jews rejoiced over God fulfilling His promises. Four new national fasts were announced by Zechariah. The people would fast, and then there would "be joy and gladness and cheerful feasts for the house of Judah" (Zc 8:19; see 7:1-7)

FASTING IN FACE OF CALAMITY

The historical setting for this fast by Mordecai and Esther came as a result of Haman orchestrating a scheme to have all the Jews massacred throughout the Medo-Persian Kingdom.

When Mordecai perceived all that was done [by Haman], he tore his clothes and put on sackcloth with ashes. And he went out into the middle of the city and cried out with a loud and bitter cry (Et 4:1).

What was happening was a potential national calamity for the Jews. They were about to be exterminated from existence. The king's decree to kill all the Jews went throughout the entire Medo-Persian Empire and "there was great mourning among the Jews, and fasting and weeping and wailing" (Et 4:3). When a nation of people are about to suffer a great calamity, it is #### time for national mourning and fasting.

In this case, the Jews were innocent. The calamity was not their making. There was an outside evil that was coming upon them because "of the sum of the money that Haman had promised to pay to the king's treasuries for the Jews in order to destroy them" (Et 4:7).

Queen Esther was informed of the wicked scheme of Haman. Now Esther was in a dilemma. It was the law of the land that no one could approach the king unless he held out the golden scepter so that the one who approached him would live (Et 4:11). But Mordecai exhorted Esther, "Do not think that you will escape in the king's house more than all the Jews" (Et 4:13). Her life, too, was in danger, for she was a Jew. Therefore, it was a time for Esther to risk her own life for her nation. Mordecai encouraged her with the words, "And who knows whether you have come to the kingdom for such a time as this?” (Et 4:14).

Esther’s response to the calamity was heroic. “Go,” she said to Mordecai. “Gather together all the Jews who are present in Shushan, and fast for me. And do not eat or drink three days, night or day” (Et 4:16). Esther would take her life into her own hands by approaching the king without an official invitation. “I will go in to the king that is not according to the law. And if I perish, I perish” (Et 4:16). And she did not. The Jews were saved from an ethnic cleansing at the hand of wicked Haman when the king realized that the genocide scheme was against some of the people of his kingdom, particularly the Queen.

When righteous people rise up and realize that calamity is upon them as a people, it is a time for mourning, fasting and petitions to God. When the decree of the king went throughout the Empire, the Jews knew that they were in trouble. In this case, the people against whom the evil was intended were the people of God. It was an evil scheme of Satan to terminate the fulfillment of the promises that God had made to the fathers concerning the coming of the Redeemer into the world through the Jews. When schemes are engineered on earth to thwart the eternal plans of God, then God’s children must renew their commitment to God, for God is about to act through some unknown manner.

Mordecai knew that the genocide of the Jews could not happen because he knew the promises and plan of God through Israel. For this reason he said to Esther, “For if you hold your peace at this time, then relief and deliverance will arise for the Jews from another place” (Et 4:14). Though we may know the plan of God to act in whatever way He chooses, this is not an excuse to sit by in idleness. It is a time for fasting and praying. For example, God promises to forgive and remember our sins no more. But we still must pray and confess our sins (1 Jn 1:9). Knowledge of the plan of God is no excuse for neglecting fasting and prayer for that which will come. We know that Jesus is coming again. This is certain. However, it is something about which we fast and pray in order that He come now (See 1 Co 16:22; Rv 22:20). We would, therefore, fast and pray for that which the Lord has promised He will do. Fasting and prayer put us on the side of God who will carry out His plans for the redemption of His people.

From the time of Esther until this present day, the Jews initiated, and honor during the Feast of Purim, the Jews’ deliverance from the wicked scheme of Haman. In connection with the Feast of Purim, the Jews first fast to commemorate the fast for which Esther called (Et 4:1-3,15-17). It is an ethnic fast, though in Israel today, it would be a national fast. Such would be a good idea in reference to nations throughout the world who want to restore themselves to God and thank Him for all the deliverances they have had throughout their history.

We can think of no better way to conclude this chapter than with the words of a great American President, Abraham Lincoln. President Lincoln made the following proclamation while the United States was in the throes of a civil war that divided the nation. Senator James Harlan of Iowa, who was the son-in-law of President Lincoln, introduced a unique Resolution in the Senate of the United States on March 2, 1863. A request was made of President Lincoln to proclaim a national day of prayer and fasting for the United States of America during its time of national division. The Resolution was subsequently adopted on March 3rd and was later signed by President Lincoln on March 30th. This was one month before the day of fasting was observed on behalf of the nation. Notice carefully the spiritual language of the Resolution. We wonder if such a Resolution could ever be introduced into the present Senate of the United States.

By the President of the United States of America.

A Proclamation.

Whereas, the Senate of the United States, devoutly recognizing the Supreme Authority and just Government of Almighty God, in all the affairs of men and of nations, has, by a resolution, requested the President to designate and set apart a day of National prayer and humiliation.

And whereas it is the duty of nations as well as of men, to own their dependence upon the overruling power of God, to confess their sins and transgressions, in humble sorrow, yet with assured hope that genuine repentance will lead to mercy and pardon; and to recognize the sublime truth, announced in the Holy Scriptures and proven by all history, that those nations only are blessed whose God is the Lord.

And, inasmuch as we know that, by His divine law, nations like individuals are subjected to punishments and chastisements in this world, may we not justly fear that the awful calamity of civil war, which now desolates the land, may be but a punishment, inflicted upon us, for our presumptuous sins, to the needful end of our national reformation as a whole People? We have been the recipients of the choicest bounties of Heaven. We have been preserved, these many years, in peace and prosperity. We have grown in numbers, wealth and power, as no other nation has ever grown. But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved us in peace, and multiplied and enriched and strengthened us; and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us!

It behooves us then, to humble ourselves before the offended Power, to confess our national sins, and to pray for clemency and forgiveness.

Now, therefore, in compliance with the request, and fully concurring in the views of the Senate, I do, by this my proclamation, designate and set apart Thursday, the 30th day of April, 1863, as a day of national humiliation, fasting and prayer. And I do hereby request all the People to abstain, on that day, from their ordinary secular pursuits, and to unite, at their several places of public worship and their respective homes, in keeping the day holy to the Lord, and devoted to the humble discharge of the religious duties proper to that solemn occasion.

All this being done, in sincerity and truth, let us then rest humbly in the hope authorized by the Divine teachings, that the united cry of the Nation will be heard on high, and answered with blessings, no less than the pardon of our national sins, and the restoration of our now divided and suffering Country, to its former happy condition of unity and peace.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the City of Washington, this thirtieth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty seventh.

By the President: Abraham Lincoln
William H. Seward, Secretary of State

DAVID LEADS THE WAY

Remember when Jesus said, “Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you” (Mt 5:44)? He said that we do this so that we “may be the children of your Father who is in heaven” (Mt 5:45). This is hard. Our resentment seeks to lash out against our enemies with an “eye for an eye” and a “blow for a blow.” But Jesus enjoined on us the attitude that when we are persecuted for doing good, we should respond positively: “Rejoice and be exceedingly glad, for great is your reward in heaven” (Mt 5:12).

David took this one step further. We struggle under the instructions of Jesus to love and pray for our enemies. The carnal side of our humanity seeks to retaliate with equal harm to our enemies. But what if the Holy Spirit called on us not only to pray, but also to fast for our enemies? This is what David, the “man after God’s own heart,” did in response to his enemies. We humbly listen to the Holy Spirit speak to us through David in Psalm 35:

They [David’s enemies] rewarded me evil for good to the sorrow of my soul. But as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth. I humbled my soul with fasting, and my prayer returned to me unanswered. I behaved myself as though he [my enemy] had been my friend or brother. I bowed down heavily as one who mourns for his mother (Ps 35:12-14).

Would we mourn in sackcloth with fasting for those who lash out against us? David turned his enemies over to the Lord through prayer and fasting. “And let the angel of the Lord persecute them” (Ps 35:6). But as for him, he would fast for them as one would fast for his own brother or mother.

In view of one’s struggles through fasting, we find it amazing that David would behave so toward his enemies. It is easy to utter a momentary prayer for an enemy and move on. We comfort ourselves that we have legally satisfied Jesus’ command to pray for our enemies. But with a lingering and prolonged fast, it is not so easy to dismiss our responsibility to “pray for those who persecute us.”

A prayer is for a moment, but a fast is for a prolonged period of time during which one is self-inflicting oneself on behalf of his enemy. In this behavior we realize the longsuffering of God who lingers for us when we go astray from Him. We begin to understand how, not why, “God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son” (Jn 3:16). In fasting for our enemies, we are given a brief glimpse into the longsuffering of God that the Holy Spirit sought to explain through Paul in the following statement: “But God demonstrates His love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rm 5:8).

David was a person who identified himself so much with the character of God that he put himself in the place of God in this world. He sought to be a child of His Father who was in heaven. He wrote, “For the zeal of Your house has eaten me up. And the reproaches of those who reproached You are fallen on me” (Ps 69:9). David was so in tune with God that the unrighteous could not comprehend the spirit and purpose of his fasting. “When I chastened my soul with fasting,” he wrote, “men jeered at me” (Ps 69:10).

In fasting, the righteous will often be ridiculed by the unrighteous today because they do not understand the spiritual purpose for which the righteous fast. If one does not believe this, then try fasting at the time when there is an office party. Try to maintain a fast during a family reunion or during a birthday party.

We have found that it is quite difficult to have a lengthy fast in a world that seems to consider the eating of food on a continual basis a necessary part of connecting socially. The world jeers at the one who would discipline himself in a prolonged fast. There is no respect for the one fasting because those around him are deep into the world. Imagine drinking no coffee at the office for a week. It would be as David said, “I made sackcloth also my garment, and I became a proverb to them” (Ps 69:11).

When in a prolonged fast in these modern times, it will be sometimes as David, who lamentably wrote during his fast for his enemies: “Reproach has broken my heart, and I am full of heaviness. And I look for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none” (Ps 69:20).

Nevertheless, one’s fast must continue if he or she has determined to reconnect with God in deliverance from the foes of this world. We must fast until we feast on the sweet morsels of spiritual energy that flows freely from the throne of our Father. David would walk us through this journey. “My knees are weak through fasting,” He wrote, “and my flesh fails of fatness” (Ps 109:24).

David fasted to the point that his body was manifesting to those around him the loss of weight. This was not a day fast. It was not for two or three days. It was a fast that could be identified by his loss of “fatness” over a long period of time. But in such a fast, one must be prepared for the jeering of the unrighteous. David again wrote, “I have become also a reproach to them [the unrighteous]. When they look on me, they shake their heads” (Ps 109:25).

There may be times in our lives when we should fast to the point that unbelievers shake their heads concerning what we are doing to ourselves. At least this was what David did. Our unbelieving friends will never understand why we would go on a fast to the point that our bodies would show a tremendous loss of weight. The non-spiritual have no idea what the spiritual are trying to accomplish through fasting. If there were a time when the spiritual are not on the same page as the non-spiritual, it is in the realm of fasting.

Fasting by the spiritual proclaims to the world that our Father reigns in our lives. The one who fasts, however, must not put on a show of their fasting as the hypocrites. Jesus said of them, “Do not look gloomy as the hypocrites, for they disfigure their faces so that they may appear to men to be fasting” (Mt 6:16). The righteous must wash and cloth themselves in an ordinary manner in order to manifest to the world that their fast is inward, not outward (Mt 5:17,18). Fasting is never to be for the purpose of manifesting one’s self before the world, lest the purpose for fasting be defeated.

It is interesting to note what David concluded should be one of the outcomes of a prolonged fast: “So that they may know that this is Your hand, that You, Lord, have done it” (Ps 109:27). We would fast until the unbeliever comes to the conclusion that we fast in order to reconnect with our Father in heaven.

THE FAST OF FAITH

There are three types of fasting that are mentioned in the Bible: (1) Fasting without food and water, (2) Fasting from food only, and (3) Fasting from specific foods. All fasting in the Bible involved going without food. In the case of Daniel, the third fasting characterized his eating habits at a particular time in his life when he realized that God’s promises of Israel’s restoration were coming to fulfillment.

The first mention of Daniel’s fasting in reference to the fulfillment of God’s promise to restore Israel took place in the first year of Darius, “who was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans” (Dn 9:1). It was at this time that Daniel ...

... understood by scrolls the number of the years revealed as the word of the Lord to Jeremiah the prophet, that He would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem (Dn 9:2).

Daniel understood that the end of the seventy years of captivity were coming to a close. He understood that it was now time that the people of God be restored to the land of promise in fulfillment of the prophecy that was made by Jeremiah (See Jr 25). It was a glorious realization to know that Israel was going to be nationalized again in their homeland of Palestine. The response of Daniel to the fulfillment of Jeremiah’s prophecy moved him to prayer, supplications and fasting: “Then I set my face toward the Lord God to make requests by prayer and supplications, with fasting and sackcloth and ashes” (Dn 9:3).

Though Daniel knew that God would bring about the fulfillment of what He had promised, he still prayed and fasted. Sometimes fasting is for the purpose of giving thanks to God for fulfilling His promises.

Daniel’s prayers and fasting, however, were based on his confession of the sins of the people of God for what led to their captivity. “We have sinned and have committed iniquity,” he prayed. “And we have done wickedly and have rebelled, even by departing from Your precepts and from Your judgments” (Dn 9:5). He continued, “Neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God to walk in His laws that He set before us by His servants the prophets” (Dn 9:10).

As many other prophets who realized that the apostate state of God’s people resulted from the turn of the people from the commandments of God, Daniel responded with mourning, prayer and fasting (See 1 Sm 31:13; 2 Sm 1:12; 3:35; Ne 1:4; Ps 35:13,14). His mourning, prayer and fasting for joy was first introduced, as other prophets, with a confession of sins on behalf of the people (See 1 Sm 7:6; 1 Kg 21:27; Ne 9:1,2; Jh 3:5-8). Daniel, as other prophets, first sought to humble himself through fasting, and then, in this case rejoice over God’s promise to restore His people to the land of promise (See Er 8:21; Ps 69:10).

In cases of rebellion against God’s word, prayer and fasting must be based on a true confession that one has rebelled against God. Unless one is willing to restore his life to obedience of the word of God, all prayers and fasting to be restored to God are in vain. The greatness of Daniel was that his prayers and fasting were in view of the fact that the nation of Israel must first return to God by returning to the law of God. Fruitful fasting is founded upon this realization: “Yes, all Israel has transgressed Your law, even by departing, that they might not obey Your voice” (Dn 9:11).

God yearns for the repentance of His people. In Israel’s case, the people were to fast, weep and mourn over their rebellion. When Israel was in rebellion before the captivity, the Lord pleaded with them: “Now, therefore,’ says the Lord, ‘Turn to Me with all your heart, and with fasting and with weeping and with mourning’” (Jl 2:12). In captivity, this is exactly what Daniel did for the people. His mourning over their previous rebellion, combined with prayer and fasting, revealed the sincerity of the repentance of the people. When one realizes that he has strayed from the word of God, it is a time for prayer and fasting. If one seeks to secure the help of God to be delivered from the despair of the world, it is a time for prayer and fasting (See Ex 34:28; Dt 9:9; 2 Sm 12:16-23; 2 Ch 20:3,4; Er 8:21-23).

People who rebel against the word of God are unprofitable. This was the problem with Israel before they found themselves in captivity for seventy years. Daniel wrote, “Yet we have not made our prayer before the Lord our God so that we might turn from our iniquities and understand Your truth” (Dn 9:13). Before the captivity, the people fasted, but they sought to live in rebellion to the righteousness of God. Isaiah wrote of their state of rebellion:

“Why have we fasted,” they say, “and You [God] do not see? Why have we afflicted our soul and You do not acknowledge it?” Behold, in the day of your fast you find pleasure and exploit all your laborers. Behold, you fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness. You will not fast as you do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high (Is 58:3,4).

If one is not willing to turn from his way of iniquity, his fasting will be in vain. God will not hear the voice of one’s prayer. The purpose of the fasting of the wayward, therefore, should first restore him to the word of God (See Is 58:5-12; Jr 14:11,12; Zc 7,8). There is no profit in fasting if one refuses to be led in belief and behavior by the word of God.

People who are not students of the word of God are people who pray and fast in vain. One cannot pray about where to go unless he follows the road map of God’s word. Before fruitful prayer and fasting begin, therefore, there must be a commitment to follow the will of God. Before we begin our prayers and fasting, we must open the word of God in order that we not be following after our own desires. When prayers and fasting are combined with one’s study of the word of God, then the fasting reveals the sincerity of the repentant.

In the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia, God sent another message to Daniel. The message was one of “great conflict” that was to come in the future of Israel after they were restored to the land (Dn 10:1). It would not be a conflict that they would bring upon themselves, but a conflict that would prevail between the nations that surrounded Israel. The Jews would suffer as a result of the wicked foreign rulers of Egypt and Syria who struggled for power over Palestine before the Roman Empire brought peace to the land.

Daniel understood the message of conflict, and because he did, he began to mourn and fast, which mourning and fasting continued for three weeks (Dn 10:2). Daniel later wrote of this period, “I ate no delicacies, nor did meat or wine come into my mouth” (Dn 10:3). This was a fast for three weeks from specific foods.

What is interesting about this time of mourning and fasting is that Daniel fasted and prayed by faith. There was no answer from God. But “in the twenty-fourth day of the first month” Daniel saw a vision (Dn 10:4-6). God finally showed up with an answer to Daniel’s prayer and fasting. For three weeks, therefore, Daniel had prayed and fasted in faith that God would reveal something.

In answer to his prayer and fasting, God sent a vision that was so overpowering that there was no strength left in Daniel (Dn 10:8). Daniel wrote, “For my natural color turned to a deathly pallor, and I retained no strength” (Dn 10:8). “And when I heard the voice of his words, I fell unconscious with my face to the ground” (Dn 10:9). It was a “powerful” vision in the sense that Daniel was physically affected. God need not answer our prayers and fasting with a vision as He did Daniel. But our reconnecting with Him through fasting can be quite powerful.

What is significant about this event in the life of Daniel was the result of Daniel having committed himself to prayer and fasting in faith on behalf of God’s people. Nothing had happened from his initial prayers and fasting from the first of the month. But on the twenty-fourth day the vision came that was an answer to his prayers. Daniel 10:12 is significant in reference to this period of God’s silence throughout the days of Daniel’s prayers and fasting. God encouraged Daniel,

Do not fear, Daniel, for from the first day that you set your heart to understand and to discipline yourself [through fasting] before your God, your words were heard and I have come in response to your words (Dn 10:12).

And how powerful is that. God listens to those who offer their prayers and supplications that are offered to Him on an empty stomach. It took three weeks of fasting before an answer came, but it eventually came. What is important to remember is that when we start praying and fasting God starts to work, though we might not realize His work in our lives until much later. But He will come when we pray according to His will. God started to act upon Daniel’s requests on the first day of his fast, but did not show up until the twenty-fourth day of the month.

God does not work on our time line in reference to our fasting. Fasting that is combined with prayer is always a walk of faith. However, we must remember that simply because we fast and pray does not mean that God will give the answer that we expect of Him. James exhorted the one who expected God to answer every prayer: “For that man ought not to expect that he will receive anything from the Lord” (Js 1:7). Prayer and fasting do not obligate God. We are not as the ancient Greeks who created gods after their own imagination, which gods could be manipulated by the whims of the worshippers.

The prayer of faith that is according to the word of God will avail much. But foolish prayers for material blessings should not be uttered in order to obligate God to satisfy our carnal desires. “A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways” (Js 1:8). Those who try to focus on the carnal things of this world, while at the same time they seek to live spiritual lives, will find that their prayers for carnal things will go unanswered.

Fasting reveals that one is seeking to keep his or her mind focused on the spiritual. Fasting reenergizes the spiritual part of man. It rejuvenates the spirit by suppressing the carnal. And in this transforming experience our minds are turned from the carnal to the spiritual. If one fasts for spiritual strength, but at the same time prays for carnal things, then the contradiction will annul God’s answer.

TRANSITION TO THE NEW COVENANT

From this point on in our study we seek to look into the fasting behavior of Jesus and the early disciples. Fasting was a part of the religious behavior of those who lived under the Sinai covenant that God established with Israel. There were national fasts, specifically in reference to the Day of Atonement (Lv 16:29,31; 23:27-32; Nm 29:7; see At 27:9). There were also many individual fasts (Jg 20:26; 2 Sm 12:22; Ne 1:4; Dn 9:3; Jl 1:14). But other than the national fasts in reference to the Day of Atonement, and the four fasts initiated after the reconstruction of the temple and city after the captivity, there is little evidence of Jesus fasting during His ministry. In fact, He was accused of not regularly fasting on a personal basis as the established religious leadership of the time. His opponents accused, “The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, ‘Behold, a gluttonous man and a winebibber’” (Mt 11:19; see Lk 7:34).

This statement should be understood in the context of the fasting of the self-righteous behavior of those who were making the accusation. The Pharisees fasted twice a week on every Monday and Thursday (Lk 18:12). Since Jesus ate His food as others, their accusation against Jesus would have been that He was not living up to the standard that they had set for themselves as religious leaders concerning the behavior of a “rabbi.”

At the beginning of His ministry, it is stated, “Now when He had fasted forty days and forty nights, He then became hungry” (Mt 4:2). We assume that this was a voluntary fast because Jesus voluntarily went to the wilderness where there was little food. But we must also consider that this “fasting” was involuntary simply because there was little food in the wilderness. This may have also been the situation with Moses (Ex 34:28) and Elijah (1 Kg 19:8), who also “fasted” in the wilderness.

The word “fast” is also used in the New Testament in reference to involuntary fasting, that is, going without food simply because of the circumstances in which one found himself. When Paul spoke of his hardships in preaching the gospel, he spoke of being “in weariness and hardship, in sleeplessness often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness” (2 Co 11:27). “Fastings” in this context would have been voluntary only indirectly in the sense that Paul voluntarily dedicated himself to the preaching of the gospel (See At 14:22). His going without food (fasting) on many occasions would have been involuntary. Such could also have been the case when he mentioned “fastings” in the context of 2 Corinthians 6:4-7.

There is questionable manuscript evidence for the word “fast” to be retained in four scriptures in the New Testament (See Mt 17:21; Mk 9:29; At 10:30; 1 Co 7:5). Later versions of the Bible rejected the inclusion of the word in these texts because of weak manuscript evidence. However, the fact that the word “fast” was included in these texts indicates that fasting was a vital part of the behavior of some Christians in the early centuries when the manuscripts were produced.

Jesus’ ministry was to the Jews who lived under the Sinai law, and before the institution of His new covenant with His disciples after the cross. During His ministry of teaching, He dwelt on the subject of fasting only twice (See Mt 6:16-18; 9:14-17). In fact, there are only four references to fasting in the New Testament era that would be indisputable references to voluntary fasting by Christians. Two were mentioned by Jesus, and two in the book of Acts that refer to the behavior of the disciples (At 13:1-3; 14:23).

Some might wonder why there is less emphasis in the New Testament by Christians on fasting than with the Jews under the Sinai covenant. This may be easier to understand than first thought. For example, consider the annual fast that was required in reference to the Day of Atonement (Lv 16:29,31; 23:27-32; Nm 29:7). This was a national voluntary fast that was held in conjunction with the remembrance of sins by people as a nation. But in reference to the redemption that Christians enjoy under the grace of God after the cross, consider the annulling of this fast in reference to the following statement in the book of Hebrews:

“... who [Jesus Christ] does not need daily as those high priests [under the Sinai covenant], to offer up sacrifice, first for His own sins, and then for the people’s, for this He [Jesus] did once for all when He offered up Himself (Hb 7:27).

And again: “By this will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all” (Hb 10:10).

Jesus was the termination of the Day of Atonement when He offered up Himself for all our sins. This was the meaning of what Paul wrote: “You also became dead to the law through the body of Christ” (Rm 7:4). There need be no more offerings for sin, and thus, there need be no more fasting on the Day of Atonement, for the Day of Atonement was annulled by the redemption of Christ on the cross (See Rm 7:1-4).

When the temple and city of Jerusalem were reconstructed after the captivity, God instituted fasts of thanksgiving in reference to the feast of rejoicing over God’s fulfillment of His promise to rebuild the temple and city after the captivity (Zc 8:19). The church is now the temple of God (1 Co 3:16; 1 Tm 3:15). There is no longer any physical temple of God, for the disciples are the temple. Therefore, there are no longer any fasts in reference to any physical temple of God. And just in case some Jewish Christians might forget this, God destroyed the temple and Jerusalem in A.D. 70 through His proxy judgment of the Roman Empire. Christians are not obligated to fast in reference to any physical things of this world.

All national fasts in reference to Esther and the feast of Purim are no longer applicable. Paul reminded all Christians, especially Jewish Christians, “There is neither Jew nor Greek” when discussing the present temple of God (Gl 3:28). “For you are all one in Christ Jesus” (Gl 3:28). Physical Israel no longer exists as a chosen people to bring the Messiah and Savior into the world. The Savior has arrived, and thus the vehicle through whom God brought the Savior into the world, national Israel, was no longer needed. God has fulfilled His promises to the Jewish fathers (Lk 24:44; Jn 19:28-30; 2 Co

1:20). The blessing through the seed of Abraham has been fulfilled (Gn 12:1-4). We have been delivered spiritually from the bondage of sin by the cross of Christ, and thus the vehicle of national Israel through which the Savior was brought into the world was dissolved in Christ.

All national fasts of Israel have now been dissolved. They are not binding on Christians today. Fasts of the Old Testament that were individual and voluntary are now only an example for us today. Those fasts that were voluntary and individual, as David's for his son, Daniel's and Esther's for the nation of Israel, and Nehemiah's for the reconstruction of the city of Jerusalem, were individual fasts that were characteristic of their lives for specific purposes. However, the purposes for which they fasted are long gone. These individual and voluntary fasts are a good example for us today. "For whatever things were written before were written for our learning ..." (Rm 15:4). It is not wrong to refer to the fasts of the Old Testament heroes as an example for fasting today. However, we must keep in mind that their fasts are only an example for us today. Their example is not a mandate that Christians should fast today.

The fulfillment of the promises of God in Jesus was the end of those fasts that were held in conjunction with the coming of the Savior. Fasts that were enjoined on the Jews as a special covenanted people with God at Mt. Sinai are also gone because God dissolved Israel in the church.

When we work our way into the New Testament, we must keep in mind that Matthew, Mark, Luke and John are recorded histories of Jesus' ministry to the Jews in order to bring them to Him as the Messiah and Savior of the world. These books are actually Old Testament books, for Jesus, and the Jews to whom He ministered, were living under the Sinai law. When Jesus speaks of fasting in these books, we must keep this in mind. This brings us first, therefore, to the fasting of the aged woman Anna at the temple. Her's was an individual and voluntary fast in reference to the coming of the Messiah.

THE MINISTRY OF FASTING

Now there was one, Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher. She was of a great age and had lived with a husband seven years from her marriage. And she was a widow of about eighty-four years. She did not depart from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day (Lk 2:36,37).

Anna, as the other Jews who were contemporary with her, lived under the Sinai covenant and law. She was aware of the prophecies concerning the coming Messiah and that these prophecies were nigh unto being fulfilled. All the Jews sensed that the fullness of time was upon them, and thus, she too prayed and fasted in order to encourage God to bring forth the Messiah and "the redemption of Israel" (See Gl 4:4,5).

It is significant to note that Anna was of one of the tribes of the northern ten tribes of Israel who were formerly taken into Assyrian captivity in 722/721 B.C. In fulfillment of the promise of God to return a repentant remnant to Palestine, Cyrus of Persia released captives of all twelve tribes of Israel in 536 B.C. As a result of the decree by Cyrus, some of the ancestors of Anna had returned to Palestine with either Zerubbabel, Ezra or Nehemiah. Therefore, a remnant of the tribe of Asher, as well as a remnant of all twelve tribes of Israel, were at the time of the coming of the Messiah, in Palestine and waiting for the fulfillment of God's promise of a new covenant. Anna, as well as all Jews, realized that the return of the remnant of Israel would signal the beginning of the fulfillment of the prophecies that related to the coming of the Messiah.

Once the repentant remnant was restored, God promised that He would establish a new covenant with His people. This covenant would include all nations (See Jr 31:31-34). At the time Anna was fasting and praying, the restored remnant was also fasting and praying for the coming of the Messiah of Israel who would deliver the people from the oppression of Roman occupation. The coming of the Messiah meant freedom for all Israel, though the Jews did not understand what this freedom entailed. Because most Jews were looking for a physical redemption, instead of a spiritual redemption, they had a difficult time understanding the true meaning of the promise of the "redemption of Israel."

Depending on the translation of verse 36, Anna was either a widow unto her age of eighty-four, or she had been a widow for eighty-four years, thus making her at this time in her life an aged woman of ninety-one years. Regardless of our understanding of her age, it is evident that she was an aged woman who had given herself to prayer and fasting at the temple in reference to the hope of Israel. Hope for the redemption of Israel was the impetus for her prayers and fasting.

The text says that Anna “served God with fastings and prayers night and day” (Lk 2:37). She had thus given herself to a specific ministry for the Lord. It was a ministry that aged believers could do. According to this statement, fasting is a service (ministry) to God. Older brothers and sisters who cannot give themselves to the physical demands of some ministries, can at least give themselves to the ministry of fasting and praying. This is a ministry that older brothers and sisters can do on behalf of those who are engaged in conflicts with the forces of evil throughout the world. In other words, write a world evangelist and tell him that you are fasting and praying for the success of his efforts.

Faithful Jews came to Jerusalem every year for the annual Passover and Pentecost. When they came, there was a great deal of discussion concerning the coming of the Messiah. All Jews who came to Jerusalem were looking for the “redemption of Israel,” that is, that Israel would be restored to her former glory as an independent state. Though their ambitions were wrong, these faithful Jews were living in anticipation of something to come. They did not understand all the implications of the “redemption of Israel.” Nevertheless, they prayed and fasted in order that God fulfill His promise. We do not believe that Anna was unique in her ministry of praying and fasting for a future that she did not completely understand.

It was a common hope among the oppressed Jews that God would eventually bring forth the Messiah in order that the Jews be delivered from the occupation of foreign powers, which in this case was the Roman Empire. Even Jesus’ immediate disciples had this hope (See At 1:6). Though their hope was in reference to physical nationalism, our hope as Christians is in view of being delivered from this physical world. Our fasting and prayer today would be for the coming of Jesus to deliver us from this world of struggle (See Rv 22:20). And though we do not understand all that will transpire when Jesus comes, we hope and pray and fast for His coming.

Whenever God promised something in the future of His people, He never gave all the details of what was coming. Therefore, His people have always hoped for that which was promised, but also, they had anticipation about that for which they hoped. We do not have to understand completely that for which we hope.

There was purpose in the prayers and fasting of Anna. We would glean from her ministry that in our prayers and fasting that there must also be purpose. In the case of Anna, she knew the promises of the prophets in reference to the coming of the Messiah. A similar purpose would be applicable to Christians today in reference to the coming of Jesus. We know the promise of Jesus that He will come again. To the apostles, and to the rest of us, Jesus promised, “I will come again and receive you to Myself, so that where I am, there you may be also” (Jn 14:3). And He will come again (1 Th 4:13-18; 2 Th 1:6-9). In view of this promise, both Paul and John urged Jesus to come even in their lifetime in the first century, though it is more likely that their prayer for the immediate coming of Jesus was that He come “in time” in judgment on the persecuting Jews, and later, the Romans (See 1 Co 16:22; Rv 22:20). But we should do the same in reference to Jesus’ final coming. Though Jesus may not come until after we die, as He did not come in time until both Paul and John died, He will come. Anna had no assurance that the Messiah would come in her lifetime. Neither are we assured that Jesus will come in our lifetime.

If Anna prayed and fasted that the Son of God come in the flesh as the Messiah of Israel in her lifetime, then certainly it would be a time for aged brothers and sisters today to pray and fast that Jesus come again, though He may not come until after we are dead. Our prayers may not always coincide with God’s calendar of events.

After we once preached a sermon several years ago on the final coming of Christ, an aged sister came up and said, “I am not sure I can pray for Jesus to come again right now. There are some things in my life I would like to get straightened out first.”

It is always a time to pray, with fasting, that Jesus hurry up with His program to come again. If we do not have things straightened out in our lives, then it is a time for prayer and fasting in reference to our repentance. Anna believed that her fasting would lay her prayers before God to bring the Messiah into the world in her lifetime. This aged woman had no promise that she would be alive when the promise was fulfilled. Nevertheless, she continued to fast and pray. It would be a good ministry to do the same today that Jesus come again to bring our hopes into reality. It is not necessary to know God’s calendar of fulfilling promises in order to pray for the fulfillment of His promises.

Jesus will certainly be coming in order to deliver us from this world of trials and tribulations. Who would not want this? Unfortunately, it is a manifestation of our love for this present world that hinders our prayers and fasting in reference to the termination of this world. Our love for the shopping mall often supersedes our love for the new order that Jesus promised He would bring. The fact that we enjoy this world too much is evidence of our lack of prayer for the realization of what Jesus will bring. We must ask ourselves, when was the last time we came into fellowship with the hope of Paul and John who urged Jesus to come quickly?

Paul and John made their requests over two thousand years ago. They did not know, as we know today, that Jesus would not come for over two thousand years after they died. Nevertheless, they made their requests by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, for the requests were recorded in inspired literature. The Holy Spirit did not deceive them into believing that Jesus would come in His final coming in their lifetime. However, Jesus did come in time in judgment on the persecuting Jews, and eventually, the Romans. Their prayer for the “coming” of Jesus was answered.

We have an advantage over Paul and John today in reference to the final coming of Jesus. We know that our redemption from this world is closer today than it was when they lived. It would be reasonable to conclude, therefore, that we should be urging the Lord through prayer and fasting that He come in His final coming in order to deliver us out of this world of trials and persecution. How bad will things have to become in this world in order to drive us to prayer and fasting for Jesus to come and deliver us? Are we too comfortable with this world to urge Jesus to come and disturb us?

At the time of Anna, all the Jews were suffering under the oppression of Roman occupation. It was surely the stifling of their freedoms that compelled them to pray and fast for deliverance. Since freedom is the ultimate impetus to drive us to yearn for deliverance, maybe our prayer and fasting for the “redemption of the church” into eternal glory will happen only when we lose either our freedoms.

In the context of Luke 21, Jesus was speaking specifically of the redemption of the church from Jewish persecution when He would come in time in judgment on Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Jesus came in time in judgment on Jerusalem in order to deliver His people from Jewish persecution. He did the same in reference to the Roman Empire. He will do the same for His people at the end of time in His final coming. The following statement that He made in reference to His coming in judgment on Jerusalem in A.D. 70 would illustrate what He will do for His people when He comes in His final coming:

And then they will see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And when these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads, for your redemption draws nigh (Lk 21:27,28).

And for this we would pray and fast in reference to Jesus coming again for our deliverance from the oppression of this world. Yes, we would sit beside Anna in the ministry of prayer and fasting that the Son of God show up before the calendar of our life runs out.

FASTING TO FOCUS

Then Jesus was led up by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted by the devil. Now when He had fasted forty days and forty nights, He then became hungry. Now when the tempter came to Him, he said, “If You are the Son of God, command that these stones become bread” (Mt 4:1-3; see Mk 1:12,13; Lk 4:1-13).

As previously suggested, this may have been a somewhat involuntary fast on the part of Jesus because He was in a wilderness where there was no food. However, He knew the environmental circumstances of the wilderness. He knew that there would be no food and little water. He thus voluntarily allowed the Spirit to lead Him to the wilderness where there was no food. Jesus voluntarily placed Himself in an environment where He had to fast for forty days and nights in preparation for His ministry.

When God starts great movements among men on earth, His messengers are often called to a wilderness to fast. Moses, Elijah, Jesus and Paul all went to the desert before going to the people. In the case of Jesus, it was God’s will that He be placed in an environment that would present the opportunity for Him to be tempted in all ways as those He would save (Hb 4:15). In fact, the text says that the Spirit led him to the wilderness “to be tempted by the devil.” He was thus led to the desert in order to fast forty days, which fasting was followed by the temptations of Satan. This occasion of fasting on the part of Jesus was meant to be more than going without food. It was to place Him in a physically weak state where He would be most vulnerable to temptation.

Matthew mentions that the Holy Spirit came upon

Jesus at His baptism that preceded His time in the wilderness (Mt 3:16). Luke recorded, “And Jesus, being full of the Holy Spirit, returned from the Jordan and was led by the Spirit into the wilderness” (Lk 4:1). At His baptism, He had received the miraculous power of the Spirit in order to manifest the works of the Father throughout His ministry. However, being filled with the Spirit did not guard Him from yielding to the temptations of the devil. Neither did He use His power to create fish and bread when He became hungry during His fast (See Mt 14:13-21).

Matthew emphasizes the fact that Jesus was led to the wilderness specifically for a period of fasting. Our fasting must be specific. In fasting one is able to focus specifically on what is set before him. Because we know that fasting aids in our mental processes to focus clearly on what is before us, we would assume that Jesus’ time in the wilderness was for the purpose of focusing on the purpose for which He came into the world. “I do not seek My own will,” He said to His disciples, “but the will of the Father who sent Me” (Jn 5:30). On another occasion Jesus said, “For I came down from heaven, not to do My own will, but the will of Him who sent Me” (Jn 6:38). We would assume that one reason why Jesus allowed Himself to be led into the wilderness was to focus on His destiny. These forty days of fasting were the initiation to begin His ministry that would conclude with the cross.

If fasting helped Jesus to focus on the will and work of the Father through Him, then we would conclude that fasting would accomplish the same in our own lives. We sometimes have a difficult time determining what we should do in our ministry for the Lord. This is the time for fasting. Through fasting our thinking becomes clear and focused. If we feel that in our ministry we have come to a dead end, then it is time to end our food intake. Before He started His ministry, Jesus wanted to focus clearly on the purpose for which He was sent into the world. He came “to save the world” (Jn 12:47). He thus allowed Satan the opportunity to dissuade Him from this destiny.

If we have lost our way, or forgotten our purpose as a disciple of Jesus, then it is a time for fasting. It is a time to go into a wilderness place in order to remind ourselves of our destiny for Jesus as His disciple. What is significant about this fast of Jesus was that He went to a place where He could be alone. He stayed there alone for a long time in order to prepare Himself for what lay ahead.

For spiritual growth, and refocusing our lives, there is no experience like the experience of a prolonged fast in a wilderness place. In a social world where people feel almost afraid to be alone, fasting alone in a wilderness place is an opportunity to reconnect directly with God without the aid of someone else. In the mission of Jesus to the cross, He would lead alone. His disciples would be with Him on the pathways of Palestine. But when it came to the final journey of His mission to the cross, all His disciples would forsake Him. Fasting in the wilderness is an opportunity to discover what it is like to be alone with God.

Many people fast while carrying on with their regular schedule and with their fellow acquaintances. This is the normal environment in which most people fast. But the challenge with this environment of fasting is that we are often distracted from the One on whom we are to be focusing when we are fasting. Fasting in a wilderness place is for the purpose of not being distracted by friends and family. We remember one time when we secluded ourselves alone for three days in the desert in order to think clearly concerning a challenging mission that was set before us. After the three days in the desert, we had the opportunity for a reality check, and thus re-evaluated clearly what God would have us do in our ministry to His glory. Even if one does not fast in a wilderness place, being in such a place with God alone helps one to clarify his or her destiny.

There is no experience like being alone with God in a desert. It is a spiritually exhilarating experience. When all distractions are alleviated from one’s thinking and environment, the task of focusing on an objective is easier. In a modern urban life, such environments for fasting are quite difficult to find. But if one does have the opportunity to fast in the wilderness, it will be a memorial experience that will change one’s life.

In the case of Jesus’ fasting in the wilderness, the text says that He became hungry. Satan came to Him at a time when He was weakest. One must keep in mind, therefore, that when fasting, Satan will seek to stop one’s fast with the temptation of food. Satan will seek to take our minds off that for which we are fasting and place it on the physical craving for food.

We must not think that Satan does not know the spiritual benefits of fasting. Therefore, we must keep in mind that the purpose for fasting is to focus on our spiritual goals, not on our physical needs. In fasting we are disciplining our minds to focus on that which is greater than the physical. In order to accomplish the goals of our fast, it is good to set a specific number of days or time of fasting. One of the first goals to accomplish in fasting is to fulfill one’s determined goal for his or her time of fast.

Jesus went without food for forty consecutive days and nights. Moses did the same (Ex 34:28), as well as Elijah (1 Kg 19:8). We are not told why Jesus fasted specifically for forty days and forty nights, unless there is some significance to the forty years the nation of Israel wandered in the wilderness of Sinai because of their refusal to immediately conquer the land of promise. It may be that the significance is only in the length of time. Regardless of the reason for the forty days, Jesus evidently had set a goal for the time He would fast.

One can physically go without water at the most for three or four days, and without food for about six weeks, depending on one's body mass. But in each situation, one cannot carry on with the normal place of life during a prolonged fast. Jesus was not in a situation where He maintained an active schedule during His forty days of fasting. The text says that He went only without food during this time, though water may have been limited in the wilderness.

Because Jesus was vulnerable during and immediately after His days of fasting, Satan continually tempted Him in order to make Him turn from both His fasting and the destiny of His ministry (Mk 1:13). It was at the end of His fasting that Jesus would be most vulnerable to any temptation. In the same manner as he tempted Eve in the garden of Eden (Gn 3), Satan tempted Jesus after the lust of the eyes and flesh, and the pride of life (1 Jn 2:16). However, even at this time when Jesus would have been most vulnerable to yield to temptation, He did not give in to the lure of Satan's temptations. At the end of His fasting, He was clearly focused on His destiny, and thus, Satan had no chance of changing Jesus' walk to the cross.

One of the purposes for fasting is to place one in a vulnerable situation in reference to the lust of the flesh. If one can prove to himself that he can conquer the lust of the flesh for a determined period of time, then one gains great confidence by the disciplining of the body. It is food that is often our worst enemy in destroying our self-discipline. And thus one of the serendipitous results of fasting is that we become more disciplined in controlling the intake of food. We become more reassured that we are in control of our physical and spiritual being.

“WHEN YOU FAST”

Moreover, when you fast, do not look gloomy as the hypocrites, for they disfigure their faces so that they may appear to men to be fasting. Truly I say to you, they have their reward. But you, when you fast, anoint your head and wash your face, so that you do not appear to men to be fasting, but to your Father who is in secret. And your Father who sees in secret will reward you (Mt 6:16-18).

These were the first words that Jesus spoke concerning fasting during His ministry. At the time, fasting was a common practice among the religious leaders of the Jewish culture, and thus, it was only natural that He would explain fasting in reference to the disciples' response to His lordship in their lives. And since it was common for all religious leaders to lead in the behavior of fasting, there would later come some complaints as to why Jesus' disciples did not fast during His ministry (See Mt 9:14,15). But in the Sermon on the Mount in this context, Jesus wanted to establish some behavioral principles that should later characterize the fasting of His disciples.

The statements that Jesus made here in reference to fasting should be considered in the context of His introductory statement concerning prayer that He previously made in the text: “And when you pray ...” (Mt 5:5). Jesus assumed that His disciples would pray. Prayer would be a part of their lives as His disciples. It was not “if” they prayed, but “when” they prayed. They would be a discipleship that continued to lay their requests before God (1 Th 5:17). There was no need, therefore, to command prayer, as there was no need to command fasting. It was simply something that His disciples would do as His disciples.

With almost the same statement that Jesus used to introduce prayer, He also introduced fasting: “Moreover, when you fast ....” It was not “if” the disciples would fast, but “when” they would fast. Jesus assumed that His disciples would in the future fast as a part of their discipleship. Fasting would be the natural response of those who would respond to His lordship.

Since this specific teaching of Jesus on fasting took place early in His ministry, we must assume that His disciples were somewhat confused concerning the traditional manner of fasting that was common among religious leaders. The religious leaders had established a traditional schedule and manner of fasting. The Pharisees fasted twice a week, once on Monday and again on Thursday (Lk 18:12). They had also established an outward appearance of fasting that would identify to the public that they were in a fast. Jesus explained that they “disfigure their faces so that they many appear to men to be fasting” (Mt 6:16). We would assume, therefore, that Jesus gave His instructions on fasting in this context in view of the concern of some among His disciples who saw the hypocrisy of the religious leaders in their fasting.

Since fasting would be the natural response of those who would seek to depend on God’s work in their lives, then Jesus in this context seeks to enjoin on His disciples some simple instructions concerning fasting. The Jewish religious leadership often let their hair go uncut when they had lengthy fast. They would put ashes on their heads and show a disfigured face in order to be publicly identified to be in a fast. But none of this behavior would be characteristic of His disciples when they were in a fast.

The contemporary religious leaders’ emphasis on fasting was not primarily to plea for God to work in their lives, but to manifest the meritorious performance of fasting as a religious rite. By an outward show they sought to lead the people to fast regularly. However, by fasting in such a manner, and for such purposes, the only reward they received for their fasting was the praise of men. Their outward show in fasting nullified God’s response to their requests. They were perceived by the public to be spiritually minded because they put on a “fasting show.” What they forgot was that in fasting one must focus on the inner self, not on an outward portrayal of a legal code of religiosity. They nullified the purpose for fasting by their theatrical performances in fasting.

One fasts in order to take his or her mind off the physical needs of the body in order to focus on the spiritual needs of the inner man. When the outward man has continuously overindulged in food, it is time for the inner man to overindulge in the spiritual. Obsessive eaters have need of obsessive fasting in order to readjust their thinking from focusing on the physical to focusing on the spiritual. But in this transition of focus, fasting must never become a show time performance. Therefore, Jesus instructed His disciples in their fasts, “Anoint your head and wash your face” (Mt 6:17).

It is not the desire of the disciples of Jesus to fast meritoriously, nor to fast in order to draw attention to one’s performance of religious rites. In fasting one focuses on the inner man in order to reconnect this man with God. By concentrating on the inner spiritual part of man, the disciples of Jesus should give no outward indication of their struggle to reconnect with God through fasting. The purpose of fasting is to humble oneself inwardly before God in order to call on God to work in his or her life.

The fact that one was not to give an outward appearance of fasting indicates that one can fast during his normal function of life. He or she does not have to go to a desert place, but can carry on with a normal life while fasting. At least this seems to be what Anna was doing at the temple. The only time others would know that he or she is fasting is when he or she allows the food tray to pass.

It is noteworthy that Anna fasted in a public place at the temple. But there seems to be no indication that she put on any intentional show of her fasting. Everyone simply knew that this was her personal ministry in reference to the coming of the Messiah. We assume also that she was not the only one fasting and praying for the coming of the Messiah. It is not wrong to inform others that one is in a fast. It is pretentious, however, to expect others to give one glory for his or her fast.

In the statement, “so that you do not appear to men to be fasting,” means that our fasting should be in secret, and thus seen only by our “Father who is in secret” (Mt 6:18). If there is any showmanship before men in fasting, then we defeat the very purpose for our fast. If we focus on some outward appearance in order to manifest the conviction of our fasting, then the purpose of “afflicting our soul” through fasting is defeated. The disciples of Jesus seek only to be noticed by their heavenly Father. In fasting, therefore, they seek to call the attention of their Father to focus on their pleas.

FASTING IN ANTICIPATION

Then the disciples of John came to Him [Jesus], saying, “Why do we and the Pharisees fast, but Your disciples do not fast?” And Jesus said to them, “Can the attendants of the bridegroom mourn as long as the bridegroom is with them? But the days will come when the bridegroom will be taken from them, and then they will fast (Mt 9:14,15; see Mk 2:18-22; Lk 5:33-39).

This is the second time Jesus dealt with the subject of fasting. In this context He deals with the subject only because it is brought up by others. This occasion, and His answer to the question, are recorded both in Mark and Luke. According to the record of Mark and Luke, the question that generated Jesus' teaching on the subject came from the disciples of John, the scribes and Pharisees (Mk 2:18; Lk 5:30). Luke records, "And they said to Him, 'The disciples of John fast often and make prayers, and likewise the disciples of the Pharisees. But You eat and drink'" (Lk 5:33).

When all three accounts are considered together, it seems that scribes and Pharisees were the root of the complaint, particularly the scribes. In Luke's account, it was the scribes who actually posed the question to Jesus, presumably on behalf of the Pharisees. The scribes were the "they" in Luke's account.

If the above was the case, then the complaint was sharp. The Pharisees and scribes had a long history of tradition on their side in this matter. And then along came the disciples of John. They fasted in expectation of the Messiah, who was actually standing their midst. They had conformed to the purpose for which Anna had fasted. They just had not yet realized that Anna's prayers and fasting had already been answered. The Messiah was there. Nevertheless, the scribes sought to intimidate Jesus into teaching His disciples to conform to the religious codes of the day on fasting.

So the religious leaders asked Jesus why He had not taught His disciples to fast (Mk 2:18). Since their question was a complaint, then we might assume that it was an accusation against Jesus concerning His supposed lack of responsibility to carrying on with the accepted culture of fasting that conformed to Jewish religious traditions (See Mk 7:1-9). They presumed to be spiritually minded in their fasting, and thus set themselves up as judges concerning all fasting. If Jesus were a spiritual leader, then according to their thinking, He would certainly teach His disciples to fast. Evidently, the scribes and Pharisees in this conversation were not previously present in the multitudes when Jesus earlier gave instructions on fasting in the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew 6.

In order to understand what Jesus taught on fasting in the context of this complaint, we must understand what He said immediately after He made these statements on fasting. He spoke to them a parable that "no one tears a piece from a new garment and puts it on an old" (Lk 5:36). "And no one puts new wine into old wineskins" (Lk 5:37). Jesus emphasized that something new was coming. Therefore, on this occasion His accusers could not compare the requirements of the past with that which was to come. Regardless of their traditional manner of fasting, there were changes coming. If they tried to "patch" the new onto the old, or "pour" the new into the old, the old would be "torn" by the new patch, and the old would be "burst" by the new. For this reason, the old had to be taken away in order that the new be established (Hb 10:9). In other words, change was coming.

It is interesting to note that the question they posed did not focus on whether the disciples of Jesus fasted, but when they fasted. Of course they asked in reference to fasting, but Jesus' answer was in reference to when His disciples would fast.

Fasting by the Jews was a part of the religious culture of the first century. It was practiced by the Jews, and it was taught also by John the Baptist. This discussion on fasting took place at a time when the disciples of both the Pharisees and John were fasting and praying (Mk 2:18; Lk 5:33). But the purpose for which each fasted was different. The Pharisees had their various reasons for fasting as a religious order, but the disciples of John were fasting in reference to the coming Messiah.

Jesus' answer seems to be in the context of changing the fasting behavior of the disciples of John the Baptist, which thing happened when John was imprisoned and beheaded. Jesus answered the disciples of John by stating that it was not the time to fast when the bridegroom was in their presence. Mark records, "As long as they have the bridegroom with them they cannot fast" (Mk 2:19). However, there would be a time when the bridegroom was taken away. It would be at that time that His disciples would fast.

The attendants of the bridegroom need not fast while the bridegroom was still in their presence. In this context Jesus described Himself as the bridegroom. The time to fast would be when He was taken from their presence. In Jesus' situation, He was taken away from them and crucified. He was then taken away from them when He ascended to heaven. Since Jesus, as the bridegroom, has been taken away, then it is now the time for the disciples of Jesus to fast. The disciples of John fasted in order that the Messiah come. At the time these disciples lived, the Messiah had already come, but would soon be taken away. For Christians today, therefore, it is now a time to fast in order that He come again.

Jesus assumed that after His death and ascension, His disciples would fast. Those who are disciples of Jesus in this present age are fasting. This text makes it very clear that the disciples of Jesus in this time are to be fasting. We would conclude from Jesus' statement that His disciples would be identified by those who would be fasting in His absence.

LIFE-STYLE FASTING

The context of the fasting that is mentioned in Acts 13 emphasizes the ministry of fasting as a normal part of the behavior of the disciples. At least this was the case among the disciples in Antioch. Since the disciples in Antioch were Gentiles, and not Jews, then we must assume that the fasting that was common among them was taught to them by those who first preached the gospel in the city. We might assume, therefore, that when evangelists go into new areas to preach the gospel, fasting and prayer is something that should be discussed among the new Christians. We wonder, therefore, how many of our “schools on missions” are teaching their students the subject of fasting in preparation to teach others also on this subject?

Now there were in the church that was at Antioch certain prophets and teachers: Barnabas, and Simeon who was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen who had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch, and Saul. As they ministered to the Lord and fasted, the Holy Spirit said, “Separate for Me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them.” Then when they had fasted and prayed and laid their hands on them, they sent them away (At 13:1-3).

Antioch of Syria was the third largest city of the Roman Empire. It was the ideal location from which the gospel could go forth to the unbelieving Gentile world. Therefore, the Holy Spirit chose this predominantly Gentile church to accomplish a major evangelistic outreach.

The Spirit’s choice of the disciples of this city was based on who was there at the time He called Saul, who was later called Paul, and Barnabas. These were a very dedicated group of disciples who could identify with the culture to whom the evangelists would be sent. The very fact that these were a group of disciples who were in constant ministry, with prayers and fasting, qualified them to produce evangelists who could go forth into all the world.

What is significant in reference to those who are dedicated disciples is that they minister, fast and pray on a continual basis. In their ministry to the Lord, these disciples fasted. Their fasting was thus a part of their local ministry. We would compare their ministry of fasting with what transpired a few years later among the disciples in Derbe. Luke recorded, “And when they [Paul and Barnabas] had designated elders in every church, and had prayed with fasting, they commended them to the Lord on whom they believed” (At 14:23).

It is not stated in the preceding text that the disciples fasted with prayer. The text actually says that they prayed with fasting. Fasting was the foundation upon which the prayers were offered. The fasting was a continual practice in their behavior as disciples who offered prayers for specific things. We might conclude that their prayers were validated by their fasting. We would not assume that the fasting here was a prolonged fast during which they prayed. We would simply conclude that as those in Antioch, fasting was a part of the discipleship of those in Derbe. They carried on with a life-style of fasting periodically, and thus prayed on the foundation of their fasting.

In both Antioch and Derbe, the fact that the prayers of the disciples were coupled with fasting manifested that they were serious about God working in their lives as they ministered. They were serious about depending on God. Their prayers and fasting manifested that they were serious about world evangelism, and thus, the Holy Spirit gave them a serious evangelistic task.

In the case of Antioch, the local Christians were evidently praying and fasting about sending evangelists out to preach the gospel to other regions. We would not assume that it was the idea of the Holy Spirit to send someone out. The local Christians already knew what their responsibility was in order to be obedient to the command of Jesus that the gospel be preached to all the world (See Mt 28:19,20; Mk 16:15,16). The Holy Spirit called Paul and Barnabas on this particular occasion as a specific answer to the prayers and fasting of the Antioch disciples. We wonder how many other times He did the same in answer to prayer and fasting by the early disciples that are not recorded in the New Testament (See At 8:4).

Someone came to Antioch and preached the gospel, and thus, the disciples in Antioch took ownership of the mission to do likewise in reference to other areas. The Antioch disciples were praying and fasting that something be done in reference to missions, not to be motivated to do missions. All the Holy Spirit did in this case was to make the selection of who would go. We would assume, therefore, that their praying and fasting was to make a decision as to who would go, as well as where they should go.

When Christians are in ministry, they pray with fasting in order that their local ministry may extend to other areas. When this behavior and aspirations characterize the life-style of the disciples today, then the Holy Spirit is going to show up in order to move someone into all the world. In the case of the Antioch church, the mission was to move some of the local teachers into the rest of the world. Because this is what happened in Antioch of Syria may explain why many today do not pray and fast that someone be sent out to preach the gospel to other regions of the world. In the case of Paul and Barnabas, they too were involved in the prayers and fasting. Though Paul and Barnabas may have been praying for direction, it may have been that did not know that it would be them that the Spirit would chose to send out. Be careful concerning that for which you pray in reference to doing the work of God.

During one of their fasts, the Holy Spirit called through them as a group the two teachers, Paul and Barnabas. These two teachers had special talents for ministering the word of God among the Gentiles, and thus, the Spirit called them to go on a specific cross-cultural work of evangelism among the Gentiles to whom they would be sent (See Gl 1:15; 2:9).

Through their active local ministry, the two men had qualified themselves to be sent out. Since neither Paul nor Barnabas were native residents of Antioch, it seemed only logical that they be the two who would go back to their homelands. Barnabas was from Cyprus and Paul from Cilicia. These were the two regions to which they would go on their first missionary journey. Once the Spirit had tapped them on the shoulder, fasting and prayer was a means by which they continued to prepare themselves for the mission that was before them.

Now in Acts 13:3 a significant statement is made in reference to their prayers and fasting. After the Spirit made known to Paul and Barnabas their mission, the entire group of disciples fasted and prayed for the two evangelists for the special mission to which they had been called. Since these two evangelists were to be sent on an extensive journey, it was time, through fasting and prayer, to focus their minds and bodies on what lay before them. Fasting clarified their thinking and changed their focus from local ministry to international ministry. It also prepared their bodies physically to tackle the challenging journey that was before them.

It was the Holy Spirit who made the selection of the evangelists. But it was the local disciples who sent them on their journey. Whenever there is a challenge set before those who are going forth, it is a time for fasting and prayer. In fact, this text uses the passive tense. Before the evangelists stepped one foot out of Antioch, the disciples fasted and prayed. The statement, “Then when they had fasted and prayed,” indicates that this was more than one prayer and fast. Once the mission was determined, the Christians in and around Antioch carried on with a behavior of fasting and prayer in order that God lead the way of the evangelists.

We are not told how long it was between the time the Spirit separated Paul and Barnabas, and when they actually left on their journey. But between the call and the departure we can assume that the focus of the disciples’ customary fasting and prayer simply changed from their local ministry to the foreign ministry in which Paul and Barnabas were to be involved. If the example of the disciples in Antioch teach us anything on discipleship, it is that disciples fast and pray on a regular basis, and also for specific missions to which some of the local teachers are called to go into all the world.

SPIRITUAL CONQUESTS

We can become no greater than those things in our lives over which we do not discipline ourselves to conquer. The control of our destiny is always limited by our lack of control over those obstacles that limit our dreams. We can thus better understand why the Holy Spirit exhorted that we give “all diligence” in order to add to our “faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge self-control ...” (2 Pt 1:5,6). Fasting energizes our self-control, and when self-control is energized, we are able to do great things for God.

The apostle Paul realized that any lack of self-control in his spirit or behavior could disqualify him from receiving the crown for which he so diligently struggled: “But I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be disqualified” (1 Co 9:27).

This is the reason for which we fast. We seek to discipline our bodies and spirit in order that we bring under control those areas of our lives that may be out of control. This was Paul’s admonition and example for those who would be disciples of Jesus. He admonished the Achaian disciples, “And every man who strives ex- ercises self-control in all things” (1 Co 9:25). If one would strive to receive the crown of life, then he or she must exercise self-control in all areas of life (1 Co 9:25). For this reason, we are exhorted, to “continue in faith and love and holiness with self-control” (1 Tm 2:15). Fasting trains our minds in self-control.

Children who are undisciplined will often lead undisciplined lives in their adulthood. Undisciplined children who do not learn the emotional skills of self-control are often out of control as adults. The lack of discipline in our childhood is carried out in an adult that has little direction and determination. Nevertheless, the lack of discipline in our childhood is no excuse for not disciplining ourselves when we are adults. Paul wrote, “When I was a child I spoke as a child. I understood as a child. I thought as a child. But when I became a man, I put away childish things” (1 Co 13:11). Christian maturity comes through self-realization. For this reason, no saint can use his or her childhood as an excuse for undisciplined behavior as an adult.

We must take ownership of our minds and bodies when we put away childish things. This is specifically true in reference to our spiritual behavior. Through fasting and prayer we seek to put away our lack of discipline in order to train our minds to be in control of our being, and thus, our future. In this context of behavior, Paul exhorted the Achaians, “Brethren, do not be children in thinking. ... but in thinking be mature” (1 Co 14:20). Fasting is a means by which we seek to put away all childish behavior in order to be spiritually mature in Christ. Spiritually mature Christians have taken ownership of their destiny.

If there are areas in our behavior where we lack discipline, then these areas of personal dysfunction hinder our function as disciples of Jesus. God seeks to help us in these areas of personal dysfunction. As adults in Christ, therefore, God deals with our spiritual dysfunctions in order to mature us in Christ: “My son,” the Hebrew writer reminded his readers, “do not despise the disciplining of the Lord, nor faint when you are rebuked by Him. For whom the Lord loves He disciplines ...” (Hb 12:5,6). Because we understand that God disciplines us through trials, we can rejoice in our trials (See Js 1:2).

Discipline should be associated with God’s love for us, because in discipline God is working with us in order that we become the best we can be as His children. We do not despise the discipline of the Lord, for through discipline the Lord is trying to spiritually mature our being for a better future. The Lord seeks through discipline to help us “put away” childish behavior that holds up spiritual development in order that we think and behavior as mature saints in Christ.

Though the preceding statement of the Hebrew writer was stated in the context of outward discipline that God would allow to come into our lives in order to build our character, through fasting we can help ourselves in this spiritual transformation of our character by working on the inside. God allows of outward disciplining to aid our personal inward disciplining. All disciplining, both from God and from ourselves, therefore, is for the purpose of building a better future, as well as making us better candidates for eternal dwelling.

It is interesting to see the reaction of those who have committed themselves to the world to satisfy the lusts of the flesh. When they encounter the self-control that is revealed through the behavior of the children of God, they fear, or at least, are intimidated by self-control and godly behavior. Paul once spoke of these things to a worldly leader in government. When Paul “reasoned about righteousness, self-control and judgment to come, Felix became frightened ...” (At 24:25). Felix evidently saw in Paul’s behavior a man who was in control of his entire emotional being. He was not like other prisoners who had stood before him with fear and trembling.

Self-control and fasting certainly frightens a great number of people. Just the thought of going without food for any period of time in order to grow in self-control is not a pleasant thought to some. Hunger pains will strain one’s lack of self-control. But once the hunger pains are gone in a prolonged fast, the “muscles” of the soul can be strengthened on the nourishment of the Spirit.

Nevertheless, we must continually keep in mind Paul’s statement in 1 Corinthians 9:27. As a disciple, and as a Christ-sent apostle, Paul said that if he did not discipline himself and bring his body into control in all aspects of life, then he could be disqualified for eternal dwelling.

Our deepest secrets that are out of control must be brought into control. We fast in reference to all aspects of our life in order that our total being be brought under the control of the Spirit of God. That which is outside the body that has control over the body must be brought under control. That which is within the body that has control over the body, must also be brought under control. In reference to married couples, Paul even speaks of bringing under control the sexual drives of individuals:

Do not deprive one another [of sexual intercourse] except by agreement for a time so that you may give yourselves to fasting and prayer. And come together again so that Satan not tempt you because of your lack of self-control (1 Co 7:5).

All those emotions within the body that war against the Spirit must be brought into control in order that we lead the disciplined life of a child of God. Fasting in all aspects of our lives is the means by which we gain confidence that we are not out of control.

The reason we must seek to bring under control all physical and emotional characteristics of our being is that Satan is looking for areas in our lives that are not under control. “Be sober, be vigilant,” therefore, “Your adversary the devil walks about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour” (1 Pt 5:8). Satan is seeking to devour us in our weakest areas. When he sees a weak point in our character, it is there that he attacks. It is in these areas where we are weakest, therefore, that we fast in order to conquer, lest we be conquered by him who wars against us in the flesh and spirit (See Ep 6:12).

Those who are specifically designated to be leaders among us must be “self-disciplined and sober-minded” (1 Tm 3:2). God expects the same character of every disciple of Jesus who is led by the disciplined. These two characteristics of Christian living are strengthened through prayer and fasting. The early Christians realized that they must bring under control through prayer and fasting the totality of their physical and spiritual being.

It may be significant to conclude this book with a variant reading in the text of the book of Mark that indirectly reveals that fasting was commonly practiced among the Christians of the second century. The variant reading is in Mark 9:29. The event in the context was in reference to the disciples’ not being able to cast out a particular evil spirit. “Now when He [Jesus] came into the house, His disciples asked Him privately, ‘Why could we not cast it out?’” (Mk 9:28). Some manuscripts give the reading that Jesus replied with the words, “This kind can come forth by nothing, but by prayer and fasting” (Mk 9:29 - King James Version).

All recent renditions of this text leave out the reading, “and fasting.” Because the manuscript evidence is weak for this reading, and because those manuscripts that have the reading are late in reference to the original autograph, the reading was deemed by many translators to be an addition by a later scribe.

The manuscript evidence is indeed weak to include “with fasting,” but there is an important point why the reading does show up in later manuscripts, if indeed it was not in the original autograph. We would conclude that prayer “and fasting” were so commonly practiced among the early Christians into the second and third centuries that the reading may have been added. The practice of prayer with fasting was so common that some scribe may have thought that the reading “with fasting” was possibly forgotten by some earlier scribe in copying the text. Or maybe a particular scribe at the time thought that fasting was so important in the lives of the disciples of Jesus, that he added the reading. We will never know why the reading is in the text of some manuscripts.

Our point is that fasting was very common among Christians in the centuries that followed the first Christians. It was so common that some scribe possibly concluded that fasting was commonly linked with all prayer, and through fasting, prayer was empowered to accomplish the most difficult tasks in our lives.

Fasting certainly accomplishes some great things physically in our bodies. However, this is not the primary purpose for the fasting of the Christian. The Christian seeks those great things that originate spiritually from fasting. These benefits would be in reference to our behavior as the children of God. But in reference to this, we would also conclude that fasting empowers our prayers in reference to calling on God to be attentive to our pleas for His help.

Book 73*The Gospel Of God's Heart

"The best and safest way for you, therefore, my dear brethren, is, to call your deeds past to a new reckoning, to re-examine the cause ye have taken in hand, and to try it even point by point, argument by argument, with all the diligent exactness ye can; to lay aside the gall of that bitterness wherein our minds have hitherto overabounded, and with meekness to search the truth. Think ye are men, deem it not impossible for you to err; sift unpartially your own hearts, whether it be by force of reason or vehemency of affection, which hath bred and still doth feed these opinions in you. If truth do anywhere manifest itself, seek not to smother it with glosing delusions, acknowledge the greatness thereof, and think it your best victory when the same doth prevail over you."

Richard Hooker

This is not a story book or novel. It is my sincere prayer that readers will receive this book only as an inadequate medium through which you can have a brief glimpse into a most profound message of history. The book is written as a literary progression of thought that is centered totally around understanding all our being in reference to discovering the heart of God. You will have to pardon my redundancies. Some things just need to be said more than once.

If the reader stays on this journey through to the final chapters, then it is my prayer that the intended paradigm shift to gospel living will be accomplished. If you are already there in your knowledge of Jesus, the Son of God, then this book will be a reaffirmation of your journey of joy. I only hope that I have aided you in being reminded again of the wonderful gospel that changes hearts and lives.

After I presented this series of studies to one particular group of disciples who had been Christians for several decades, one of the leaders of the group said, "We need to reboot our Christianity." This is the effect the heart of God has on us. I pray that this book may have this effect on you. The more we study this subject, the more we reach into our own hearts in order to discover the true motives by which we seek to serve our Lord.

When we honestly search our own hearts, we sometimes discover that we have gone off track in following after our own religious inclinations. When we discover that we have become more religious and less Christian, it is then that we must reboot our motives for doing what we do. This is what happened on the Passover/Pentecost of A.D. 30. The honest Jews who were there over two thousand years ago saw that they had strayed from the heart of God because of their legal compliance to their own religiosity. They immediately saw in what the apostles said a message of deliverance from themselves. They saw the death of their religion in response to the heart of God that they had nailed to the cross. That day of Pentecost, and the times that followed, were truly defined by what Peter later said to another audience of religiously burdened people, “Therefore, repent and be converted so that your sins may be blotted out, in order that the times of refreshing may come from the presence of the Lord” (At 3:19).

In the writing of this book, it was my quest to make the truth of the gospel clear. I have sought to make the truth of the heart of God clear in order that His heart would touch ours. When this happens, it is then that we are motivated to start living the transformed life. Gospel living truly unleashes the times of refreshing in our lives. Our motivation for being who we claim to be as disciples of Jesus starts to make sense. And for this reason, we will be able to finish the course of our discipleship, not because we are running on our own power, but on the power of the gospel that lives in us.

If in some way this book encourages you to take your focus off religious performances, and refocus on the grace of the heart of God, then my purpose for writing has been accomplished. When we start giving off the aroma of the gospel of Jesus Christ in our lives, we will then begin living the refreshed life. The motivation of our being as a disciple of Jesus will be consumed by the incarnational offering of the love of God that appeared on earth over two thousand years ago.

At the time God said to Israel, “You will have no other gods before Me,” the people of Israel resided in a world of innumerable religions (Ex 20:3; Dt 5:7). If they sought for a god who would conform to their own desires, then there were an assortment of gods throughout the world from which they could choose.

If they did not want one of the gods that surrounded them as a nation, then they could make their own, which thing they did. We forget that we are often imaginative at exalting ourselves as our own god. We all have within us the desire as the king of Tyre, who proclaimed of himself, “I am a god. I sit in the seat of gods in the midst of the seas” (Ez 28:2).

But God reminded the king, as He would remind us, “You are but a man and not a god, though you set your heart as the heart of God” (Ez 28:2). Judgment was coming upon the king, as it will be on us if we set ourselves up in our own religiosity as our own self-appointed god. The Lord God said to the king of Tyre, “Because you have set your heart as the heart of God,” foreigners will bring you down (Ez 28:6). Herod made the same mistake as the king of Tyre. He exalted himself to the position that the people cried out of him, “The voice of a god and not a man” (At 12:22). When we become our own self-appointed god, we are no better than the king of Tyre and Herod. We have made ourselves the standard by which we judge ourselves religiously righteous in our own eyes. We have violated the first of the ten commandments.

Because we have been created after the image of the one true and living God, we have been blessed with a very creative mind. And herein lies our problem. If we allow our minds and emotions to be governed by our own mental ingenuity, then we give birth to religion. When we set aside any direction from the true God of heaven, then our minds and emotions take control of our religiosity.

Since God created us to be religiously minded, we cannot help ourselves. We go our own way to create gods in our minds and set them before us to be revered and worshiped. In doing so, we soothe our consciences while we allow ourselves to be led away from God by ourselves. We isolate ourselves from the one true and living God by worshiping the gods we have created in our own minds.

As god creators, we rightly assume that any god we would create in our minds must demand laws by which to live in order that we be justified before this god by keeping his laws. We conclude that there must be laws to obey and works to do in order to please this god we have embedded in our minds to please. These are things that the gods of idolatry require, and thus we create laws and religious rites for ourselves in order to validate and identify our particular faith. We know that our god must have a heart, so we project the limitations of our own heart into the behavior of our god. His heart is defined by our emotionality and confined to the limits of our feelings.

Herein is the beginning of religion. This is the foundation upon which we create a distorted view of the heart of our imagined god, which heart never functions beyond what we can feel ourselves. We would define “religion” as the spiritual expressions of men in an effort to release their God-created instinct of reverence and worship. The function of religion is always governed by either man’s laws or emotions, or both. And because religion is governed by our own mental and emotional instincts, the Bible portrays religion as misguided. Idolatrous religion always takes one away from total focus on God.

Whether willfully, or ignorantly, our spirit of worship of what we perceive to be beyond ourselves, must be shown expressions of worship. If there are no expressions of worship, either through obedience to law, or self-devised meritorious religious rites, then our conscience gives us hassles in our relationship with our god. If we seek, as Israel, to set aside the law of God (Hs 4:6), then we are free to create our own laws by which we meritoriously justify ourselves before the god we have created after our own imagination. If we rebelliously seek to live without law, but at the same time soothe our guilt through good works, then we will develop a catalog of good deeds that must be performed in order to defray the wrath of this god we have created in our minds. In either case, whether through meritorious law-keeping or good works, our spirit of idolatry has created a religion wherein we seek to justify ourselves through our own behavior.

In our efforts to justify ourselves, we become the focus of our own worship. We do so by honoring our systematic theology of self-justification, or our catalog of good works, whichever satisfies our conscience. In our religiosity we have laid on our consciences our own self-righteousness, and thus, find it very difficult to discover the heart of the true God. When one obsesses about his own desires, or his own self-righteous religiosity, he or she can never discover the true heart of God. And herein is the curse of religion with which we all must struggle.

Now we bring this into the historical context of the first century. It was in this century that the God of love invaded the religiosity of man with the revelation of His heart. Both the religious adherents of those who had gone astray from a true faith that was originally established at Mount Sinai (the Jews), and the adherents of those who did not have the Sinai law of the covenant (the Gentiles), were invaded by the gospel of the incarnate Son of God. The results of the invasion were overwhelming, so overwhelming that the world has never been the same since.

Into this religious world came the good news of God's heart. The message of His heart was so radically different than the foundations upon which apostate Jewish religion, and the "pagan" idolatry of the Gentiles, were based. The message was radically different because what was revealed was the revelation of the heart of the one true God who exists beyond and above the creative imagination of all men.

The totality of the events of the gospel started in a manger and will eventually be concluded in the final coming in a cloud. In between is the revelation of the heart of God in the flesh and His ascension to the right hand of God. The ministry of the incarnate Son of God was a mortal confrontation of the gospel of God's heart against the heartless religions of men. In the midst of the conflict between God's heart and heartless religiosity, a great company of religious people discovered something wonderful. They discovered the difference between their efforts to justify themselves through law-keeping and religious rites, and the justification that appeared through the grace that was revealed through the incarnational offering of the Son of God on the cross.

When the vast company of those who were obedient to the gospel eventually made their way from Jerusalem into the far corners of the ancient world, the heart of God, that was emulated through their character and behavior, was in direct conflict with the idolatrous religions of men. The fact that the gospel message was so different and so effective answers the question as to why the early messengers turned the world upside down through their gospel living (At 17:6). Their preaching of the heart of God that was revealed on the cross and in the resurrection, changed the world because it was so different from the guilt-producing self-righteous religions of men. Their lives emulated something that was so radically different than idolatrous living.

It is imperative, therefore, since we are removed over two thousand years from the conflicts of that first century, that we renew our knowledge of what led to those heated conflicts that raged across the first century world when the gospel of God's heart undermined the very foundation upon which the religions of men were based. In fact, we will better understand why the conflicts were often unto the death of the gospel messengers when we understand that the message they bore was so different from the religions of the day. When the religions of the day became state religion, then the heat of the war against truth became so intense that the Holy Spirit had to write a special revelation to those who were willing to live the gospel unto their death (Rv 2:10; see 17:14).

Once we discover the power of the gospel within the early disciples, we too can find peace in the fact that the conflicts between the true gospel and the religions of men continue to rage unto this day. We conclude, however, that if the conflict between the gospel and religion does not exist, then religion has won the battle and the gospel message has been watered down to be just another religious belief that could be cataloged with all the other religions of the world. This very thing happened about two decades after that first Pentecost Sunday in A.D. 30, and it continues to happen today (See Gl 1:6-9).

It is simply the nature of the gospel to stir conflict with the religions of men because the gospel touches the heart of men. This is true because the faith of God's righteousness, and the religions of man's righteousness, are always in conflict. God's imputed righteousness through faith has been conquered by religion if there is no conflict. And if there is no conflict, then the gospel is gone.

The gospel of the heart of God cannot reside in the heart of one who has given his heart over to the religious inventions of any person. Sacrificial submission to the gospel by faith, and narcissistic religiosity, cannot reside in the same heart. This is exactly what Jesus meant when He forewarned His disciples, "Do not think that I came to bring peace on the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword" (Mt 10:34). When God invaded the world of religion through the incarnational offering of His Son, spiritual warfare began. It will not conclude until the end of all religion at the end of the world.

In order that we get our facts straight, one of the writers of the gospel message (Luke) wrote specifically in order that we understand this point:

Inasmuch as many have undertaken to compile an account of those things that have been believed among us

[Christians], just as they were delivered to us by those who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word, it seemed good to me also, having an accurate understanding of all things from the very first, to write to you an orderly account ..." (Lk 1:1-3).

This chronicler wrote these words in order that we "might know the certainty of those things" we have believed (Lk 1:4). Luke introduced the above purpose for his writing about twenty years after the ministry of Jesus and the revelation of the gospel. In this short time—the time from the revelation of the events of the gospel to the time of Luke's writing—the message of the gospel in some minds was becoming distorted. In some regions, religion was winning. Christianity was being transformed into just another religion. And so it is always with us as we allow those little religious gods within us to develop a religiosity that is contrary to the gospel.

The point is that we must continually remind ourselves of the truth of the wonderful gospel that invaded the world through Jesus Christ. If we do not, then we will succumb to the onslaught of the creative minds of men who craft religion and gods after their own desires. Therefore, we will be as Peter who wrote many years after his readers had heard and obeyed the gospel: "I will not be negligent to always remind you of these things, though you know and are established in the present truth" (2 Pt 1:12).

THE ETERNAL INCARNATION

The window through which we can understand the heart of God is the sacrifice that God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit offered through the incarnate Son of God. It is easy to quote a scripture that states, "God is love" (1 Jn 4:8). But to understand the full essence of this loving heart in reference to God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit is often difficult for finite beings as ourselves to comprehend.

After speaking of the grace of God that was revealed through the eternal offering of the incarnate Son, Paul was overwhelmed with the reality of the awesomeness of the heart of God that was revealed: "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God. How unsearchable [incomprehensible] are His judgments and His ways past finding out" (Rm 11:33).

When we consider things that pertain to God, it would be right to conclude that it is impossible to understand fully the love of God that defines His heart for us. After we have loved to our extremity, God's love carries on. And when it comes to the sacrifice of the incarnation itself, we find it quite humbling, but specifically, most incomprehensible.

Being handicapped with our emotional limitations, we seek to understand, to the best of our ability, the heart of God that was nailed on a wooden cross over two thousand years ago. Regardless of our limitations to understand fully the depths of the heart of God, what we do understand through the incarnation, cross and resurrection is exceedingly moving, if not, overwhelming.

The necessity of the incarnation of the message of the gospel was based on the fact that animal blood, that is finite and terminal, could never cancel sin between the Infinite and the finite (See Hb 10:1-4). If animal sacrifices could atone for the sins of men against God, then it would be God creating a finite sacrifice for our sins against an eternal being. But that type of sacrifice would be cheap, and thus, it would cost God nothing.

Sacrifice means that someone has to pay a price. David, a man after God's heart, realized the significance of this principle when he would not accept free animals that were given to him in order to offer any sacrifice to God for himself (See 2 Sm 24:24). David knew that that which cost him nothing would have no value as an offering on behalf of himself. The same was true of God. God could not create a sacrificial animal that was sufficient for the reconciliation of His created people to Himself for eternity. The created sacrificial animal would have cost Himself nothing. No love of God for us could ever have been revealed through a created animal that was sacrificed. In order to offer a sufficient sacrifice, therefore, God had to give of Himself. A price had to be paid.

We must consider another principle in reference to sacrifices for sin. When the burnt offering required by the Sinai law was offered for the sins of the people, it had to be consumed completely upon the altar (Lv 1:1-9; 6:8-13). It was not to be eaten by those who offered it, as were other sacrifices that the people brought to eat in fellowship with the Levites. The burnt offering for sin had to be irreparably consumed on the altar, and thus, never restored to what it was before the sacrifice. And so it was with the sacrificial offering that God provided for our sanctification.

Since the burnt offering of the Sinai law was established in many ways to illustrate that which was to be revealed through the gospel, then we are beginning to understand the use of the word "sacrifice" in reference to the incarnational sacrifice of the Son of God. Jesus indeed existed in the form of God before the incarnation (Ph 2:5-9). He existed in the form of God as spirit (Jn 4:24). We are assured of this because of what John wrote: "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us" (Jn 1:11). Jesus was not "in the flesh" in eternity, and then, continued as flesh on this earth. The text says that He was made flesh. The form of spirit in which Jesus was as God the Son, was brought into the flesh of a body that would be perishable as all men.

To what extent was the incarnation? It had to be complete in order to be a sufficient sacrifice for our sins. There were no peculiarities about the body of Jesus that made him different from any other man. His body, as Isaiah prophesied, could be "wounded," "bruised" and "stripes" laid upon it (Is 53:5). It was a body that had no unique beauty (Is 53:2). And when we consider His emotional incarnation, the Son of God was incarnate into emotions and feelings that could sorrow and grieve from being rejected and despised (Is 53:3). The incarnation was truly complete in the sense that God the Son came into our world in the fullness of who we are in body. He did so because of His love for us whom He had created (Cl 1:16).

So God the Holy Spirit revealed through the pen of Paul that "He [the Son] made Himself of no reputation, taking the form of a bondservant and being made in the likeness of men" (Ph 2:7 - IKJV). Other translations say He "emptied Himself" (American Standard Version). Still others read that He "made himself nothing" (New International Version).

We suppose the translators assumed the He "made Himself nothing" in comparison to what He formerly was in spirit with God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. From what the Spirit revealed, we understand what incarnation actually is. And since the Son was the "only begotten" Son from the Father, we must conclude that "incarnation" finds its definition in the reality of the Son of God being made in all ways as we are as finite men (Ph 2:7). Once the Holy Spirit fertilized the egg of Mary's womb, the Son of God "was made in the likeness of men." The revelation of the heart of God was set in motion (Ph 2:7).

Though we have a difficult time understanding what actually took place when God the Son became flesh in the incarnation, we must not question the fact that such happened. When we were children we imagined that God had literal eyes, ears and a face. We even believed that He had arms and legs. But in our childish understanding, we missed the metaphors that are used in the Bible to explain the being and function of God among men. If our childish imagination of God were true, then the Son of God on earth was only a parallel transfer from His existence as one with the Trinity in eternity to what He was in the flesh during His ministry.

If Jesus had eyes, a nose and ears as God before the incarnation, then there would have been no incarnation. And if there were no true incarnation, then we would actually cut the heart out of the incarnational sacrifice of God on the cross. The gospel of His offering would be of no value. There would have been no sacrifice on the part of the Son of God in giving up being in the form of God and emptying Himself of His spirit existence as God. If there was no incarnation, then there was no sufficient sacrifice for our sins. We would be a people of a simple religious faith that must be pitied by the unbelieving world for believing such a preposterous fantasy.

The more "fleshly" we might view the Son before His birth into the flesh of a man, the less we consider the incarnation to be a divine function on the part of God on behalf of our sins. If there were no complete incarnation, then there would have been no adequate sacrifice that was qualified for the cross of justification. The truth of the gospel, therefore, is based on the real and actual incarnation of the Son of God. If we are to understand the extent to which God was moved in heart to come for us, we must understand the extreme extent of the incarnation.

THE ETERNAL SACRIFICE

When we bring together incarnation and sacrifice, and the eternal results thereof, we must consider the possibility that the sacrifice of the Son was eternal. It does not seem reasonable to believe that the sacrifice was simply for six hours on the cross, or even for the thirty-three years of incarnational living on this earth. These considerations move us to venture into things about which we have only glimpses of revelation.

When we speak of future things, we invariably reach into a realm of speculation where we consider things that are sometimes outside the realm of revelation. We are encouraged to walk through doors of little revelation, but our speculations must be guided by our conclusions that we reap from what is clearly revealed on the subject in the Bible. For this reason, we must not make dogmatic conclusions beyond what the Scriptures would indicate on any subject of which there are only brief statements of revelation. Neither must our speculations contradict clear statements of Scripture.

We must guard against our speculations of future things being final conclusions that would contradict that against which we have struggled to overcome or control in this present life as disciples of Jesus. We must not conclude that we will enjoy a carnal future when all our Christian life we have sought to live beyond that which is carnal. Too many speculators of the future have assumed they would receive carnal power or possessions in the future, while in the Christian life, our aspirations have always been to think and behave with a spiritual mind that is above the carnal. God will not bring into existence in our future that which is contrary to that from which He has asked us to refrain in this life. In fact, those who are living the gospel life have no desire to be controlled by material blessings or to access power in the future, for in their gospel living in this world they have grown to deny these things.

With these thoughts in mind, the Holy Spirit would have us think of things in the future in reference to what is coming. It is for this reason that the Scriptures speak of the things to come. After concluding revelation concerning things in reference to the final appearance of Jesus with the souls of those beloved saints who have passed on before us, the Spirit encouraged the Thessa-lonian disciples, “Therefore, comfort one another with these words” (1 Th 4:18).

The words that Jesus and the Holy Spirit used to convey the future coming of Jesus were comforting in the fact that Jesus was actually coming again. However, what will transpire when He appears, or His presence when He is revealed, is somewhat left to our imagination.

After the resurrection, and when the disciples saw Jesus for the last time outside Jerusalem, He had for the previous six weeks shown Himself alive in His resurrected body (At 1:3). The incarnate body that had become flesh (Jn 1:17), and was previously crucified on a cross, buried in a tomb, and then resurrected on the third day, was in their presence (Mk 16:6,7). He appeared to the disciples with a body that was “flesh and bones” (Lk 24:39). The same incarnate body that had gone into the tomb sat there in their presence and ate food with them after the tomb.

In view of Paul's statements concerning our own “new habitation” that is yet to come after the resurrection, we would conclude that the resurrected body of Jesus was the same as our changed body will be after the final resurrection. We do not know all the details.

Now in reference to our future resurrected body, the Holy Spirit revealed through Paul a mystery that “we will not all sleep, but we will all be changed” (1 Co 15:51). “The trumpet will sound and the dead will be raised imperishable, and we will be changed” (1 Co 15:52). This perishable body in which we now dwell will be changed into a body that will not perish (1 Co 15:53). “We know that if our earthly house [body] of this tent is destroyed, we have a building from God, a house not made with hands that is eternal in the heavens” (2 Co 5:1).

It is not our primary desire, therefore, to die and be without a body before the Lord. “For we who are in this tent groan, being burdened, not because we want to be unclothed, but to be clothed, so that mortality may be swallowed up by life” (2 Co 5:4). It is not our final desire to be disembodied, and thus be without the presence of a body. We seek to be embodied. In our new spiritual body in which we will be with the Lord, He Himself is in some way possibly embodied in this spiritual body at this very time. We are not sure.

We yearn to understand the nature of our heavenly body that is to come in order to better understand the resurrected body of Jesus in which He stood before the disciples after His resurrection and at the time of His ascension. We wonder concerning our new habitation because of one statement that the Holy Spirit made in 1 John 3:2: “Beloved, now we are the children of God, and it has not yet been revealed what we will be. But we know that when He appears, we will be like Him, for we will see Him as He is.”

It is important to notice that when Jesus comes again, “we will be like Him.” We will “see” Him when He comes, and thus the coming will not be in spirit form, for spirits cannot be seen with human eyes unless they are manifested beyond that which is spirit. Therefore, we must not forget that John revealed that we will see Him “as He is.”

John was writing at least two decades after the ascension of Jesus. He used the present tense to explain the present existence of Jesus at the time He wrote. As Jesus is now, then in the same bodily form we will see Him in His coming.

Since we will be like Jesus when He comes, then according to what Paul revealed in 1 Corinthians 15 and 2 Corinthians 5, we conclude that in some way He is now like what we will be with Him in our new habitation to come. The only means by which we can in some way speculate concerning the nature of the resurrected body of Jesus in which He now is, and with which He will be when He comes again, is to understand how Paul explained we will be when we are resurrected. As we will be, so Jesus came forth from the grave changed, but still in some way as we will be according to the explanations that the Spirit gave concerning our future “spiritual body.” Now the Spirit goes into detail in 1 Corinthians 15. He first establishes that there will be a change in our bodily existence.

All flesh is not the same flesh. But there is one flesh of men, another flesh of beasts, another of fish, another of birds. There are also heavenly bodies and earthly bodies. But the glory of the heavenly is one and the glory of the earthly is another (1 Co 15:39,40).

The Spirit continues to help us understand that we will be bodily changed at the resurrection into something different: “So also is the resurrection of the dead. It is sown perishable. It is raised imperishable” (1 Co 15:42). Our natural body in which we now dwell “is sown a natural body. It is raised a spiritual body. There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body” (1 Co 15:44). Here is the point of the Spirit in reference to the necessity of the changing of our present body: “Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, nor does the perishable inherit the imperishable” (1 Co 15:50). And so we would conclude the same concerning the resurrected body of Jesus. His incarnate body went into the tomb, but there was something different about it when He stood in the presence of the disciples after the resurrection, and with which He ascended out of their presence (At 1:9-11).

However, our speculations here must be cautioned by what Jesus said of His own body immediately after the resurrection. He stated that He was still in a body of flesh and bones (Lk 24:39). It was this body that ascended out of their sight. Therefore, when we consider His presence as to what form He now is, and the form by which He will be revealed when He comes again, we must conclude that somewhere between the ascension and the final coming He will be as we will be in our spiritual body that is to come. We would not conclude that He must remain in the bodily form in which He was at the time of the ascension. That is really not our business to know. But we do know what John stated, that He will come in a bodily form that we can recognize.

John said that at His coming we will see Him as He presently is (1 Jn 3:2). Jesus will not appear from heaven as a spirit, the form in which He was with the Father in eternity before the incarnation. He gave up being in spirit as the Father when He was made in the flesh of man (Ph 2:6,7). He gave up the form of God in order to take on the incarnate nature of our earthly body. Jesus reassured His disciples that His body could sit in their presence before a plate of food (Lk 24:42). He was resurrected with a body to which Mary could lovingly cling (Jn 20:17). But in the final resurrection we will be made into the spiritual body in which He will be revealed.

In order to reassure His disciples of His resurrection, Jesus “showed them His hands and His feet” (Lk 24:40). The body that appeared in their presence was the same body that they had laid in the tomb three days before. The resurrection of His incarnate body was proven true by the flesh and bones that stood before them on that memorial occasion. John later wrote of the encounter that he and the other apostles had with the resurrected Jesus who ministered the word to them between the resurrection and ascension:

That which [the Word] was from the beginning, that we have heard, that we have seen with our eyes, that we have looked [Gr., gazed] upon and our hands have handled, we proclaim concerning the Word of Life (1 Jn 1:1).

This was the same body that six weeks after the resurrection “was taken up and a cloud received Him out of their sight” (At 1:9). His was a bodily resurrection, and thus, we suppose that His was a bodily ascension. And since we will see Him as He presently is when He comes again, we assume it will be a bodily coming in a spiritual body, for we will actually see Him as He is (1 Jn 3:2). He will not come as a spirit in the clouds. The Holy Spirit says that we will actually be able to behold Him with the physical eyes of this body in which we now dwell.

In what body form Jesus now dwells is certainly left to our speculation. We do know that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven. We do know that this physical body of flesh and blood will be changed when the heavenly kingdom comes. We do know that we will be changed to be like He presently is. And thus, we conclude that at His ascension, Jesus did not return to be in the form of God as He was before the incarnation. It is with this conclusion that we affirm that the incarnational sacrifice was forever. Jesus too will reside in a bodily presence with which He is now clothed, and with which we will be clothed at our resurrection, and throughout eternity.

The preceding conclusion has profound implications. The conclusion is important because of what John wrote in 2 John 7: “For many deceivers have gone out into the world who do not confess that Jesus Christ is coming in the flesh. This is the deceiver and the antichrist.” We know that the Greek word for “coming” in the text can also be translated “presence.” If we would use this translation, the statement of John would be speaking of the existing presence of Jesus as He now is in eternity. Because it is translated with the word “coming,” we assume that John is speaking of the final coming of Jesus as he did in 1 John 3:2. But if we keep the bodily ascension in mind when we consider the statement of 2 John 7, then we would conclude that Jesus is presently in the body with which He ascended, and with which He will come again. There would be no change in bodily presence from resurrection to final coming, and then, into eternity.

We are not told that when Jesus ascended out of the sight of the disciples that He reverted to a spirit form. It could be that He did, but it seems that the Holy Spirit was revealing through the pen of John, who witnessed the ascension, that in some way Jesus continues in the bodily form that He had at the ascension, and with which He will come again in the future.

John also mentioned that Jesus “is coming in the flesh.” We must consider that since flesh and blood cannot inherit the heavenly kingdom of God, then John was actually using the present tense to refer to the incarnation. In other words, he was emphasizing the “presence” of Jesus in the incarnate body of His earthly ministry.

At the time John wrote in the middle or latter part of the first century, the Holy Spirit envisioned the Gnostic heresy that would gain strength among Christians in the second century. The subjects of the heresy would deny the incarnation. The Gnostics assumed that Jesus was only an apparition of the disciples’ minds, or a spirit that indwelt a human body of the man Jesus for the duration of the ministry of Jesus. At the cross, this “spirit” (the Christ), went back to be with the Father when Jesus made the statement, “Father, into Your hands I commend My spirit!” (Lk 23:46). The man Jesus subsequently died and His body was buried, and is still somewhere in a tomb in Palestine. Some Gnostics believed that Jesus revived in the tomb, and then fled to Egypt.

What John argues is that Jesus the Son of God did come in the flesh of man. The incarnation was true and real. And to deny the eternal incarnation is to deny the sufficiency of the sacrifice of the cross. The Gnostics, therefore, were cutting the heart out of the gospel.

Whether John was at the time of his writing referring to the incarnation of the past, or to the final coming of the future, his use of the present tense remains valid in reference to the Son of God initially giving up and leaving the form of God when He was incarnate in the womb of Mary (Ph 2:5-8). Jesus was incarnate into the flesh and blood of man. His flesh and bones were crucified and resurrected. His flesh and bones ascended in a cloud out of the sight of the disciples. And with a changed bodily form, the same into which we will be changed, He is coming again.

From the ascension to the final coming there was a change to His incarnate body, for we will be like Him, and He like us. But in our resurrection we will all be changed into our spiritual body. We must conclude, therefore, that Jesus will come in a bodily form that we can see with our eyes. Paul referred to this spiritual body as a mystery, and thus it indeed is.

If the incarnate body of Jesus came from the grave, stood with the disciples from the time of the resurrection until the time of the ascension, and then was received up into heaven, the emphasis of John in 2 John 7 in some way indicates that the incarnation was forever. And when we speak of the total sacrifice that the Son of God made for us, the sacrifice was far beyond the cross. It was forever!

This conclusion may reveal a more profound meaning of the Hebrews 2 text. Jesus was incarnate to be lower than angels, but was incarnate in the flesh of man in order to dwell among His sanctified brethren forever.

“For both He who sanctifies and those who are sanctified are all of one, for which reason He is not ashamed to call them brothers” (Hb 2:11).

We are overwhelmed by these conclusions. His eternal sacrifice is incomprehensible to finite minds. It is a sobering conclusion that brings an eternal meaning to His promise that He would build His ekklesia (assembly), die for the redeemed with incarnate blood, and then deliver this sanctified body of justified believers into eternal dwelling in the presence of God. With these conclusions, we are beginning to comprehend the sublime heart of God that was not only revealed on the cross, but also in the incarnation. The incarnation was not temporary, and the sacrifice on the cross was more than six hours on a cross outside Jerusalem. The incarnation extended deeper and longer. The Hebrew writer continued,

*Therefore, since the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise partook of the same, so that through death He might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver those who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage (Hb 2:14,15).

Our fear of death will only be terminated with the death of our last enemy, which is death (1 Co 15:26). This will be realized only at the sound of the last trumpet when Jesus is announced from heaven. It will be then that death is swallowed up in the victory of the saints' resurrection from the dead (1 Co 15:54-57).

When we speak of the church (assembly - ekklesia) of Christ, we must think beyond this world. We must think into eternity where Jesus will dwell among His people who will also reside in spiritual bodies. It is then that we will truly have a personal relationship with Jesus in the bodily form in which He presently dwells.

This was the eternal heart of God that was revealed through the sacrifice of the eternal incarnation. The offering of the incarnate body sanctified the ekklesia. The resurrection of His incarnate body gave hope to the ekklesia. His final return in His incarnate body will call the ekklesia into eternal dwelling in the presence of God. With this eternal sacrifice we are eternally justified and sanctified, and made fit for eternal dwelling.

LEAVING FATHER OR SON

We once stood beside the grave sites of missionaries of the Moffet Mission in Kuruman, South Africa that was established in the early 1800s. We had mixed emotions while standing there. We noticed a great number of tombstones. The tombstones were a witness to the death of those who gave up fathers and mothers in Europe, many of whom they would never see again in their lifetime, when they boarded ships that were destined for Africa.

It is told that when some missionaries left Europe to go to the “white man’s grave” of Africa, that on their departure from Europe, the brave missionaries would pack their belongings in their own coffins, and then load them on ships that were destined to a people to whom they would preach the gospel. Their dedication to their mission was not a matter of soothing a spirit of adventure, but a matter of preaching the gospel to the “dark continent.”

As we stood there by the grave sites of so many at the Moffet Mission who had eventually put to use their coffins, we noticed that about half of the grave sites were those of children. Many of the children of the pioneering messengers of the gospel from Europe had sacrificed, not only themselves, but also their own children to fever and disease in order to accomplish the mission of the gospel. There lay in those graves the fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, who were buried alongside one another because there was a deep-seated love in their hearts for the lost. In those graves were fathers and mothers who had left their own fathers and mothers in Europe in order to bear the glorious message of the gospel to a land that needed so much hope. Our experience at that grave site was mixed with both joy and sadness, but primarily joy.

Our joy emerged from the knowledge that these were truly dedicated servants of God who knew the heart of God. They ended up in that graveyard because their hearts led them there. Those graves were a witness to the power of the heart of God that was revealed through the gospel. The graves were a testimony of those who sought to live the gospel they believed. There was nothing that these sacrificial bearers of the gospel would not have done in order to preach the gospel message to the world.

The early messengers buried at Kuruman were as Abraham, on whom God called to sacrifice his only son. Abraham was obedient to the call. He concluded that if he left his son for a time through the offering, God was able to returned Isaac to him through resurrection. Abraham “concluded that God was able to raise him [Isaac] up, even from the dead, from which he also figuratively received him back” (Hb 11:19). The spared life of Isaac was a figure of the future resurrection when we will receive back all our own loved ones.

Those gospel bearers of the heart of God from Europe were able to offer themselves and their children on the altar of sacrifice because both fathers and sons knew that God would eventually reunite them in the resurrection of the dead when Jesus comes again. And for this reason, they did not need to sorrow upon their departure from one another as they boarded ships to leave Europe for Africa. As Paul reminded the saints in Thessalonica, they did not “grieve as others who have no hope” (1 Th 4:13). They firmly believed in the gospel that “Jesus died and rose again” (1 Th 4:14). They momentarily cried on the shoulders of one another upon their physical departure at the harbor, but realized that at the sound of the last trumpet in the end, “God will bring with Him [Jesus] those [loved ones] who have fallen asleep in Jesus” (1 Th 4:14). They found comfort in this resurrection reality that permeates the heart of the message of the gospel (1 Th 4:18).

And now we have a better understanding of what Jesus meant, when during His ministry, He called on those who would be His disciples to love Him more than family. To his Jewish readers who cherished the family, Matthew recorded that Jesus said on one occasion, “He who loves father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me. And he who loves son or daughter more than Me is not worthy of Me” (Mt 10:37). To the same Jewish families, and on another occasion when He was nearing the cross, He made a promised to all those who would answer His call to sacrificial discipleship:

And every one who has left houses, or brothers, or sisters, or father, or mother, or children, or lands, for My name's sake, will receive a hundredfold, and will inherit everlasting life (Mt 19:29).

Everything about which Jesus spoke of leaving and receiving was precious to the Jews. Immediate family was a part of their heritage as Jews. Their identity as Jews was engulfed in genealogies, for through genealogy they proved their Jewishness. And as Jews, the “land” was a part of their continuation in history as Jews. The promised land was an inheritance in fulfillment of God's promise to Abraham (Gn 12:1-4). It was their right to have the land for the heritage of their families. Nevertheless, Jesus called on His Jewish disciples to be willing to leave both family and land.

The gospel would eventually mean that the Jews would sacrifice both family and land. They sacrificed their family heritage when all Jews who were obedient to the gospel became one man in Christ where there is neither Jew nor Gentile (Gl 3:26-29). The Jews sacrificed their land in the A.D. 70 destruction of Jerusalem when over one million Jews were killed and the rest were sold into slavery throughout the Roman Empire (See Mt 24). Palestine was depopulated of Jews.

The beauty of sacrifices on the part of the Jewish Christians, however, was that they sacrificed both with joy. If it were necessary, they joyfully left their physical family heritage when they came into fellowship with Gentiles in Christ. They left lands when they discovered the heart of God who gave His Son, and subsequently, they were scattered everywhere throughout the world in order to preach the gospel (At 8:4). This helps us understand the historical statements that were made in reference to the new Jewish Christians on the day of Pentecost and thereafter: “And they sold their possessions and goods and divided them to all, as everyone had need” (At 2:45). “Nor was there any among them who lacked, for as many as were owners of land or houses sold them and brought the proceeds of the things that were sold” (At 4:34). “And Joseph, who by the apostles was surnamed Barnabas ... having land, sold it and brought the money and laid it at the apostles' feet” (At 4:36,37). We would conclude that the first disciples, who were primarily Jews, got the message of the heart of the gospel. They were willing to do anything that God would call on them to do, for God went to the extreme and did all that was necessary for them through the incarnational offering of His Son on their behalf.

The message of the gospel involves leaving and giving all that is necessary in order to follow down the road that Jesus took in order to make the gospel available to the world. When we speak of the incarnation, therefore, we discover a part of what the Father and Son did on our behalf. We understand what Jesus meant when He made the preceding statements in reference to the sacrifices that His Jewish brethren would have to make upon their obedience to the gospel. And the beautiful thing about what Jewish Christians left is that they did it with joy. It was as James said primarily to his Jewish readers, “My brethren, count it all joy when you fall into various trials” (Js 1:2). And such did the Jewish Christians in their early discipleship after obedience to the gospel:

For you had compassion on me in my chains, and took joyfully the seizure of your goods, knowing that you have for yourselves in heaven a better and an enduring possession (Hb 10:34).

The gospel involves, if necessary, leaving fathers and mothers in homelands, and often sons and daughters in the lands of one's mission. The gospel means following in the steps of Jesus when He came to us with the good news of the incarnation, cross, resurrection and ascension. Paul said, “Let this mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus” (Ph 2:5).

Paul continued in the Philippians 2 context that Jesus left heaven through incarnation in order to be a missionary with the gospel message to a “dark world” (Ph 2:6-8). This is the spirit of sacrifice that we must see in the incarnation. It is a sacrificial offering because God the Father and Son so loved the world (Jn 3:16), that they were not willing that any one person of their creation perish (2 Pt 3:9). When we discover the heart of the Father and Son to willingly leave one another for others, then there is no one on earth, whether friends or family, that we are not willing to leave for the sake of the gospel. When a Christian sincerely says to the Father, “Ask anything and I will do it,” then we know that this Christian has discovered the heart of God.

While on the cross, the words of Jesus cut to our hearts in view of what the Father had to do on our behalf. Jesus cried out to the Father, “My God, My God, why have You forsaken Me?” (Mt 27:46). The common interpretation of this statement is that the Father had forsaken Jesus only for a moment on the cross because He bore the sins of the world. But we think the meaning goes far, far deeper. We wonder what tears flowed in heaven thirty-three years before the cross when the Son possibly said to the Father, “It is time, Father, for Me to leave You forever in the form in which We now exist.”

The Son subsequently left the Father through incarnation and would never be with the Father again in existence as He was before the incarnation. If the incarnation was indeed forever, then it was at the ascension that the Son was united in presence again with the Father in heaven (Hb 8:1), but only as He now is and we will be (1 Jn 3:2). In the resurrection, the Son would forever be as we will be in our new spiritual bodies in eternity, but also in the presence of the Father. All this will be possible because the Father and Son had a heart for us.

Because of His own sacrificial offering to leave His Father through incarnation, Jesus found no difficulty in calling on those who would be His disciples to be willing to also leave their fathers and mothers, sons and daughters on behalf of those who were dead in sin. Jesus was not a hypocrite in making the request. He and His Father had so loved the world that He gave up and left the Father for us (Jn 3:16). We too should so love the world of lost humanity to be willing to leave our fathers and mothers for Him. Our hope is in the fact that the leaving will eventually end in restoration through resurrection. It will be in our resurrection when Jesus comes again that our reunion will forever be sealed with all those who die in Christ. The cross was the solution for justification, but it is our faith in the coming resurrection that turned our hopeless end into an endless hope.

In the context of Jesus' call for His disciples to be willing to leave family and possessions for Him, He was speaking specifically concerning what He did for them. His reference was to their obedience to the gospel. If any unbelieving family member would hinder their obedience to the gospel, then they must choose Him over them. If family must be sacrificed for Jesus, as Jesus so loved us through the sacrifice of the incarnation and cross, then with the same sacrificial love we must put Him first.

Herein is revealed the heart of God that was revealed through the Son. When Jesus said to Philip, “He who has seen Me has seen the Father,” He meant more than presence, essence and being (Jn 14:9). We see the heart of God in the incarnate presence of Jesus who came to dwell among us. We see the heart of God in His eternal loving sacrifice for us.

Jesus is the revelation of God's love for us. He was explanatory and patient with Philip on the occasion of the preceding statement of John 14:9. But He was definitive by asking Philip, “How can you say, ‘Show us the Father’?” (Jn 14:9). Philip was thinking physical. But Jesus was focusing on the heart of God. God's heart was revealed through the loving Jesus who was standing in their midst at that very moment.

We see the heart of God through Jesus, and thus we yearn to be in the presence of that heart in eternal glory. And when we understand what Jesus left in heaven for us through the incarnation, our hearts are more than touched. They are forever changed. The entire focus of our lives is changed from that which is of this world to that which is above and beyond. No human relationships or possessions will detour those who have truly discovered the heart of God that was manifested through Jesus. This is gospel living.

So we stood beside the graves of so many in Kuruman, South Africa whose hearts had been touched by the revelation of the heart of God through Jesus. It was a moment of joy to experience such a testimony of those who had left so much because Jesus had left so much for them. There was nothing that the Father in heaven could ask of them that they would not have done because the Father through Jesus, held back nothing from them that was needed by them to be with Him.

RELIGION: GROWTH AWAY FROM GOD

In order to understand the heart of God that was revealed through the Father's expression of grace on the cross, we must in some way determine a definition of religion. We are religious because we were created to search for that which is beyond or above ourselves. Everyone has an innate desire to worship, or be religious. In the absence of revelation from God, however, we will devise some system of worship or religious expression that brings some intellectual and emotional relief, and thus, religion is born. Even when there is Divine revelation, we still have a tendency to go our own way religiously (See Hs 4:6). This explains the history of Israel, and especially the nature of the religion of the Jews at the time Jesus came into the world (See Gl 1:13).

The religiosity of man in the absence of Divine direction, combined with the will of men to go their own way, moves adherents of religion into different religious sects or groups that conform to a determined, and agreed upon, code of religious rites, or doctrines of theology. In this way religion is inherently divisive among men. Because it is divisive, it not only divides religious people within societies, but it also moves one away from the gospel, and thus away from the heart of God.

Because religion is self-oriented, it has a deceptive nature about itself. It makes one feel that he is either emotionally or legally growing closer to God, but in actuality, is moving away from the heart of God. This occurs in religion because the more religious one would become through the establishment of more codes of religiosity, one feels comfortable and content in the bondage of his or her own religiosity. In our religiosity, we deceive ourselves into thinking that the more religious rites we establish for ourselves, the more religious we are, and thus, the closer we feel we are to God. But the exact opposite is happening.

It might be good for us to regularly read 2 Thessalonians 2:9-12. The text speaks as if it were written just yesterday, for we live in a religious world where religious people willingly accept messengers of Satan who are disguised as apostles (2 Co 11:13-15). Because they do not have a love for the truth, they accept "deceiving power and signs and wonders" as miraculous in order to validate their religiosity. Such religious workers are ministers of Satan who "masquerade themselves as ministers of righteousness" (1 Co 1:15). These would be those who cry out "Lord, Lord," but are not interested in the will of God (Mt 7:21).

The better we understand the phenomenon of religion, the better we can understand the explosive response to the gospel in the first century. The day of Pentecost in A.D. 30 in Acts 2 is an example of a surreal paradigm shift from religion to the gospel. It was a day when honest and sincere people finally realized that their religion (Judaism) had moved them so far away from God that they felt hopeless in their religiosity. When the respondents on that day heard the announcement that the heart of God was revealed through the crucified and resurrected Son of God, they were overwhelmed. Grace had appeared to dispel religion.

Herein is revealed the inherent problem with religion from which those initial respondents fled. Because we are created religious, we, as a collective of religious individuals, will always agree upon a religious code of belief and conduct by which each one of us is accepted into our particular religious group, and by which each religious group is identified. Religion demands a collective of individuals, and thus, in order to be accepted into this collective (fellowship), rules must be established for everyone in order that the collective identify itself as a unique religious sect. The rules, or codes of identity, are the means by which the adherents to a particular religion find confidence in their faith. When the religious rites are collectively obeyed, then the religious sect is propagated throughout history. Such was the nature of the Jews' religion (Gl 1:13). By adherence to their religious rites of identity, they were able to continue their identity, and above all, their separation from the world of idolatrous Gentiles.

Compliance to the rules of a particular religion becomes the means by which one is considered faithful, and thus justified before God. In religion, the adherents of any particular sect always confuse acceptance by those of the religion with acceptance by God. In their obedience to the rules of their respective religion, the adherents assume that such is the condition upon which they are accepted by God. The rules and laws of the religion, therefore, become the means by which one is justified as a member of a particular religious sect, as well as whether one is justified before God. If one is not justified as a faithful member of a particular religious sect, then he or she is judged unfaithful, and thus fails to be justified before God. Faithfulness to a particular religious sect is thus the condition upon which one is justified faithful before God.

This same system of identity is sometimes used to engineer a national/religious society. The reassuring religious rites and civil rules (laws) within a society will often originate from social upheaval that is taking place in society. In order to bring peace, the religious world often synchronizes religious and civil rules by constructing a national/religious order wherein each individual is accepted in the society by adherence to the civil/religious rules. Adherence to the civil/religious rules makes a theocracy, and such was Israel made at Mt. Sinai.

However, the initial faith of Israel was not a religion, for the foundation of the Jews' faith was originally based on the revealed word of God at Mt. Sinai. In contrast to people bringing peace within their own societies through devised systems of national religion, Israel was established as a theocracy through direct revelation from God.

In a theocracy, civil government and religion become one. In order for one to be an accepted citizen of the governed society, he or she must adhere to the rules (laws) of the religion, and vice versa. Those who do not comply with the rules of the theocracy are considered apostates, and thus expelled from the society. Built within the Sinai law were rules that maintained a separation of the Israelites from the nations around them. These rules were there for a purpose, for God did not want Israel to go the way of the world, which thing they invariably did.

For the same reason, Islam is a theocratic religion. Rules were instituted in the Quran to identify a Muslim, and thus keep the Muslim separated from the "infidel" at all costs. In the conflicts of the seventh century, Muhammad organized his army into a single fighting force by introducing a religious nationalism whereby all citizens fought against all other religions that did not conform to his religion.

However, advocates of a theocratic society may be zealous to keep the laws of the nation and religion in the beginning of the new nation, but when citizens begin to set aside, or become frustrated with the rules that define their faith and government (Hb 4:6), apostasy is no longer defined as apostasy. That which was originally considered apostate teaching becomes the new definition of the national religion. So went the theocratic society of Israel when the people gave up that which defined them as a unique people of God. This is the fear of fundamental Islamists today in their efforts to fight against those Muslims who want to modernize Islam. The fundamental Islamist's greatest fear is to modernize in the way of the West, and in doing so, lose his identity as a theocracy according to the definition of the Quran.

But in reference to Israel, Israel began as a heavenly defined society through the authority of Divine civil and moral laws that were given to the people directly from God. However, the citizens of Israel eventually laid aside the law of God (See Hs 4:6). Israel's faith in God that was defined by the revealed will of God was replaced with their own fabricated religion, which was idolatry.

The command that they have no other gods before the one true and living God was replaced with gods they had created after their own imagination and religious rites that conformed to their desires. They became their own gods of their own religion. The law of God was replaced with their own religious rites by which they would claim allegiance to the new gods in their own minds.

Israel went astray as a nation of God by moving from God's authority in matters of faith to their own self-righteous authority. This is the inherent nature of all religion. When Israel went astray from its original God-given national and spiritual boundaries, then the citizens did that which was right in their own eyes. On more than one occasion in the book of Judges the statement is made, "Every man did what was right in his own eyes" (Jg 17:6).

Now this brings us to a similar, but somewhat different scenario in reference to the Jews' religion that existed in the fullness of time when Jesus came (Gl 4:4). The text of Mark 7:1-9 (Mt 15:1-9) is one of the best texts that explains the religious environment into which Jesus came with the gospel, as well as the religious environment in which we live today. In this confrontation of the scribes and Pharisees with Jesus concerning the religious rite of washing of hands, the true danger of religion is revealed.

The scribes and Pharisees had come to Jesus with the complaint that "they saw some of His disciples eat bread with defiled, that is, with unwashed hands" (Mk 7:2). We would certainly agree that washing one's hands before eating would be a good practice. Though the statement, "cleanliness is next to godliness," is not a statement of the Sinai law, it was certainly a good statement that expressed the laws of cleanliness of the Sinai law. By the time Jesus came, however, the washing of hands before eating had been made a religious rite by the Jews. The Jewish fathers had taken that which was a good practice of cleanliness and added it to their religion as a religious rite. The problem, therefore, was that at the time of Jesus the "Pharisees and all the Jews do not eat unless they wash their hands, thus holding the tradition of the elders" (Mk 7:3). Mark recorded that "there are many other things that they have received in order to observe" (Mk 7:4).

In this judgment of the Pharisees and scribes, it was not just about washing hands. It was about the catalog of religious rites that had been handed down from one generation to another. In the case of the disciples with Jesus, the Jews' religious customs had been ignored by some of the disciples of Jesus. The religious rites that defined Judaism were broken.

Jesus took the complaint of the scribes and Pharisees as an opportunity to identify the curse of the religion of Judaism. Jesus first rebuked the Pharisees, and all the Jews, by introducing the prophecy of Isaiah. Isaiah spoke of those who would indeed begin with the Sinai law, but then digress into a self-imposed religiosity.

Jesus introduced the problem of the Jews' religion: "Well did Isaiah prophecy of you hypocrites ..." (Mk 7:6). In the confrontation, Jesus introduced the word "hypocrites." Religion is always hypocritical. For example, and as an example to bring Jesus' teaching on this matter into our own world today, it is a common religious rite among Christians to pray before the eating of a meal. This observance is practiced throughout the world. It is a tradition that has been handed down from our fathers, a tradition that has no authority of Scripture. Nevertheless, as the Jews' washing of hands before they ate, Christians say a prayer before they eat. Both are good practices, and honorable. However, since both are only religious traditions, they are thus inherently hypocritical if they are bound on the consciences of people as a religious law.

For example, suppose there was no water available when a Jew walked across the country and desired it was time to eat a snack on the road. We would guess that he would eat with unwashed hands. Maybe the legalistic Jew would have taken some water with him in order to wash his hands. Now suppose a Christian says a prayer before a meal before he starts on a long journey. After he has traveled down the road for several hours, he becomes hungry and desires a snack. He reaches into his snack bag and eats a sandwich without saying a prayer.

As the Jew who ate his snack without washing his hands, so the Christian ate his snack without saying a prayer. If either the Jew or Christian bound their particular religious rite as law, then both became hypocrites on the road. The problem with religious rites is that they are self-oriented, and thus often at times manifest the hypocrisy of those who teach such as law. Sometimes the adherents of either rite would obey the rite, but sometimes they would not. It is difficult to be consistent when living under the authority of religious rites that are considered to be law.

Jesus identified the problem of religion with His continued rebuke from Isaiah, "*This people honors Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me" (Mk 7:6). The more we honor our religious rites, and teach men to observe them as law, the further we are moving ourselves away from the heart of God and His will. When we serve our own hearts out of guilt in order to comply with our own self-oriented religiosity, the less we understand, and the more we move toward the heart of God.

This problem goes further than hypocrisy. Jesus explained, "*In vain they worship Me, teaching as doctrines the commandments of men" (Mk 7:7). Religion moves the "commandments of men" into the realm of doctrine. The reason this happens is that in the social order of our religion, we must daily and directly confront those who enforce the "commandments of men." We are intimidated because of our desire to conform to the norm of the accepted religious rites of our religion. God is somewhere off in heaven, and thus we can ignore His teaching. We do not have to confront Him directly. Religion is born out of the desire of religious people to harmoniously conform to the religious rites of one another.

Religion thus progresses to the "laying aside" of "the commandment of God" (Mk 7:8). Since we are intimidated to obey the codes that identify our respective religion, we marginalize the word of God. This inevitably leads to what Jesus pronounced had happened to the Jews at the time of His arrival: "*All too well you reject the commandment of God so that you may keep your own tradition" (Mk 7:9).

Religion ultimately leads to the rejection of the word of God. When the stage of the development of our religion has reached the level of rejecting God's will, we have, as the Jews, removed ourselves from God. Such is the danger of religion, and all of us have our religious rites that often become the opportunity to reject, or at least, ignore what the Bible teaches. These rites are often not wrong, but when they start to supplant, and then replace, the word of God, then we are gone. It is for this reason that we continually study the Bible. We seek to continually check ourselves that our religious rites and rituals do not become the authority by which we conduct our lives, or worse, the authority by which we judge one another concerning faithfulness to God.

If we are stuck in religion, the only thing that will bring us back to the heart of God is the gospel of His grace. The more we understand the gospel of His grace, the closer we move to God. The Holy Spirit inspired an entire New Testament book to be written on this matter. He chose one who understood grace well to write the book of Romans, for Paul was formerly a long way from God in the Jews' religion.

GOSPEL VERSUS RELIGION

Though God created us to be religiously inclined, we must not accuse Him of creating us as flawed individuals in our expression of our religiosity. We were not created spiritually flawed, but mentally and emotionally always in need of a Higher Power to guide us (See Hb 12:9). With this God-created yearning for this Higher Power, it is our responsibility to search out and find the authority of this Power, for we reason that it would not be logical, or loving, for God to leave us to our own religious devices (See Jr 10:23). This was the logic behind what Paul wrote in Romans 1:20:

For the invisible things of Him since the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and divinity, so that they are without excuse.

God created within us a religious inclination that should move us, by simple observance of that which was created, to look beyond ourselves in our search for spiritual satisfaction. But at any time in history, it always seems to be as Paul wrote, “Men ... suppress the truth in unrighteousness” (Rm 1:18).

Religiously misguided men of the past “knew God,” but “they glorified Him not as God” (Rm 1:21). The reason for this is that they had no love of the truth (2 Th 3:9-12). So “professing to be wise, they became [religious] fools” (Rm 1:22). They “changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man and of birds and four-footed beasts and crawling things” (Rm 1:23). The problem with those who seek self-serving religion over God is as Paul wrote, “*They exchanged the truth of God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator” (Rm 1:25).

This is the nature of the religionists. Through efforts of self-justification, the religious worshiper seeks to worship a god who pleases him, and to serve this god according to the performance of his own religious rites. In doing so, the adherent of religion moves away from God by thinking that his or her religion will bring one closer to God. This is the deception of religion. Any religion that places trust in the performance of man to justify himself before God, minimizes the free gift of God's grace through the cross. Religion inherently supplants gospel.

God will not force His way into the lives of those who give up on Him (Rm 1:24). Religious people have given up on God for centuries because “they did not like to retain God in their knowledge” (Rm 1:28). And herein is the problem of religion with which we are challenged in a religious world today where the religious world is giving up a knowledge of the Bible. The Bible is no longer the primary authority for faith for the religionist. For the religionist, faith is based primarily on the religious behavior of the adherents to a particular religion (See Rm 10:17). And because the religionist does not “receive the love of the truth so that they might be saved,” God allows him to be deceived by his own religiosity (2 Th 2:10).

God will send them strong delusion so that they should believe a lie [of religion], that they all might be condemned who did not believe the truth [of the gospel], but took pleasure in wickedness (2 Th 2:11,12; see Gl 2:5,14; Cl 1:5).

Jeremiah realized this rebellious psychology of man when he wrote, “O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself. It is not in man who walks to direct his steps” (Jr 10:23). When applied to man's religious behavior, this psychology of man is not a mental flaw. God did not create us to be rebellious robots. It was intentional on the part of God that man's innate religiosity should seek the will of his Creator. But when we determine to give up a knowledge of His will in order to preserve our own religious rites, we have moved ourselves away from the very heart of God.

We must keep in mind, therefore, that we all have our favorite religious rites simply because we are religious beings. However, since we are such, then it is imperative that we constantly keep our religiosity in check with the word of God, lest we be carried away from God by our own religiosity. Such happened in Israel of old, and it can happen to us today (See Hs 4:6).

If it were in man to direct his own ways according to his own will, then we would be pre-programmed robots who would have no choice. And if we were programmed to always do that which was right in the eyes of God, then God could never remain just if anyone were condemned to an eternal hell. In fact, if we were programmed to always do the will of God, then there would be no such thing as hell. Everyone would be saved. But if there were not the optional destiny of hell, and the reality of such, then how could we ever love? Why would God even need to reveal His love for us if we were headed back to Him regardless of any wrong choices we might make? It is for this reason that any doctrine of individual predestination is an attack against the gospel.

We must never exclude nor ignore the reality of hell. If we do, then we minimize the motive of the heart of God that was behind the sacrificial offering of the cross. In fact, if hell is not a reality, then the cross was foolishness. If there were no hell, then why would the Son of God humiliate Himself through incarnation and the death of the cross?

Since God is love, then He could not create an individual who was without the ability to choose his own destiny. If we could not choose love, and thus choose our destiny to be eternally with God, then why would there be creation in the first place? Think of it this way: Since God is love, then He had to create us. And for us to respond to any love that He might show toward us, we had to be created with the freedom to return His love through obedience. This means that in our creation as individuals who could choose, there was the chance that we could go wrong by making the wrong choices. And so went Israel after the gods of their own imagination in order to satisfy their own rebellion.

Now we can understand why we are so inclined to create religion, either in the absence of God's will, or our outward rebellion against His will. The existence of religion reveals either our rebellion, or according to Paul's statement in Romans 1:20, our willful ignorance of God and His will. In either case, it reveals the will of the creature to "worship and serve" the creature rather than the Creator. It reveals the efforts of the created to move beyond the Creator. Since God created man in a way that necessitated the steps in which we should walk, then those who would choose to ignore the principles of God have chosen to rebel against their Creator. If we seek to be religious in our rebellion, then our religion is moving us away from God.

We must not think in this discussion that we are missing the point of the power of the gospel, and the heart of God revealed therein. On the contrary, we are laying the foundation upon which God crushed our proverbial fascination with religiosity that had progressed far into the night by the time of the first century. It is with this awareness that we interpret Galatians 4:4: "But when the fullness of time came, God sent forth His son ...." We might conclude from this statement that the Holy Spirit wanted us to understand that the extreme of religiosity, both among the Jews and among the idolatrous Gentiles, had progressed to the point that humanity needed the relief of the gospel.

The "fullness of time" was not in reference to the fulfillment of prophecy, for prophecy concerning the Messiah could have been fulfilled anytime during the five hundred year existence of the Roman Empire (See Dn 2:44; 7:13,14). The "fullness of time" would at least refer to the socio/religious environment wherein sincere Jews, as well as idolatrous Gentiles, began to feel the extreme bondage of their religion (See Gl 5:1). In feeling this bondage, many realized the futility of their efforts to justify themselves through their numerous self-imposed religious rites. They thus longed for spiritual relief.

By the time of the first century, both Jews and Gentiles had fabricated their own religiosity to perfection, if indeed we could ever use the word "perfection" in reference to religion. At least the Pharisees made a good attempt at such, for they assumed that God's law could not be "perfectly" obeyed unless there were an assortment of religious rules connected to each commandment of God. They were so fearful of going the way of their apostate forefathers who had forsaken the commandment of God and ended up in the captivity of the Assyrians and Babylonians, that they created a religion (Judaism) by which they could judge themselves justified before God according to their own performance of their self-imposed religious rites.

Therefore, in order to never let such apostasy happen again in the history of Israel, the scribes and Pharisees surrounded each revealed law of God with a host of their own precautionary religious rites (religious traditions). Unfortunately, in obsessing over their added religious rites, they forgot to focus on the intent of the commandment of God itself. As previously discussed, Jesus judged them with the statement, "For laying aside the commandment of God, you hold the tradition of men" (Mk 7:8). The religious leaders put themselves in a situation where they could not see through the maze of their own precautionary traditional religious rites of obedience in order to discover the spirit of the original commandment of God. And for this reason, Jesus intensified His judgment of their religion by saying, "All too well you reject the commandment of God so that you may keep your own tradition" (Mk 7:9).

Religion can arise in the hearts of any well-meaning worshiper. We would judge the religious leaders of the Jews sincere in that they wanted to guard themselves from going into the former apostasy of their forefathers. However, we would judge them, as Jesus, to be apostates in their fear of apostasy. Well-intended religious people today often go wrong by legally creating a religion by which they seek to justify themselves before God through strict adherence to the codes of their own self-imposed religion.

The departure from gospel to religion does not take a great deal of time. In reference to some Christians in Rome, the same road to “fake religion” was taken by some among the disciples. Their former approach to religious behavior that was characteristic of the Judaism from which they had come was brought into their gospel living as Christians. Unfortunately, they made the mistake of reverting back to their former system of religiosity.

To counter their theology of works-oriented Judaism, Paul made a statement that frightens those who have turned Christianity into a legal system of attempted self-justification: “For sin will not have dominion over you, for you [Christians] are not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14). Those who have turned Christianity into a system of self-justification through law-keeping, as the scribes and Pharisees had turned the Sinai law, will have difficulty understanding this statement. They will have difficulty for they have gone in the way of self-sanctifying religion, as opposed to the way of the gospel.

In reference to the religion that Jesus encountered in the first century, the grace and faith that was revealed through Him was an invasion into the world of Jewish and Gentile religiosity. It was the grace and faith of the gospel that penetrated to the very heart of the religiosity of those who sought to perform their way into eternity through religious rites. The revelation of the gospel was such a shocking contrast to the religion of Judaism, or the “Jews’ religion” (Gl 1:13), that three thousand people in one day stood stunned before twelve men who spoke freedom in Christ. When the day of Pentecost was finally over, about three thousand repentant people had come to the conclusion that salvation was truly by grace and faith. Their own religiosity had moved them so far away from God that they saw in Jesus the only way back (At 4:12). They had lost heart in their own religiosity, but saw in the gospel the way back into the heart of God.

Once we conclude that religion is an effort on the part of man to walk in his own paths, then we come to an axiomatic truth: The more we are into religion according to the doctrines and commandments of men, the further we are removed from God. And we might add to this truth that the more comfortable we feel in our self-imposed religiosity, the less appeal the gospel has on us, for the gospel supplants all of self for all of Christ.

When we understand the very core of the religion of the Jews, then we can begin to understand the overwhelming response of those three thousand honest Jews on the day of Pentecost who immediately understood the message of the gospel. They had moved themselves so far away from God through their own religiosity that they immediately saw their way back “into the grace of God” through the risen and reigning Son of God. It was a glorious realization. Their response will always be the epitome of people on earth who understand the revelation of the heart of God through the incarnation, cross, resurrection and ascension of the Son of God. When such is realized, there is no going back to legal or emotional religion. There is no longer the desire to “worship and serve the creature” rather than the Creator. When one discovers the truth of the gospel, there is no longer a lure to religion that is based on our own self-righteousness to justify ourselves before God.

GOSPEL VERSUS SELF-JUSTIFICATION

Justification refers to law and one’s compliance with law in his relationship with God. Justification would mean that we stand before God “just as if we had not sinned.” Justification, therefore, is our legal relationship with God according to His law. Our only problem is that we can never stand alone before God justified, if we seek to do so on the basis of our own ability to keep His law perfectly. We all sin, and it takes only one sin to separate us from God.

How we view justification defines the difference between religion and the gospel. The religionist would assert that he is justified before God because of his own efforts to live in a manner by which he would stand justified before God free of sin. This self-justification would be accomplished through the atonement of sin through the self-sanctifying efforts of one’s good works.

The efforts of a good religionist—which is in all of us—may be well intentioned, but the heart of God that was revealed through the gospel teaches that one is justified only through the cross, and thus, sanctified by the blood offering of Jesus. The religionist seeks through self-sanctification to be justified on his own behalf, but the gospel says that we are justified by the cross, and thus sanctified because Jesus poured out His blood for our sins. One system of justification is religion. The other is gospel.

The difference between the two approaches by which one would come before God are entirely different. Depending on how one considers his or her relationship with God is often revealed through trials that come our way. When something goes wrong in the life of the religionist, who is working so hard to justify himself before God on the merit of his own performances, he blames himself, and then God for not working enough in his life. He blames God for not working in his life to guard him from all trials. If there is a death in the family, he blames God for allowing the death. If he suffers financial setbacks, he blames God for allowing him to be in such a financial predicament. Pleas for the Holy Spirit to work in his life never seem to be answered because there are always failures in his performance to be a good person. Trials deny him the satisfaction of living a self-sanctifying life.

On the other hand, those who live by the gospel have an entirely different world view. The gospel says, "Come to Me all you who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest" (Mt 11:29). The gospel says, "Count it all joy when you fall into various trials" (Js 1:2). The gospel says, cast "all your care on Him, for He cares for you" (1 Pt 5:7). The one who lives by the gospel, lives the life of gratitude, knowing that it is the gospel, not himself, that justifies him before God. He understands that trials are not the result of God's displeasure in his life. He understands that he reaps what he sows (Gl 6:7), and thus, he also understands that God is not the sower of the failures of his living.

What the religionist forgets is that in our relationship with God, all of us violate law (Rm 3:23). According to law, therefore, we are all guilty, and sometimes we must reap the consequences of the bad fruit that we sow (See Mt 7:17). And for this reason, and if we would enjoy eternal life, all of us must in some way be able to stand before God justified of all our violations of His law. The problem is that no man can be justified before God on his own ability to live a life without sin.

Therefore, we can thank God that He sent a Lawyer to the cross on our behalf. It is the gospel of the Lawyer that was revealed on the cross that made justification possible to all those who would connect with God (1 Jn 2:1; see Hb 7:25; 9:24). It is because of the justification of the sacrificial offering of Jesus that we understand the heart of God. We do so because God could just as easily have discarded all of us to eternal destruction. But because He has a heart for us, He revealed a way of setting aside violations of law in order that we be reconciled to Him for eternity.

Because God knew that we could not live flawlessly according to His law, justification at the cross was planned before the creation of the world. Before the foundation of the world, and before the creation of the first two lawbreakers, the Son of God volunteered to set things right legally between God and fallible man who would be created. This thought was behind Jesus' prayer statement to the Father immediately before His crucifixion: "You loved Me before the foundation of the world" (Jn 17:24).

Before "the foundation of the world" the Father predestined the sanctified (the church) unto eternal glory. "He has chosen us [the church] in Him," Paul wrote, "before the foundation of the world" (Ep 1:4). In order that God be just in the creation of those who would break His law, the gospel of justification had to be in place before the first word was spoken to bring into existence all lawbreakers. The church, therefore, is the realm of the justified. As a group, the church is destined to eternal glory.

When Jesus came into the world in the flesh, He "uttered things that have been kept secret from the foundation of the world" (Mt 13:35). After the creation and before the cross, even God's prophets searched diligently the revelation that had been given through them concerning things that would later be revealed through Jesus (1 Pt 1:10-12). Jesus "indeed was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times" as the revealed mystery of the gospel (1 Pt 1:20; see Ep 3:3-5). Before there was creation, therefore, there was justification made possible by the fore-ordained cross, for without the plan of justification through the offering of Divinity, it would have been unjust for God to create.

By the time the mystery was to be revealed, the Jews, because they could not wait for God's righteousness, established their own system of righteousness before God. Paul explained their problem in the following statement: "For they [the Jews] being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God" (Rm 10:3). Theirs was a system of works and religious rites whereby they sought to justify themselves through meritorious law-keeping and works. In seeking this self-made righteousness through their self-made religion, they ignored the righteousness of God. They prioritized their righteousness above God's righteousness.

This was the very thing that Paul, a Jew, and the three thousand on the day of Pentecost, recognized that they had done in their relationship with God. It is this realization that strikes right at our hearts and leads us to accept what God has exceedingly abundantly done for us above all that we could do for ourselves (Ep 3:20). However, we must not forget that Paul wrote that the self-righteous Jews did not submit to the righteousness of God because of their pride in their own religion. It is difficult for those who consider themselves most righteous before God, because of their own religion, to forsake such for the righteousness of God.

But this was not the case with those honest Jews as Peter, Matthew, John, and then Saul of Tarsus. The following self-confession of Saul, now Paul, would be a statement that explains all that one should honestly do upon discovering that his own self-imposed religiosity keeps him from obedience to the gospel:

I count all things [of my past religiosity] for loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things. I count them refuse so that I may gain Christ, and be found in Him, not having my own righteousness that is from law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness that is from God by faith (Ph 3:8,9).

Judaism was a religion in which Paul excelled. It was a typical religion by which adherents sought to justify themselves before God through obedience to self-imposed religious traditions. Judaism was a religion of self-justification through religious rites and traditions by which religion is defined. Adherence to the rules and traditions become the standard by which adherents judge themselves faithful to their religion, and because they are “faithful,” they have a supposed “faithful” relationship with God. The leaders of such religions, therefore, become the gate-keepers for faithfulness of the adherents by making judgments concerning the adherents’ faithfulness to the rules and regulations of the religion. This world view of the advocates of religion, and their leaders, is characteristic of all religions throughout the world today.

In reference to Christianity, Christianity is often turned into a religion of self-justification through the added rules and rites (issues) of those who would seek to religiously rule over their fellow religionists. Obedience to these rules, or religious codes of behavior, become the standard by which one is judged righteous, and thus faithful before God. Depending on one’s obedience to specific traditional rites, he or she is judged to be either faithful or unfaithful in reference to “the church.” Some have digressed their Christianity to even judging the salvation of others on the basis of whether one conforms to a particular personal opinion.

This is nothing new. In the first century, Paul wrote to some disciples in Colosse who were moving in the direction of making Christianity a “self-made” religion. They were introducing a system of religious rules whereby members would seek to justify themselves before God on the basis of self-made religiosity. Through the keeping of their traditional religious opinions, they were bringing into the fellowship of the disciples a system of man-made religiosity by which they judged one another.

Paul warned these Colossian disciples of their efforts to create a “self-made” religion by turning Christianity into a legal system of self-justification. He asked, “If you died with Christ from the elementary principles of the world, why, as if you were living in the world, do you submit yourselves to [legal] ordinances?” (Cl 2:20).

In the context of the gospel, and in obedience to the gospel (2 Th 1:6-9), the Colossian disciples had “died with Christ” (See Rm 6:3-6). They had responded to the gospel of grace. Paul was now challenging their present efforts of trading their justification by the cross through their obedience to the gospel for legal religious ordinances of men whereby they would declare themselves justified and righteous before God. He was questioning why, having been justified by the cross, they would turn again to self-sanctification in obedience to the religious ordinances of men.

In reference to such man-made religious ordinances and self-justification, Paul simply shouted out imperatives in reference to our efforts of self-justification through obedience to the religious rites of men: “Do not touch. Do not taste. Do not handle” (Cl 2:21).

SELF-SERVING RELIGIOSITY

If we exchange the justification that we have before God through the cross, for an attempted self-justification through religious rites that we would bind on ourselves, then it is not a matter of trading one means of justification for another. We would actually be giving up our justification that we have received through the cross if we would seek to establish our own justification. Self-justification inherently denies, or disregards, the sufficiency of the justification of the cross.

We should not consider for a moment any efforts on our part to subsidize our justification that we have received fully through the cross. Some Jewish brethren tried to do this in Galatia. But the Holy Spirit sternly charged them for fabricating “another gospel” (Gl 1:6-9). Without any need for interpretation, the Spirit rebuked those who would make any attempts at self-justification: “As we said before, so now I say again, if anyone preaches any other gospel to you than what you have received, let him be accursed” (Gl 1:9).

Therefore, we would do well to listen to Paul’s continued exhortation of some in Colosse in reference to their obedience to the religious ordinances of men in order to live a religiously justified life: “All these [ordinances] concern things that perish with the using, after the commandments and doctrines of men” (Cl 2:22). We assume that we will perish with the religious rites of men if we seek to add to the gospel our own religious traditions by which we would seek to justify ourselves before God. In fact, in the bluntness of a literary mandate, the Holy Spirit said the following to some Galatians who did this: “You have been severed from Christ, you who seek to be justified by law. You have fallen from grace” (Gl 5:4).

Self-serving religiosity through obedience to meritorious religious rites, or even a meritorious obedience to the law of God, gives one the opportunity to boast as a good religious person before God and man. For example, the self-righteous religionists of Jesus’ day had someone blow a trumpet when they made a contribution to the poor on the streets and in the synagogues. But Jesus said, “When you do good deeds, do not sound a trumpet before you as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, so that they may be glorified by men” (Mt 6:2). Inherent in self-righteous justification through law and good deeds is “trumpet blowing” religiosity in order that we may be recognized for our performances.

Self-righteousness always leads to trumpet blowing for self-glorification. We naturally like to be glorified as individuals who crave attention. We seek the approval of others. But if we involve ourselves in such religious behavior of showmanship, Jesus says that we have already received our reward (Mt 6:2). Attempts for glory through self-righteousness, therefore, lead to exchanging the glory that one will receive from God to that which is given by man. This is the curse of our obedience to the religious ordinances of men in an attempt to justify ourselves before God. It is the inherent curse of religion.

With the following statement of rebuke, Paul concluded that some in Colosse had involved themselves in self-righteous religiosity: “These things have indeed a show of wisdom in self-made religion and self-abasement and neglect of the body, but not in any value in restraining the indulgence of the flesh” (Cl 2:23).

The problem with self-righteous religion is that we suppose we can, through our outward religious performances, make a presentation of righteousness before God and man. But at the same time, we often allow the sinful motives of our hearts to go unchecked. The trumpet blowing religionist seeks to present himself outwardly righteous before others, but fails to deal with the sin beneath the sin. He seeks to restrain himself through extreme outward asceticism, fasting or performances of good deeds, but does not correct the sin beneath the sin. All that he does as a show of religiosity, therefore, is worthless in controlling the lusts of the flesh. He is the one about whom Jesus spoke who sinfully gazes with lust on at a woman, but fails to correct the adulterous sin of his heart that is beneath the sin of the lustful gaze (Mt 5:28).

Self-righteousness is always misleading, for it fails to correct sins of the heart. But the justification that comes through our obedience to the gospel is inward. The justification (righteousness) that we receive through the gospel deals with the heart in order to correct our behavior. For this reason, there is no desire for trumpet blowing for what God has done inwardly. It is God for whom we must blow the trumpet for working on our hearts.

It is our inward justification that gives impetus to our outward behavior. This is exactly what James meant when he wrote, “I will show you my faith by my works” (Js 2:18). The Christian works because he is already justified before God. He does not work in order to be justified. His work is in appreciation for what he has, not in order to receive that which he needs.

There is no contradiction between Paul and James in reference to our justification by faith and works. Both Paul and James were addressing Christians, but approaching the subject of justification from different perspectives, depending on the problem that prevailed in their respective audiences. Some in Paul’s audience were resorting to justification through meritorious works of law. Some in James’ audience believed that they stood justified without doing anything in response to their justification.

James asked his audience, “Was not Abraham our father justified by works when he offered Isaac his son on the altar?” (Js 2:21). Because of faith, Abraham was motivated to act on God’s instructions. “You see that faith was working with his works, and by works was faith made perfect” (Js 2:22). So James concluded, “You see then that a man is justified by works and not by faith only” (Js 2:24). Abraham was not justified by meritorious works that he had determined on his own in hope that they would be accepted by God. He was justified “with his works,” which works of obedience to God’s command completed (perfected) his faith. In the example of Abraham, faith and work, through the offering of his son, could never be separated. His work was the manifestation of his faith that God had already accepted him.

Because Abraham was justified by God by his existing trust in God (faith), his inward justification (righteousness) before God was revealed through his obedience to offer his son, Isaac. For this reason, he was not meritoriously justified before God through the offering, but because he walked in the righteousness of God. We must not reverse the order of justification and faith in the case of Abraham. Abraham was first justified by faith, and then his obedience revealed his justification by faith.

Abraham's example was James' argument against those who assumed that their "dead faith" was acceptable to God. James' argument is against those who seek to stand righteous before God on the basis of "faith only." His argument is that true faith is revealed to others, and before God, by one's obedience, as Abraham's offering of Isaac indicated His justification before God. Faith that is not manifested through works reveals that the "faith only" person has not discovered the heart of God that was revealed on the cross. Abraham's understanding of the heart of God was revealed to us through his offering of his only son. Because of his faith, he was willing to do all that God asked of him.

On the A.D. 30 Pentecost, about three thousand people heard a message of justification that was totally contrary to the religious system of self-righteous justification that permeated the religion of Judaism. Judaism was a religious system of self-righteous justification in which the Jews had participated throughout their lives. It was the religion of their fathers that had been handed down from one generation to another, with more regulations being added to the Sinai law with each generation. When the A.D. 30 Pentecost arrived, it was the religion of all those who were present. In fact, in obedience to law and their religious traditions, the Jews were driven to Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost feast.

Unfortunately, the attending Jews at Pentecost had turned the law of God into a meritorious system of religious behavior whereby they thought that they could return home after Pentecost, considering themselves justified before God because they had meritoriously made the trip to Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost feast. They could then "blow their trumpets" back home in the synagogue that they had legally made the required trip to Jerusalem.

The Jews were involved in a religion of self-righteous justification. Every honest and sincere Jew knew this. But they reasoned that they had no alternative, for there was no further revelation from God since the Sinai law until Jesus came. They had been as Paul wrote, "But before faith came, we [Jews] were kept under guard by law, being shut up to the faith that would afterward be revealed" (Gl 3:23).

The problem with self-righteous justification through perfect law-keeping and meritorious deeds is that those who seek to be so justified before God on the basis of their own performance of law, know that something is very wrong. Honest people confess to themselves that they are sinners before God. They know that no meritorious system of religion can be devised by either God or man whereby man can legally justify himself on the basis of any perfect performance of law. The reason for this is that we are all unrighteous.

Honest Jews knew deep inside that their journey to Jerusalem every year for the Passover/Pentecost feast would never truly bring them peace with God. They honestly knew that no amount of journeys or animal sacrifices could justify them before the God they sought so much to please. The sincere Jews thus mourned over their problem of inadequate performance of law (See Mt 5:4). Justification before God on the basis of self-righteousness was inherently impossible because "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rm 3:23). Therefore, "there is none righteous, no, not one" (Rm 3:10). The same is still true today.

And then came the Pentecost of A.D. 30 that is recorded in Acts 2. Something was announced on that day before an audience of honest Jews who understood the futility of self-righteous justification. In mourning over their plight of not being able to legally justify themselves before the Father, they heard a message of which they could never have dreamed to be possible. Announced by twelve men on that day was a message of deliverance from themselves. The text reads, "Now when they heard this ..." (At 2:37). "This" was not a message of more rules and regulations that they could add to their religion of Judaism. Law and religion were the problem, not the solution.

What they heard was a message that was based on the actions of God. Because God was not willing that any should perish, He acted out of His heart for them. What was announced was the heart of God in action through the offering of His Son. In fact, it was an announcement of the death of Judaism and all works-oriented religions. It was the death of law in reference to justifying ourselves before God through perfect law-keeping. Because of His grace, God took care of our justification through His Son, and thus, He brought to an end any supposed self-righteous justification through either law or religion.

The Pentecost announcement was not simply a message of facts and events concerning the death and resurrection of the One for whom they had, as good and faithful Jews, cried out seven weeks before to be crucified. It was a message of reconciliation through the Galilean they had nailed on a cross. It was a message of good news (gospel), a message that one could be justified before God apart from meritorious works, animal sacrifices, journeys to Jerusalem, or any obedience to the ordinances of man-made religions. Law was found to be insufficient and grace was in. It was a message that, apart from law, justification was poured out through the Son of God on the cross. It was a gospel that did not come through law, but through promise (Gl 3:15-25). It was a proclamation that in Christ Jesus “you are not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14).

When honest, guilt-ridden lawbreakers see the heart of God at the cross of justification, their only option is a joyous response. When we understand that we cannot be justified legally before God, either through our own religious laws, or the perfect keeping of the law of God, we cry out for grace. When our cry is based on faith that God would not leave us in our pitiful condition of attempting to justify ourselves through the invention of our own religious rites, we seek the only other alternative.

If we would be accepted by our God, then we must through faith accept His conditions for our reconciliation with Him. When we realize that meritorious religion fails, it is then that we understand that grace prevails. When we realize that law-keeping always sells us short of the grace of God, it is only then that we fully appreciate the heart of God that was unleashed on the cross through the sacrificial offering of the incarnate Son of God. It all makes one want to stand up and shout out, “GLORY HALLELUJAH!” We rejoice over the words of the Holy Spirit: “For by grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God” (Ep 2:8).

GOSPEL VERSUS SELF-SANCTIFICATION

Sanctification refers to our spiritual condition in reference to our relationship with God. Justification refers to the violation of God's law, but sanctification refers to cleaning up our mess of sin and keeping us clean when we continue to make a mess of ourselves in living the Christian life. The word “sanctify” means “to cleanse,” and thus, to remain cleansed by “setting apart” the cleansed from the world. One must initially be cleansed of sin, and then continually cleansed of sin that separates us from God. Sanctification thus refers to those things (sin) that affect our relationship with God if they are not cleansed.

Briefly stated, justification rectifies our legal relationship with God, whereas sanctification refers to cleaning up legal violations of law. Lawbreakers, therefore, must have a means by which they can continually be cleansed of breaking the law.

What compelled the Jews on the day of Pentecost to act in response to the gospel was that they saw in the gospel the opportunity for reconciliation with God through the justification of the cross, and subsequent sanctification of their sins through the blood offering of God's Son. They had all their lives mourned to be righteous before God, but were honest enough to recognize the futility of their efforts to correct their flawed behavior in reference to God's law. In an attempt to find some peace of mind, they burdened themselves with a system of self-sanctification in order to atone for sin through goods works. In this way, they supposed they could maintain a relationship with God that was based on their religious performances. But they found no peace with God through the merits of their behavior. They honestly knew that they were dysfunctional in reference to law and works. No performance on their part could rectify their problem of sin.

Therefore, when they heard the justification of the cross that Peter revealed, they were overwhelmed. They asked the apostles what to do in order to deal with the matter of their sin and guilt before God in reference to their sins. They were specifically mournful over their participation in the crucifixion seven weeks before of the One they realized was actually God's sufficient payment for their dysfunctional lives.

In response to their remorse over their acknowledgment of their spiritual poverty, and their crucifying the Lord of glory, Peter instructed, “Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins” (At 2:38).

There is more in this statement than simply a door into God's righteousness. In fact, if we consider the command to repent and be baptized for remission of sins as a legal command to be obeyed, then we will miss the justification and sanctification that the three thousand respondents immediately understood in the gospel message. We must keep in mind that what cut the people to the heart was not disobedience to some added laws that Peter supposedly preached to them. What cut them to the heart was the message of the gospel. Peter and the apostles had preached gospel, not law.

Consider their situation from this real perspective: They already knew that justification by the grace of God could never come through law, otherwise it would be earned, and thus obligate God to save them. It therefore had to be free and offered through grace. And for this reason, it was initiated from the heart of God toward all those of the world who had stained themselves in sin. And because it was initiated by God, and not earned, it was inherently free.

Through grace, God launched the means by which they could be connected (reconciled) with Him. It was now the opportunity for those who hungered and thirsted after His righteousness to respond. Upon their request of what must be done in reference to God's offer to be justified, and initially sanctified before Him, Peter gave the answer of Acts 2:38. His answer explained how they could connect with the incarnational offering of the heart of God on the cross. His offering had to be joined with an offering on their part. They had to submit to the instructions that Peter gave in order to connect with the sanctifying blood of the cross.

The Pentecost respondents were given a choice in reference to their sins that separated them from God. Obedience to the gospel in baptism was "for the remission of sins" because Jesus promised in this new birth, that one could once again enter into the realm of the grace of God (Jn 3:5). In order to connect with the cleansing blood of the cross, they had to take the initiative of offering themselves with Jesus in His death, burial and resurrection (See Rm 6:3-6).

In the text of Acts 2, it states that the respondent Jews on Pentecost were "cut to the heart" (At 2:37). The message the apostles preached dealt with the heart of man. Justification and sanctification, along with God's righteousness, were blessings that came straight from the heart of God. The gospel is a heart to heart mission. And herein is the confusion that is generated by the religions of men that are always meritorious in reference to righteousness. Being seated in the meritorious religion of Judaism, the respondents on the day of Pentecost saw immediately that they had nailed the heart of God to a cross through a meritorious act of alleviating Judaism of any apostates. Their meritorious act of crucifying Jesus, a supposed apostate, was actually a work against the work of God. And since Jesus was proved to be the Son of God through His resurrection, they indeed had a serious problem (See Rm 1:4).

For all their lives the Jews sincerely sought to sanctify themselves before God through meritorious obedience to religious rites and traditions. They struggled for self-righteousness and presumed that they could attain God's righteousness through the merit of their own religiosity. This is the common problem of religion. When the opportunity came for them to be freely reconciled to God through His offering for them, they crucified their only option. What they began to realize is that their sin actually worked God's plan of salvation on their behalf. God turned their sin into an opportunity for the remission of their sins.

What brought the people to this point of frustration was their "compounded religiosity." In order to accomplish their own righteousness, they had stacked around the law of God a host of religious traditions in order that the law of God be strictly obeyed. Unfortunately, while they were searching through their catalog of added religious rites, they lost sight of the intent of the law of God by obsessing over their self-sought righteousness. Their own invented religiosity led them to ignore, and then reject, the commandment of God (Mk 7:1-9). Such is the curse of traditional religion. We are blinded by our obsession over our own religiosity. And being blinded, we cannot, as the Jews who crucified Jesus, see the heart of God through Jesus.

The problem was that the Jews thought that through obedience to their self-imposed religious rites, they could justify themselves before God. And in reference to keeping themselves separated from the world, they devised a host of other religious rites that would identify them as good Jews who had no dealings with the world. Forbidding to eat with a Gentile was one of those rules, which rule even Peter had a difficult time overcoming in reference to eating with the Gentile Cornelius (See At 10, 11).

The problem with the behavior of religious rites, as Peter discovered in Antioch, is that we are not being "straightforward about the truth of the gospel" (Gl 2:14). Denominations begin when a group of adherents huddle around an agreed upon set of traditional religious rites. Self-imposed religiosity, therefore, not only blinds us from one another, but it also blinds us from the gospel. We are often so focused on our own church-righteousness that we cannot see or understand the gospel. This is what happened in Antioch when Peter and other Jews hypocritically denominated (separated) themselves from the Gentile brethren (See Gl 2:11-16). When they did such, they stood condemned before God (Gl 2:11).

What the Jews forgot, and that which is often forgotten by the self-righteous religionist today, is that we are justified before God individually through the free gift of the cross. If we accept the gift on God's conditions, then the free justification of the cross leads to our sanctification (At 2:38). All this was revealed on the A.D. 30 Pentecost because, through grace, God had a heart for His creation.

The religious world seeks to turn the message of the gospel around through a system of self-sanctification. We think that we can supposedly sanctify ourselves by not doing bad things in order to be justified before God. Or, when we are bad, we think we can clean ourselves up by doing works to atone for our sins. In order to guarantee our continued sanctification, we establish a catalog of religious rites or good works by which we seek to cleanse ourselves. Our works become efforts to guarantee our salvation. They are not efforts to celebrate our justification, as was the work of Abraham in offering his son. They are works in which we can boast of what we have done ourselves in order to supposedly satisfy God.

Religion is a system of legally performing self-imposed religious rites and good works in an effort to reach into the heart of God. Religion is naturally meritorious. It assumes that our justification before God is dependent on our efforts to sanctify ourselves through our own performance of religious rites and good works. In this way, we are behaving as the hypocrites in their “trumpet blowing” religiosity. We are crushing the heart of God by focusing on our own religiosity that blinds us to the heart of God that was revealed through the offering of His Son on the cross. It is for this reason that the more we claim to be righteous through the performance of our own meritorious religious rites and good works, the further we move ourselves away from the righteousness of God.

In the behavior of our religion, we have forgotten the most important principle of the gospel. The gospel is the heart of God freely reaching out to the heart of man through the only begotten Son of God.

We cannot get to the heart of God through that which keeps us away. Our dysfunctional behavior will never allow us to realize our goal of being in a close relationship with our Father. In seeking to get to the heart of God through meritorious religiosity, our own dysfunctional efforts to keep our religious rites and God's law perfectly (perform), keep us away. In reference to the Jews, and their efforts to solve this problem, they kept adding more religious laws in order to bring some satisfaction to themselves that they were making a good effort. But honest Jews knew the futility of adding precept upon precept, statute to statute, performances upon performances, in any effort to keep one sanctified before God. They realized that the righteousness of God had to come from God alone, and based on His conditions. And, it had to be free.

RELIGIOUS MALPRACTICE

In reference to ourselves today, we often do the same as the Jews. For example, we construct a system of theology by which we can identify ourselves “faithful,” or the “true” church, of which we are “faithful” members. We construct a legal outline of law combined with approved religious rites, which are then supposedly obeyed without flaw. We stamp ourselves justified before God because other religious groups, who do not conform to our outline of doctrine, are deemed lawbreakers.

This is the religious environment into which Paul walked in Athens, and into which the Israelites digressed. He declared to the Athenians their idolatrous religiosity: “Men of Athens,” he proclaimed from Mars Hill, “I perceive that in all things you are very religious” (At 17:22). And they were, for he explained, “For as I passed by and observed your objects of worship ...” (At 17:23). All religionists establish either objects of worship that they deem necessary to promote and continue their religion. They declare solemn assemblies into which they call the faithful. In Israel's apostasy from God, the Israelites turned their faith into a system of religious rituals and twisted assemblies. One of the most striking denunciations of Israel in their days of apostasy was written by Isaiah:

“To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices to Me?” says the Lord. “I am full of the burnt offerings of rams .... And I do not delight in the blood of bulls, or of lambs, or of male goats. Bring no more vain offerings. Incense is an abomination to Me. The new moon and sabbath, the calling of assemblies—I cannot endure iniquity and the solemn assembly” (See Is 1:10-14).

Israel had built and treasured places of worship in which they performed their religiosity. They built “high places” where they could go and vainly worship God in the keeping of ritualized worship that was void of their hearts. Though the offering of sacrifices and the solemn assemblies were part of the Sinai law, their hearts had long vacated the performance of that which was required by the law. In their religiosity they had even turned the brazen serpent that was made by Moses into an object of worship. When Hezekiah initiated restoration in Israel, “he removed the high places and broke the images and ... broke in pieces the bronze serpent that Moses had made” (2 Kg 18:4). Hezekiah knew that if a restoration in Israel was to be realized, the people had to vacate their cherished places of assembly (“high places”), and thus, remove their ritualistic assemblies and objects of worship.

The problem with improvised systems of religiosity is that we are focusing on our own performance of law and religious rites in order to make ourselves right before God, while God says we are right through the cross. We make ourselves judges according to our outline of law, but not according to the grace of God. The result is that their hearts leave the performance of both law and our own religious rites. While God looks on our hearts, the religionist focuses on the performances of his religious rites. Religionists forget that “they have chosen their own ways and their soul delights in their abominations” (Is 66:3).

God has indeed given law, or instructions by which to live. But the problem is how we use His law to lead ourselves to believe that we are perfect law-keepers who have justified ourselves by law. Attempted self-justification through law-keeping, and/or religious rites, is contrary to our justification that comes freely through the cross. We keep law because we are justified, not in order to be justified. And therefore, we must be cautious about constructing a “systematic theology” by which we would judge others to be lawbreakers.

Our assemblies are the ideal example. We often satisfy ourselves that we have a proof-text for every point of our outline of systematic assembly. As long as the precepts of the outline of lawful assembly are performed, we believe that we have justified ourselves before God, and sanctified ourselves by performing a Sunday morning ritual. All who would be so sanctified must be in attendance at the lawful assembly that we have deemed to be “scriptural.”

Because we have kept ourselves from all others who do not legally perform our outline of assembly, we have become a denomination among those we accuse of being denominational. As Peter, Barnabas and other Jews in Antioch, who denominated themselves upon the basis of their supposed assembly rite with circumcised Jews only, we too have denominated ourselves from others in our efforts to bind on ourselves various assembly rites that are supposed to indicate our correct religious behavior (Gl 2:11-16). And the fact that we are disturbed because someone would even suggest that we have formulated our own catalog of assembly rites that define our particular group is evidence that we have done the very thing we condemn.

Unfortunately, we never consider checking the legal religiosity of what we are seeking to meritoriously perform. As the Pharisees, we have convinced ourselves that we can do that which is right, but at the same time, do it legally with a spirit of self-sanctification, and still be right in our own self-justification. Sunday assemblies, therefore, have often become an occasion where we weekly check our meritorious performance chart, and once checked, we content ourselves to be satisfied with our own self-righteousness, and thus judge ourselves to be among the faithful.

In order to determine if we are guilty of such meritorious religiosity, we should by chance change the way we as a group normally observe the Lord's Supper on Sunday morning. The more disturbance that is caused by doing things different from the usual will give us some idea of how meritoriously legal we have become in order to justify ourselves before God through the “performance” of something that could be accomplished in so many different ways.

The unfortunate problem with our meritorious religiosity is that the religionist can never be consistent in his own religious rites, especially if he assumes to have a proof-text for every point of obedience. This is clearly revealed in those performances we assume are necessary in our observance of the Lord's Supper. It would be good to take a moment to consider all the variables of the memorial that have been occasions for division among those who seem to have a proof-text for their particular manner by which they observe the Supper.

We become religionists when we behave as the Pharisees who did the same in reference to the Sabbath. We stack all sorts of “correctness” around the Lord's Supper in order that we justify ourselves correct before God. As the Pharisees lost sight of the intent of the Sabbath by obsessing and arguing over their religious rites with which they surrounded the Sabbath, we too often do the same in reference to the Lord's Supper. We subsequently stumble over our traditions, but forget the intent of what Jesus wanted us to remember in partaking together of the bread and fruit of the vine.

God knows, and we know, that we cannot, through the performance of law, or our own traditional religious rites, justify ourselves before Him. It is simply impossible for anyone to live perfectly according to law, or consistently according to the unique religious rites of each particular church group. And when we sin against law, there is no good work that will atone for our sinfulness. There is no formula of religiosity that will sanctify us of our fallibility. We have often thought it amusing that those who partake of the Lord's Supper in a unique manner that reminds us of our justification apart from law-keeping, often do so traditionally correct according to their unique ceremony of observance. They often legally seek to sanctify themselves by obediently drinking of the fruit of the vine that represents our free sanctification by the blood of Jesus. They seek to keep law in order to remember their freedom from law.

Neither our performance of law, nor our self-imposed religious ceremonies, can ever be a means of self-sanctification. Therefore, in order for one to stand just before God, God had to take action through the cross. This is exactly what the three thousand honest Jews on the day of Pentecost saw in the message of the gospel. They had for too long futilely sought to behave religiously correct in order to merit the favor of God. They were the masters at creating religious ceremonies. But sincere Jews had for a long time become frustrated with a pretense of self-sanctification before God. On Pentecost, Peter preached a message that exposed the fallacy of their own religiosity, which religiosity seven weeks before had driven them to crucify an innocent man, the very man who would clean up their religious malpractice.

The Pentecost visitors had journeyed to Jerusalem in obedience to law in order to merit their justification before God. But they saw in the gospel that future trips to Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost need never to be made again. They realized that in their efforts to perfectly keep law, no one could be justified before God. Also, atonement for violations of law through animal sacrifices was futile (See Gl 2:16). Religiosity in the performance of ceremonies was cancelled by the gospel. Grace corrected what self-sanctifying ceremonies could not. It was great news.

The message of the gospel that they realized in a moment was what many people today cannot discover over a great period of time, for they continue to perform religious rites weekly in order to self-sanctify themselves. Nevertheless, the immediate response of the three thousand reveals to us today a very important point: Justification through the cross can be understood and acted upon immediately. If it is not realized, then there is sin beneath the sin that hinders our lack of response to the gospel. If we are steeped in the traditions of our own religiosity that identifies our faith, then our hearts may be beyond being cut by the truth of the gospel. But the Jews on Pentecost were also steeped in centuries of tradition. At least three thousand were not so steeped in their own traditions that they could not see the immediate redemption that came through the cross. As a result, they responded accordingly.

The three thousand did not respond to another system of religiosity in order to be legally sanctified of their sins before God. It was this type of religion from which they fled. Peter did not hand them another outline of law in order that they again have an attempt at self-justification. Repentance and baptism were not announced from a legal perspective as an added law. Repentance and baptism were given as the road map for those who mourned over their inability to justify themselves before God. The road map was given as a way to connect with the heart of God that was freely revealed through the incarnation, death, burial, resurrection and ascension of the Son of God.

In this way the mournful did not transition from one legal system of self-justification through law-keeping to another meritorious system. Since the gospel was justification through the cross, and the blood offering was offered for the sanctification of their sins, they responded to the free offer by their repentant obedience to the gospel (baptism).

Baptism was the means of connectivity. As Abraham was obedient to God to offer his son because of faith, so in baptism our faith is revealed through the offering of ourselves to be baptized. In our baptism, therefore, God says to us the same as He said to Abraham at the time he sought to obediently offer his son: "... for now I know that you fear God, seeing you have not withheld your son, your only son from Me" (Gn 22:12).

The faith of Abraham and our faith are similar in our obedient walk in the righteousness of God. Abraham's obedient walk of faith revealed his righteousness before God. Our faith led us to the waters of baptism to wash away sins that kept us from the righteousness of God. Until baptism, we were out of contact with the blood of Jesus that cleanses us of all sins, which sins kept us as alien sinners and separated from God (At 2:38; 22:16). But after our obedience to the gospel, we walk, as Abraham, by faith in the righteousness of God that we received upon our obedience to the gospel.

Without any question, the new covenant of Jesus comes with laws to be obeyed. The problem is not with the laws that direct our lives, but how we view the purpose of the laws. Religion would dictate that law is given for the purpose of meritorious justification before God.

Grace, on the other hand, would declare that we are justified legally by the cross, and sanctified by the blood of Christ, apart from our perfect performance of law. Grace teaches that those who are obedient to law are already in a covenant relationship with God on the basis of their obedience to the gospel. They do not stay in this relationship through perfect law-keeping, but through grace.

Under grace there should never be the opportunity that law could be used as a self-justifying means by which one would continue in his or her relationship with God. Good works should never be the means to bypass the blood of Jesus in our sanctification before God.

Religion fails us whenever we bypass the cross of justification and the sanctifying blood in order to reach the heart of God. When God revealed His heart through the cross, He never intended that we should on the merit of law-keeping and good works reach His heart. If this were the case, we would never get there, for we all sin. If we could reach the heart of God on the basis of our own performance of law and good works, then there would have been no need for the cross. The gospel message on Pentecost would have had no appeal to the three thousand, for the religionists of Judaism had constructed a master plan of self-justification and self-sanctification in their efforts to be accepted by God on the merit of their own legal performances.

EMPOWERED BY THE GOSPEL

We cannot move on from the preceding chapter without noting the passive mood of the verbs of Romans 6:3: "*Or do you not know that as many of us as were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into His death?" The verbs "were baptized" in reference to the phrases "into Christ Jesus," and "into His death," are both passive. Passive means that the subject is acted upon. What Paul revealed is that the person who was baptized into Christ was acted upon by someone else. In baptism one gives himself over to another just as Isaac gave himself over to his father in order to be offered.

When one is baptized, Jesus has already acted upon the one baptized through the blood that comes from His sacrificial offering on the cross. The justification/sanctification through the blood offering of the Son of God happened at one time in the past for the cleansing of those who connect with the blood of Jesus in baptism after the cross. It is through His own blood that He acts upon the soul of those who offer themselves to God in baptism. The result of His blood offering at the cross continues to cleanse those who have offered themselves since the time He poured out His blood at the cross. In order to connect with the justification of the cross, and subsequent sanctification by the blood, one must make the offering of himself in baptism. He must be crucified with Christ.

This same passive verb was used by Paul when he said of himself, "I have been crucified with Christ" (Gl 2:20). Alfred Marshall, in his Greek-English interlinear, translated the passive verb, "I have been co-crucified." When we connect what Paul wrote to the Roman Christians, with what he said of himself, he concluded that the incarnate Son of God acted upon him through His sacrificial crucifixion on the cross. Though Paul, and the rest of us, have offered ourselves to be crucified with Christ years later, the effect of the blood that continues to flow from the cross reaches throughout history with a cleansing impact on all the obedient (offered).

In our obedience to the cross and resurrection (the gospel), we step into the realm of Jesus' crucifixion for all our sins. It is this thought that Paul had in mind when he reminded the Christians in Rome that the atonement of the cross was for all people of all time:

... whom God has set forth to be an atoning sacrifice by His blood through faith in order to declare His righteous for the remission of sins in the past because of the forbearance of God ... (Rm 3:25; see Hb 9:15)

This is the atoning sacrifice the three thousand saw and responded to on the day of Pentecost. Peter's instructions to their response was simply: "Repent and be baptized" (At 2:38).

What happened in their baptism was that they came into the realm of atonement for sins that was made available by the sacrificial offering of Jesus. In their response, they were subsequently "co-crucified" with Jesus. They, as Paul, after they were baptized, led the crucified life because they had been baptized into Christ, into a realm about which John later wrote, "*But if we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship with one another and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanses [sanctifies] us from all sin" (1 Jn 1:7).

The three thousand on the day of Pentecost had been steeped in the religion of their own self-justification for centuries. Through their obedience to the host of religious rites of Judaism, they had sought to self-righteously atone for their own sins. However, when the “fullness of time” came when their hearts were opened by the futility of being unable to atone for their own sins before God, they were ready for the gospel.

Unfortunately, there are too many deeply religious people today who are so steeped in the religiosity of their own religion that the “fullness of time” has not yet come for them. This is especially true of those religionists who are held in the bondage of their own feelings. The frustration of their experiential religiosity is revealed in a weekly emotional walk through a catalog of theatrical hysterics in a plea that God forgive their past sins. They do not realize that their emotional religiosity is a denial of the very thing for which they plea.

A Christian is emotionally stirred by the heart of God that was revealed through the incarnational offering of God's Son. His heart emotionally cries out in thanksgiving and wonder as to how God could love a sinner as himself through the offering of the cross while he was yet dead in his sins (Rm 5:8). Christians do not cry to God for appeasement. Theirs is a cry of rejoicing that the wrath of God was stayed by a blood offering on a wooden cross.

The emotional religionist, on the other hand, will cry out for a “miracle” in order to reassure himself that he is saved. Those who have grown in the grace and knowledge of Jesus simply open their Bibles and read of the glorious message of grace that surrounds the event of the gospel (2 Pt 3:18). It is therein that they are reaffirmed that they have been baptized into a relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Mt 28:19). No meritorious emotional experiences are needed, only mournful repentance.

It is indeed unfortunate when some seek to appease their own hearts through self-righteous religious behavior, and thus, miss the heart of God at the cross by trying to satisfy their own hearts. We must never forget that when we seek to sanctify ourselves through our own religious performances, we are bypassing the sanctification that God freely offers through His grace. When we are earnestly trying to justify ourselves, we close the door that would lead us into the realm of justification that Jesus freely offers through the cross. Too many of us stumble over our own religiosity in our efforts to get to the cross. Too many of us bypass the heart of God by focusing on pleasing our own hearts.

THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF GOD

Young people often have a difficult time with their self-esteem. We remember those days when we always thought something was wrong with how we looked, who would accept us, or if we fit in with the crowd. We were either too skinny or too fat. Our clothes were either out of style or too ragged. It seemed that something always made us question so many things about how we could be accepted by others. Young people often seek to have the approval of others in order to find their worth among their friends. Their behavior is often determined by how intensely they feel about being accepted by others.

What many of us have done when we grew into adulthood, is that we never overcame our desire to be accepted by everyone. As adults we often apply the same feelings to be accepted to our relationship with our heavenly Father. Our lack of self-confidence is projected into what we feel God feels toward us. Our relationship with God, therefore, becomes a daily performance on our part in order to gain His approval.

The unfortunate mental consequence of our spiritual inferiority complex is that we are continually seeking God's approval through our religious performances for Him. We forget that when we perform in order to be approved by God, we indirectly doubt the relationship we have with Him through Jesus. Because of our doubts concerning our acceptance by God, we stress ourselves over the performance of our duties.

The beautiful thing about the gospel is that it builds self-confidence. The gospel builds our confidence in God through the cross, not in our efforts to earn His approval. When we understand that God considers us precious in His sight, then we feel a great sense of worth. When we understand that He has accepted us through Jesus, then every day of our lives is not a frustrating struggle to earn His approval. Regardless of how we may feel about ourselves, or what we perceive others think of us, God considers us valuable, so valuable that He was willing to give His Son for us. And when we understand that He injects in us His righteousness upon our obedience to the gospel, it is then that all the other nonsense of the approval ratings of the world simply vanish away.

When we finally realize the unprejudiced heart of our loving God, we make a marvelous discovery. It is a discovery that transforms our total outlook on life. This is what God seeks to do with everyone through the gospel of Jesus Christ. Through the gospel, and our obedience thereof, He gives us notice of His approval (righteousness). This is what Paul meant when he stated, “I declare to you the gospel ... in which you stand” (1 Co 15:1). This is the power of the gospel unto our salvation from ourselves.

We can be assured that God has overlooked all those flaws in our lives that we thought separated us from Him. When God examines our lives, He looks directly into our hearts in order that He might sanctify us through the blood of His Son. Once we gain the confidence of the blood of His Son, we can truly feel that “we’re good” in our relationship with Him, and because of Him.

In order to start down this road of discovering the heart of the God who loves us, we must first know that we are not alone with our own spiritual inferiority complexes. Over two thousand years ago there was a great company of religious people who struggled with this very problem. And in only one day, the gospel changed their lives forever.

During His ministry, Jesus had prepared this audience, who would for the first time, hear the gospel on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30. About three years before Pentecost, and at the beginning of His ministry, He spoke to an audience of Jews who had been stuck in the mire of their own spiritual inferiority complexes in reference to self-seeking righteousness. Jesus promised them, “Blessed are those who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they will be filled” (Mt 5:6).

Only when one comes to the spiritual reality of his own inability to be righteous before God through the futile efforts of keeping God’s law perfectly, and attempting to atone for sin with good works, will he mourn over his spiritual predicament. We might look at this from the viewpoint of our own lack of religious self-esteem. In other words, it is only when we feel bad enough about ourselves that we will seek for something, or Someone, who can make us feel better about ourselves in our relationship with God.

But before we can establish a reassuring relationship with God, we must first mourn over our inability to be right before Him through our own power. Only through mourning over our inability will we begin to discover the ability of the gospel to make us right before God. In fact, we would say that we cannot truly understand the power of the gospel unless we mourn over our hopeless predicament of trying to make ourselves right before God.

There is good news for the mournful. In the same context of the Sermon on the Mount in which Jesus made the preceding promise of being filled, He opened a door of hope. He promised that those who humbly come to the point of mourning over their lack of spiritual self-esteem that “they will be comforted” (Mt 5:4). They could not be comforted in the performance of their own religiosity. This was what caused the problem. Neither could they be comforted by God accepting their own devised good works to atone for their flaws. Religion had failed them. The mournful are always in doubt as to whether they have accomplished enough good works to atone for their sins.

Jesus promised that those who would mourn over their own inability to be righteous (justified) before God, would be comforted by God. They would be comforted if they took the initiative to reach out for His righteousness (Rm 5:8). It would be the mournful, therefore, who would be filled with the righteousness of God. Those who feel despondent because of their lack of spiritual esteem must gaze into the gospel of the heart of God at the cross. It is there that one will discover the power of the gospel, and subsequently, discover the way to spiritual self-esteem.

We live in a world where “church” (religion) has often failed to comfort the weary. Thousands have failed to find any comfort in institutional “church” religion, and thus they no longer show up at the altar to sit idly on pews as lonely spectators. Many are simply frustrated in their efforts to find comfort for their problems in life through the ceremonial performances of “church services.” When we invite the wayward to “come to church,” they think they are being invited to another religion, the very thing that many people have fled. They feel they can be just as lonely in their homes as they would be in a mass assembly of socially inert spectators, who themselves are also often lonely.

But herein is the opportunity for the gospel of God’s heart to bring comfort. What “church attendance” could not provide through ceremonial performances, the gospel can. However, in order to bring the gospel to life in our lives, we must deconstruct the religion of our legalism and moralism. Many people have left the insufficiency of legal religion, or the moralism with which a religionist is rightly accused of being hypocritical. When we understand the true nature of the gospel, that it is neither legalism, nor moral perfectionism, then others will begin to see in us a righteousness that is not from us, but from God. This is the power of gospel living. When people start seeing in us grateful joy, it is then that they will start asking questions. And as Peter stated, we must “be ready always to give a defense [answer] to everyone who asks you a reason for the hope that is in you ...” (1 Pt 3:15).

We must consider again the imputed righteousness of God that flows from the cross in order that our lives are a testimony to others concerning the power of living the gospel. We must first understand that the word “righteousness” refers also to doing that which is right. However, we must not confuse this “right doing” with the righteousness that comes from God as a result of His justification that flows from the cross. The righteousness that comes into our lives from God makes our lives as if we have done everything right in His sight.

Our efforts to do right on our own are always insufficient, but not insignificant. What God did right towards us was to perfect us through Christ. What we do right for Him is always imperfect in reference to our efforts to justify ourselves before Him. Only in understanding this can we understand what Jesus meant when He stated, “Therefore, you are to be perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect” (Mt 5:48). Jesus’ immediate disciples did not comprehend this until the revelation of the righteousness of God that was revealed at the cross. It would be then that they would understand that because God is perfect, any righteousness that would come from Him would perfect us.

The Greek word for “righteousness” is the same root word for “justification.” The justified are righteous before God because God has made them legally perfect regardless of their insufficient righteousness through law-keeping and good works. We are thus righteous before God because we have been justified through the advocacy of Jesus. In being justified, we are as if we had done all things right in the eyes of God.

When we compare our imperfect self-righteousness through works and law-keeping, with God’s righteousness, there is really no comparison. Whatever righteousness we may offer is accepted only on the basis of His righteousness that we receive through the cross. In fact, it is His righteousness in us that motivates righteous living in us. We are thus driven to His justification (righteousness) in order that we might stand righteous before Him on the basis of what He has done for us, not on the basis of what we have done in order to earn His righteousness.

When Paul considered all his righteousness before he was cut to the heart by the righteousness of God, he said, “I count them [my former meritorious works] refuse so that I may gain Christ” (See Ph 3:3-8). This is our response to the gospel in which we stand (1 Co 15:1). When we, as Paul, become frustrated with trying to be righteous ourselves, we thirst for the righteousness that comes from God. We have obeyed the gospel, therefore, because we knew that we would be made right with God through Jesus.

As Christians, we seek to respond to the gospel with righteous living because we have already been declared righteous through our obedience to the gospel. This is gospel living. However, we caution ourselves that we do not revert back to our former life of trying to gain the righteousness of God through our own righteousness. In Matthew 6 Jesus exhorted, “Take heed that you do not do your deeds of righteousness before men, to be seen by them” (Mt 6:1). The use of the word “righteousness” in this text is in reference to “doing that which is right,” which in this case, was doing good for others for the purpose of self-glorification. It is here that we must be cautious in reference to the place of our righteousness (works) in reference to God’s righteousness that we have as a result of our obedience to the gospel.

Jesus continued to admonish, “When you do good deeds, do not sound a trumpet before you ...” (Mt 6:2). We must not “do good deeds” (righteousness) in order to earn something from God. In this case, the “trumpet blowers” not only sought the glory of men, but also meritorious justification before God. There is a difference between “trumpet blowing” righteousness, and doing righteous deeds in response to the word of God. Righteousness in response to God is the righteousness about which Paul spoke on Mars Hill in Athens: “But in every nation he who fears Him and works righteousness is accepted by Him” (At 17:35). Paul was not stating that in doing our good deeds to others we are meritoriously justified before God. If this were true, then it would reverse our justification before God through His “good deed” for us at the cross. What Paul was saying to the audience of those who walked by faith was that in every nation, whether Jew or Gentile, those who responded to the gospel by faith are accepted by God. And since God “will judge the world in righteousness by the Man whom He has ordained,” then it is imperative that through faith all men must turn from the merit of their own righteousness to the righteousness of God that has been made available through the risen Christ (At 17:31). Therefore, God “commands all men everywhere to repent” (At 17:30).

The problem with “trumpet blowing” righteousness is that we assume that the acceptance of our good deeds (righteousness) by others necessitates that our deeds of righteousness are also accepted by God as atonement for our sins. This is a fatal assumption, and one that the honest and sincere person would never make. This problem intensifies when we place religious connotations on our righteousness, and then assume that our religious righteousness is sufficient for the atonement of our sins.

Our righteous deeds for others, as well as our righteousness by religious rites, cannot supplement God’s righteousness that He provides through the gospel. If we would conclude that God's deed at the cross needed to be supplemented by our own righteousness, then we would be affirming that the righteousness that God offered at the cross was insufficient.

We must understand that God's imputed righteousness (justification) at the cross is neither supplemented nor cancelled by our righteous deeds that we do for others in response to His righteousness in our lives. The fact is that the Christian does good deeds for others because of God's good deed (righteousness) for him at the cross. We do right things for others because He made us right through Jesus. This is what Peter meant in Acts 17:35. Those who fear God are those in every nation who have submitted to God. Because they have submitted, they work righteousness (do good). They are not accepted on the merit of their work of righteousness. They are accepted because they feared (obeyed) God.

This determines the difference between religion and gospel. Religionist would say, "I do righteousness (good deeds), therefore, I am accepted." But the one who obeys the gospel says, "I am thankful to the Father, and therefore, I do good deeds (righteousness)" (Ep 2:10). Few who are self-righteous yearn for the righteousness of God. If one thinks he is already there, he has no desire to go.

In the context of the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus turned His thoughts to the righteousness that comes from God: "But seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness ..." (Mt 6:33). Jesus spoke here in order to contrast the self-seeking righteousness of the "trumpet blowing" religionists of His audience with the righteousness that God would give through the justification of the cross. This would be the righteousness that God would give through the offering of His Son to justify us before Him. It is for this righteousness, Jesus said, that we must hunger and thirst. It is only when we realize the insufficiency of our own righteousness that we will seek to be right before God through the gospel.

God seeks to have us close to His heart. In order to get there, we must be declared righteous by Him. That declaration is made when we are raised with His Son from the grave of water. We can come close to the heart of God only by confessing our own insufficiency to get there on the basis of our own righteousness. Paul was more straightforward. He said that we should consider our own self-righteousness as refuse, as he did his before his obedience to the gospel (See Gr. of Ph 3:8).

We cannot live flawlessly in reference to the law of God. We cannot atone for our flawed living through meritorious righteousness. God knows this. When we begin to mourn over our hopeless predicament of self-righteousness, it is only then that we begin to understand all that God did for us in releasing His heart to us through the eternally incarnate Son who was offered that we might be declared righteous. This is the heart of God. It is this "doing-right-on-our-behalf" (righteousness) after which we hunger and thirst.

When we in some way begin to understand how far God had to come to retrieve us out of our doomed predicament of self-righteousness, we begin to understand the heart of God that was nailed to the cross.

ROMANS AND RIGHTEOUSNESS

In the epistle of Romans, Paul argues against those who would seek to justify themselves before God on the basis of their own righteousness, whether in reference to law-keeping or good works. He focuses on contrasting God's righteousness that accompanied Jesus to the cross, with our self-righteousness by which we would seek to earn God's favor. In the contrast, he argues that self-righteousness cannot replace or subsidize the righteousness of God.

Paul began his argument by stating, "I am ready to preach the gospel to you also who are at Rome" (Rm 1:15). "For I am not ashamed of the gospel ... for it is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith, as it is written, 'The just will live by faith'" (Rm 1:16,17).

Man's righteousness (good deeds) cannot set aside or cancel the gospel of God's righteousness that was revealed through the incarnational offering of the Son of God. God's righteousness was revealed through the faith of Jesus who obediently went to the cross on our behalf (Hb 5:8). And because He was obedient, "He became the author of eternal salvation to all those who obey Him" (Hb 5:9). Through obedience, Jesus made God's righteousness available. It is free to those who would accept it on the foundation of their obedient faith in Him. In this way, the justified "live by faith." They are righteous in their gospel living because of their obedient faith.

In Romans 3 Paul contrasts our unrighteousness in reference to the truth of the gospel: "There is none righ- teous, no, not one” (Rm 3:10). And for this reason, “our unrighteousness demonstrates [manifests] the righteousness of God” (Rm 3:5). While we were yet unrighteous, God revealed His righteousness through Jesus (Rm 5:8). Our dysfunctional performance reveals that our self-righteousness is actually unrighteousness. And because our self-righteousness is always unrighteousness in the eyes of God, we are in dire need of His righteousness. It is for this reason that any of our attempts to be perfect before God on the basis of our performance of either law or our own self-righteous good works, is futile. We cannot be righteous before God on the basis of our own religiosity. The more the religionist performs his own self-righteousness in order to be justified before God, the more difficult it is for him to accept the righteousness of God.

The religionist often seeks to demonstrate his or her own righteousness through religious performances of good deeds and meritorious religious rites or ceremonies. But in reference to the law of God, we are all unrighteous, regardless of any “trumpet blowing” righteousness that we may seek to offer to God. The more we understand the insufficiency of our own unrighteousness, the more we appreciate the righteousness of God that was revealed through the gospel of Jesus.

The more we seek to perform our own righteousness in order to justify ourselves, the more we are attacking the very heart of the gospel. Self-justification through the performance of self-righteous good works and religious ceremonies deny the sufficiency of the gospel. However, those who honestly understand the insufficiency of their own righteousness, will hunger and thirst after the righteousness of God that comes through the gospel of God's grace.

So what will we do in reference to our inability to perform law perfectly in order to declare our own righteousness before God? The answer is that we cannot declare our own meritorious righteousness. Paul answered, “But now the righteousness of God without law is manifested” (Rm 3:21). He encourages everyone who would live by faith to seek “the righteousness of God that is by the faith of Jesus Christ to all those who believe, for there is no difference” (Rm 3:22).

It must be noted here in the phrase “the faith of Jesus Christ,” that the article “the” is not in the Greek text. Some translators, unfortunately, have taken the liberty to add the preposition “in,” thus changing the focus of faith from Jesus to ourselves. This is an unfortunate supposition and one that actually misses the emphasis of the faith of Jesus in the Father in going to the cross on our behalf. We must not forget the statement of the Hebrew writer: “Though He was a Son, He learned obedi- ence by the things that He suffered” (Hb 5:8). Through obedient faith in the Father, Jesus went to the cross on our behalf.

The addition of the article to the translation of Romans 3:22 is a supposition that weakens the intensity of the sacrifice that Jesus offered. From the cross, and in His final moments of life, Jesus, with a loud voice, cried out, “Father, into Your hands I commend My spirit” (Lk 23:46). Herein was revealed the faith of Jesus for us. When we speak of the gospel, therefore, the faith of Christ Jesus plays a central part. Through His faith He went to the cross, and by our faith we respond to the cross.

John referred to “the faith of Jesus” when he wrote of the perseverance of the saints “who keep the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus” (Rv 14:12). The faith of Jesus in going to the cross on our behalf was a central argument of Paul in Galatians 2 when he referred to our justification before God. Paul placed the emphasis of our justification on Christ, “knowing that a man is not justified by works of law, but by the faith of Christ Jesus” (Gl 2:16). “The faith of Christ Jesus” is the literal translation of this text, even though some translators have also here rendered the reading with the phrase “in Christ Jesus.” The preposition “in” is not in the text. In making this supposition, some translators have shifted the work of justification from Jesus to us. But the text teaches that our justification was first laid on the shoulders of Jesus. By faith, He went to the cross in order to make justification available to all those who would come to Him by faith. Using the word “in” would place on us the responsibility to respond to “the faith of Jesus,” about which John wrote in Revelation. We must believe “in” Jesus Christ. However, we must not extract the faith of Jesus from the enactment of the gospel. We are “justified by the faith of Christ” (Gl 2:16). In Christ “we have boldness and access with confidence through the faith of Him” who went to the cross for us (Ep 3:12). This is “the faith of the gospel” (Ph 1:27). Our confidence for our justification is not in ourselves, but in Him (See Ph 3:9). The point is that our faith is in Him who justified us before the Father.

The appropriation of the righteousness of God is a spiritual partnership between Jesus and us. Through His faith in the Father, Jesus went to the cross for us. Through our faith in Him, we accept the fact that He went there for us. “There is no difference (separation)” between the faith of Jesus and our faith in reference to the availability of the righteousness of God and our salvation. Without His obedient faith, we would never have had the righteousness of God made available. Without our faith in Him, there would be no connection with the righteousness of God that was offered through Him.

The righteousness of God in gospel living is made possible through the faith of both Jesus and ourselves. Therefore, it is a connection of faith. By His faith and our faith we are “justified freely by His [God’s] grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rm 3:24). All this was for the purpose of declaring the righteousness of God, not ours. It is Jesus ...

... whom God has set forth to be an atoning sacrifice by His blood through faith in order to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins in the past because of the forbearance of God (Rm 3:25).

God’s justice had to be revealed at the cross in order “to declare at this time ... His righteousness that He might be just and the justifier of him who believes in Jesus” (Rm 3:26). For this reason, the justification (righteousness) of God was applied to all people of faith of all time, both before and after the cross. In this, God was declared righteous in creating those who could not live flawlessly before Him. And in the acceptance of His righteousness through faith, we partake of His righteousness.

As it would not have been just for God to create those who could not live without sinning, and thus would be condemned to hell because of sin, so it would not be just for some to be involuntarily saved without obediently responding to the gospel of God’s justification through Jesus. Therefore, God is judged righteous (just) to condemn the disobedient to hell because of His offer of justification through Jesus. At the same time, the obedient are judged righteous in order to be saved because they have responded to God’s righteousness that was offered through the cross. Our obedience to the gospel is what brings one into the realm of God’s righteousness. Through disobedience of the gospel, the one who is dead in sin will continue unto certain condemnation (2 Th 1:6-9).

Since we are justified through the righteous deed of the Father through the Son, Paul asks, “Where then is boasting [of our own righteousness]” (Rm 3:27)? The answer to the question is simple and logical: “It is excluded” (Rm 3:27). We have no occasion to boast in our own self-righteousness when the righteousness of God at the cross took care of that for which we could not do for ourselves. The religionist must remember this very important point: Self-righteous religious rites can never be used to either proclaim one’s own righteousness, or be considered a subsidy for the righteous work of God through the cross.

DECLARATION OF RIGHTEOUSNESS

Paul now brings Abraham into the picture in Romans concerning our faith. “What then will we say that Abraham, our forefather, has discovered according to the [works of the] flesh?” (Rm 4:1). Notice carefully how Paul words this argument: “For if Abraham was justified by works [of merit], he has something about which to boast, but not before God” (Rm 4:2).

Abraham’s performance of works did not justify him before God. Justification by meritorious works never enter into Abraham’s mind. On the contrary, “Abraham believed God and it was credited to him for righteousness” (Rm 4:3). Abraham believed before he made the offering of his son, and because he believed, he offered his son. He was credited righteous, therefore, not because of the offering, but because of his faith.

We sometimes forget when Abraham first exercised his faith in God. Abraham’s faith was first illustrated when God called him to leave his home in Ur of the Chaldeas and go to a land he did not know. “By faith

Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place that he would later receive as an inheritance, obeyed” (Hb 11:8). Because of his obedience, his faith was declared. He was declared righteous before God because of his obedient faith long before God called on him to offer his son, Isaac. It is for this reason that the offering of his son was not meritorious. He had already been declared righteous before God because he acted on his faith to obey God’s command to leave his homeland and go to a land that his descendants would eventually receive as an inheritance. Here is the point:

But to him who does not work [meritoriously for his own righteousness], but believes in Him who justifies the ungodly [regardless of his inability to perform flawlessly], his faith is credited for righteousness (Rm 4:5).

Abraham, and all those of whom he is the father of faith, are the blessed “man to whom God credits righteousness without works [of merit]” (Rm 4:6). Because of his obedient faith, Abraham was credited with the righteousness of God before he obeyed the command of God to offer his son.

Abraham was a Gentile, and thus as an uncircumcised Gentile, he became the father of all who would be credited righteous before God apart from meritorious law-keeping. When we obey the gospel, it is at that time that we are accredited righteous before God. Abraham first believed, and then he obeyed to offer his son. In this way, we must first believe, and then through the offering of ourselves with Jesus on the cross we are declared righteous. We are declared righteous by God before there is any opportunity to work righteousness in our life as a Christian. As Abraham was declared righteous by the offering of his son, we are declared righteous by the offering of ourselves.

We are credited righteous as obedient believers before we have an opportunity to do our first good work as a Christian. This is the meaning behind what Paul wrote to the Ephesian Christians: “For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works...” (Ep 2:10). When our faith moves us to crucify ourselves, we are baptized into Christ in obedience to the gospel (Rm 6:3-6). It is then that we are declared righteous, and not before our obedience expresses our faith.

Our workmanship begins when we are baptized into Christ. We are not declared righteous in order to come into Christ. God worked on our behalf at the cross in order that we have the opportunity to do good works after we have obeyed the gospel. Therefore, we are not created in Christ Jesus by good works, but for good works. We are not created in Christ Jesus because of our own righteousness, but by the righteous work of God through the cross.

Because of his faith when he left Ur of the Chaldeas, Abraham was credited righteous before God, and thus was blessed to be the father of all those who would come into Christ through obedient faith.

And he [Abraham] received the sign of circumcision, a seal of the righteousness of the faith that he had while being uncircumcised, that he might be the father of all those who believe, though they are not circumcised, so that righteousness might be credited to them also (Rm 4:11).

Those who would seek to establish their own righteousness through meritorious good works have cheated themselves by working in reverse of the righteousness of God and good works that God offers. Abraham was not accredited righteous because of his obedience to the law of circumcision. He was first declared righteous before God through his faith long before the law of circumcision was given (See Gn 17). And because he was declared righteous through his demonstrated faith, he was obedient to obey also the law of circumcision.

If we seek to declare our own righteousness through meritorious works, then we have marginalized the “abundance of grace and of the gift of the righteousness” of God that we might “reign in life through the one, Jesus Christ” (Rm 5:17). We have sought to earn that which God has given as a gift. If God's righteousness is something that is earned, then it is no longer a gift.

Through the sin of Adam, sin was introduced into the world wherein all of us sin, and thus are spiritually separated from God (Rm 6:23). But “through the righteousness of one [Jesus Christ], the free gift came to all men to justification of life” (Rm 5:18). All men were not involuntary made sinners through the sin of Adam (Rm 5:19). If this were true, then all men would have been made involuntarily righteous through the justification of the cross. Paul explained, “... even so through the obedience of one [Jesus] will many be made righteous” (Rm 5:19). The passage reads “will,” not “would.” Through the obedience of Jesus on the cross, the opportunity for righteousness was made available to all those who chose to come to the Father through faith. In order to accept the offer of the righteousness of God, therefore, we must through faith voluntarily respond to the heart of God that was nailed to the cross.

Paul wanted to make sure that his fellow Jewish Christians got the point concerning their former sinful state. In order to exemplify sin, the Sinai “law entered so that the offense might abound” (Rm 5:20). Law brought the realization of death because it exemplified the fact that we are all lawbreakers. The law was good in that it informed the Jews that they were sinners. The more the honest Jews mourned over their death in sin because they were lawbreakers, the more they hungered and thirsted after the righteousness of God that was revealed through Jesus. This explains the phenomenal response of three thousand on the A.D. 30 Pentecost.

It is in our state of mourning over our unrighteousness that we are motivated unto what Paul stated, “obedience to righteousness” (Rm 6:16). As alien sinners, we were not obedient because we were righteous. It was because we were alien sinners that we realized we were unrighteous, and by this realization, we were drawn to the righteousness of God. When the alien sinner thus sees the inadequacy of his own self-righteousness, he is willing to do anything that God would ask of him in order to receive His righteousness.

When one sees the righteousness of God that is offered freely at the cross, he seeks for this righteousness for which he could not attain through his own meritorious righteousness. The revelation of the righteousness of God at the cross draws us to obedience of the gospel in baptism. This is what Jesus meant when He said, “And I, if I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to Me” (Jn 12:32). Mournful sinners are always drawn to the gospel of God’s righteousness.

When we are declared righteous because of our forgiveness of sins in baptism, this righteousness in turn becomes the impetus, or motivation, to do good works in thanksgiving to God for making us righteous before Him through the cross. When our sins are washed away in baptism, we become “bondservants of righteousness” (Rm 6:18). The Christian serves because of the righteousness he has received in Christ, not in order to work himself into being righteous before God. This is the difference between Christianity and religion.

Our message to the religious world that seeks to establish its own righteousness would be as Paul wrote in Romans 10:3: “For they being ignorant of God’s righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God.”

A MATTER OF THE HEART

We remember this heartwarming revelation: “For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son ...” (Jn 3:16). This is a statement that expresses the heart of God. It is a statement of the centrality of the gospel of grace.

It is our challenge as finite beings to seek to comprehend the biblical definition of the heart in reference to both God and man. Unfortunately, we are prejudiced by our human emotions. We stumble over our inadequate intellect. But in some way, the revelation of the heart of God can be understood by even us. For example, in response to the gospel of the heart of God that was revealed on the day of Pentecost, about three thousand people were “cut to the heart” (At 2:37). There was something that was said by the apostles on that day that cut right to the heart of the people. Therefore, we seek to understand why three thousand people in one day could respond so emphatically to something that was of Divine revelation.

We unfortunately assume that the three thousand were “cut to their emotions.” But the text says “heart,” not emotions. There are some who suppose that in response to the gospel on that day, there were people who started jumping up and down, falling on the ground, or speaking in tongues of gibberish. But this is reading our wrong emotional response into the occasion of the event. It would be easy to understand what was revealed if there were only a human emotional response. We understand our own emotions, but what was revealed on that day did not lead three thousand people to respond with uncontrollable emotions.

What happened on that glorious day was that the “John 3:16 heart” of God was first proclaimed in history. This revelation of God’s love through Jesus cut to the heart of those who heard the gospel for the first time. When they heard that “God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son,” there was an overwhelming response on their part to the offering of God on behalf of their salvational needs that they knew they were lacking. It was a heart wrenching revelation that caused a heart wrenching response. The gospel was more than an event, and the response was more than obedience to law or emotional chaos.

The gospel reaches right to our hearts. There are some very important things we must understand in order to better understand how God’s revelation of His heart on the cross touched the hearts men. When Peter and the apostles proclaimed the gospel for the first time in history, they indeed dealt with the “mind” of man. Facts and events were conveyed to the people. But it takes more than knowledge of facts to cut one to the heart. Nevertheless, the revelation of the heart of God first begins with revealed words.

But Peter, standing up with the eleven, lifted up his voice and said to them, “You men of Judea and all you who dwell in Jerusalem, let this be known to you and give heed to my words ...” (At 2:14).

Information concerning the event of the gospel was imparted to the minds of those who were present (See At 2:15-36). When the facts and events about the prophecy, incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection and ascension were concluded, Peter reminded the heart-stricken audience, “God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ” (At 2:36).

The people knew all the Old Testament background information that led up to this statement. They knew all the prophecies. They knew the prophecies concerning the Messiah being seated on the throne of David. Add to this the fact that they also concluded that it was futile to seek justification before God through perfect obedience of law. They had also concluded that sins before God could not find atonement in either animal blood or good works. They assumed, according to what they understood from prophecy, that something, or Someone, must deal with their sin problem and separation from God (Is 59:2).

Add to the preceding the fact that the Jews had little understanding of the resurrection. In fact, the Sadducees even denied the resurrection of the dead (At 23:8). But in hearing the good news that Jesus was raised up, and then ascended to sit on David's throne in heaven, things began to happen in their hearts. They reasoned that the body of Jesus had not been stolen away by the disciples as the religious leaders falsely reported (Mt 28:11-15). Jesus was actually raised from the dead. When they started bringing together all their knowledge of prophecy, events and facts, the gospel message began to move from their heads to their hearts.

The gospel of the cross and resurrection triggered their hearts because of what they already knew from centuries of studying the Law and the Prophets. At the same time, they judged themselves guilty of a lifetime of sin. And besides this, many of them had encouraged the crucifixion of the innocent One seven weeks before.

They stood there before the apostles, therefore, condemned with sin and guilt. And for this reason, the heart of God that was revealed on the cross penetrated right to their own hearts. The following statement was actually a plea for help: "Men and brethren, what will we do?" (At 2:37).

This was not a plea for another set of rules by which they might legally attempt to obey in order to rectify their sin before God. They had tried that approach for a relationship with God for centuries, but to no avail. They knew that they were lawbreakers who were living in the frustration of their own fallibility.

Concerning their spiritual situation, Paul made the following statement many years later:

For the grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lust, we should live sensibly, righteously and godly in this present age ... (Ti 2:12,13).

This is what happened on the first memorial Sunday of this dispensation of time. The "grace of God that brings salvation" appeared on the cross and was announced on Pentecost (Ti 2:11). Jesus was the grace of God that appeared while the Pentecost audience was still in sin. They knew they were undeserving of this grace. Nevertheless, "God demonstrates His love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rm 5:8). Herein is revealed the heart of God to which those on Pentecost responded.

Three thousand people stood stunned in the audience when this gospel message was first announced on the Pentecost of A.D. 30. The action of the incarnation, cross, resurrection and ascension of the heart of God was revealed to those who had lost heart in their futile efforts of self-justification. And since they confessed to the futility of their own efforts to make themselves right before God, their hearts were touched by what God had done for them. The result of the message was that the three thousand relinquished to the heart of God that was revealed through the Lord Jesus Christ.

Grace was revealed, and clearly understood. There needed to be no delay in a response. The response of about three thousand happened in the same day. In some cases in the first century, the response happened in the same hour of the night (At 16:33). It does not take a great deal of time to understand the gospel.

Peter and the apostles communicated the prophecies and events surrounding the gospel to the minds of all those who were present on the day of Pentecost. The response of the people also involved their emotions. However, in their emotional response to the revelation of the heart of God on the cross, they were not justified. If they were justified by their emotional response (belief in the gospel event), then their justification would have depended on their emotions. Again, they would have created a self-imposed righteousness that was dependent on human emotions, but short of all that which had to be done in order to restore their relationship with God. The problem was that they were burdened with sin that continued to keep them separated from God.

The effect of the gospel is not enacted solely by emotions, or belief that stirs emotions. It is obediently enacted in our lives by our emotional response to our knowledge of the action of God through the incarnation, death, resurrection and ascension of the Son of God. We must not forget that the three thousand asked what they must "do." Belief and emotions had brought them to the brink of asking what to do, but their emotional response needed a God-given answer in order that they do according to God's will.

In the world today this is one of the most confusing points in the religious world. It is believed that an emotional response ("believe on Jesus" or "receive Jesus") is equated with salvation. If one would only have some emotional experience of belief in response to the heart of God, then it is supposed that one is forgiven of all sins. Emotional responses thus become the only condition for one's salvation. If this were true, then it would place us right back into the condition from which we seek to be delivered through the gospel, that is, deliverance from our own self-centered righteousness.

Emotional experiential religion falls into the same category as "self-made" religiosity by which some in Colosse and Galatia supposed they could be justified before God. Both systems of religion, however, are meritorious. The experientialist is basing his faith, and thus saving himself, on the merit of his own emotional experience. Likewise, the legalist bases his faith on, and thus seeks to save himself, on the meritorious obedience to an outline of law. Both systems are legal and inadequate for the remission of sins that keep one separated from God.

The experientialist makes his emotions a legal requirement for self-justification; the legalist makes his performance of law a legal requirement for the same self-justification. Unfortunately, the adherents to both systems of religion become self-appointed judges of one another and others. The experientialist judges his fellow adherents to be on a lower level of spirituality than himself because he or she has not "spoken in tongues," or had some other hysterical outburst of emotionality. The legalist judges his fellow adherent of not being "faithful" because he supposedly does not conform to a legal chart that explains steps that one must take in order to be saved.

When the experientialists and legalists divide into different sects, they become judges of one another. The experientialists judge the legalists by saying that the legalists have no emotions, and their assemblies are dead. The legalists judge the experientialists by saying that they have no respect for the law of God. Unfortunately, both are making their judgments of one another on the basis of their self-made religiosity. On the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30, the honest Jews who were in the camp of the legalists, realized that their camp was dead wrong. Law had made them spiritually dead, and brought them to the point of spiritual frustration (See Rm 7:9).

The revelation of the heart of God reaches into the mind of the legalist, who must honestly confess that through meritorious legalities, no one can stand righteous before God (See Gl 2:16). The revelation of the heart of God also reaches into the emotions of the honest experientialist who confesses that after he has exhausted all his emotions, he too feels unrighteous before God. Therefore, only honest hearts can respond to the revelation of the heart of God that was revealed on the cross and first spoken by the apostles on the A.D. 30 Pentecost over two thousand years ago. Faith has not been the same since.

DEFINING THE HEART

The biblical definition of our heart would include our minds (intellect) and emotions, but according to a biblical definition, would certainly go beyond these two limitations. The Acts 2:37 passage states that the people were "cut to the heart." Information concerning the facts of the gospel were truly given in order to reach their minds. They reasoned that what Peter revealed was true and according to prophecy, and the fact of the resurrection. And because the people realized that the facts and events of the gospel were true, they emotionally responded by being "cut to the heart." But their heart response did not end there. It went beyond their minds and emotions.

Their request, "What must we do," means that they had to do something beyond their minds and emotions. The gospel moved them into action. Their minds and emotions were the foundation upon which there was motivation in their hearts to ask Peter and the apostles where they should go from their minds and emotions to being restored to a reconciled relationship with God. They wanted to know what to do. The heart is the basic motivation or desire of the individual to do something in response to what is learned and felt.

Because the gospel goes deeper than our minds and emotions, it generates action. When the gospel touches our hearts, we must respond. It is in this way that the grace of God reaches and teaches us. The gospel is the motive that inspires a paradigm shift in our motivation, and thus in our behavior. Grace is the impetus to flee disobedience in order to please our Father. This was the substance of what Paul wrote to the disciples in Rome: "Do we then make void law through faith [in the grace of God]? Certainly not! On the contrary, we establish law" (Rm 3:31). The gospel touches our heart in a way that we cry out to God for instructions to obey.

The three thousand on the day of Pentecost initially responded with the question, "Men and brethren, what will we do?" Once their hearts were touched by the action (heart) of God on the cross (the gospel), they were really asking, “Father, give us instructions concerning what we must now do?” Peter’s instructions were in reference to “doing” that which was relevant to people whose hearts had been touched. The “do” was simply: “Repent and be baptized” (At 2:38).

Their response in baptism, therefore, was never meant to be another legality. It was a heart response to the revealed heart of their Father. In their desire to come again into a reconciled relationship with their Father, the Holy Spirit revealed that they had to be crucified with Christ, buried with Christ, in order to be raised with Christ (Rm 6:3-6; Gl 2:20). All this was necessary in order that they be eternally with God (2 Th 1:6-9). Baptism was the means of connection in order to be in a relationship with the Father in the present. It was not a legality to be added to a host of laws that had actually brought them to ask the question concerning how to be reconciled to the Father.

Consider for a moment the one who simply believes on Jesus in his mind and with his emotions. He believes the gospel to the point of responding to the cross in hope of the resurrection to come. However, he will cut himself short of all that which he desires in a relationship with God if his mind and emotions do not move him to ask, “What must I now do.” When the “do” is completed through repentance and baptism, then he can go on his way rejoicing. But until then, the heart of God through the gospel has not motivated him to do that which he must do in order to restore his relationship with God.

People, unfortunately, like to use hypothetical situations in order to argue against doing anything that God would require in response to the gospel. For example, it is supposed that one who has believed in Jesus, and then is headed for the water in order to be immersed into Christ, dies on the way in an automobile accident. The question is posed, “Would the unbaptized believer be saved?” We would not want to make judgments for God, but we would answer “Yes.” We do not believe in a God who would be so legally calloused to condemn such a believing disciple. However, we must keep in mind that hypothetical circumstances do not establish law or change that which God has instructed in order to receive the remission of sins.

Jesus once gave the example of David and his men eating the showbread in the temple when he was fleeing the murderous hand of Saul (Mt 12:3,4; see 1 Sm 21:6). What he did, Jesus reminded His legalistic audience, “was not lawful for him to eat, nor for those who were with him” (Mt 12:4; see Lv 24:5). David’s eating of the showbread was not lawful, but it did not change the law. His survival as the future king of Israel was more important at the moment, than the law that only the priests were to eat of the showbread. However, after the death of Saul, and when David became king, he protected the law and barred anyone from eating the showbread except for the priests. His unfortunate situation at the time he ate the showbread did not change the law.

Now suppose that our particular believing disciple does not die in an automobile accident, but is not in search of water in order to be baptized into Christ for remission of his sins. Suppose the Ethiopian eunuch had simply passed by the water when he said, “See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized” (At 8:36). If the eunuch would have passed by the opportunity to obey the gospel immediately in order to come into a restored relationship with God, then he would have invalidated his belief.

Philip’s response to the eunuch’s question was, “If you believe with all your heart ...” (At 8:37). Philip had preached “Jesus” (the gospel) to the eunuch. As those on Pentecost, the eunuch believed. Philip then wanted to know if the eunuch’s belief had penetrated to his heart. If it had, then his belief was true. The request, “What hinders me from being baptized” is the response of one who truly believes the gospel in his heart, not just in his mind. And because the eunuch truly believed in his heart, he “came up out of the water [after baptism] ... and went on his way rejoicing” (At 8:39). There would have been no occasion for rejoicing on his way back home to Ethiopia if he had simply passed by the water.

But what if the eunuch had simply passed by the opportunity to be immersed in water to wash away his sins, as the three thousand were instructed to do on the day of Pentecost (See At 2:38; 22:16)? Would his belief have been real and from the heart? Because those on Pentecost were cut to the heart, they asked what they should do, and then they immediately did what was instructed. Suppose the apostles, as well as Philip, would have failed to instruct them what to do after being cut to the heart by the gospel?

The point is that if a believer simply passes by the water, or some preacher fails to preach all that is involved in preaching the gospel of Jesus, including baptism for remission of sins, then people are left in their sins. The one who says he believes, but does not respond from the heart to all that God instructs in order to deal with our problem of sin, has invalidated his belief. One can be left as a “dead man walking” with all his past sins, either through his refusal to stop the chariot and be baptized, or by being left in ignorance by some preacher who has failed to completely answer the question of the mournful, “Men and brethren, what will we do?” (At 2:37). The mournfully repentant often allow themselves to remain with a “dead faith” that has shown no expression of truly being united with Jesus through baptism (See Js 2:26).

The legalist will always have a difficult time understanding this, and the “believing” experimentalist will always assume that he can perform some emotional outburst to validate his acceptance by God. For this reason, we must go deeper into the subject in order to deal with the religious sin beneath the sin of failing to respond to the heart of God. We must deal with the sin that leads one to fall short of what Peter and the apostles instructed the mournful to do on Pentecost who hungered and thirsted after the righteousness of God (At 2:38). Would God work throughout millennia, and struggle with Israel through all their rebellion, in order to have His heart incarnate in the form of man, and then allow Him to be nailed to a cross, and then expect only a mental belief from us in all that He did in order that we be accepted by Him? Truly, this would not be reasonable to believe.

THE FUTILITY OF CHURCH RIGHTEOUSNESS

The gospel cancels all self-made religions and self-imposed religiosity. Unfortunately, we all have our religious ways about us. And because we do, there is a constant struggle in our lives between religion and Christianity, merit and gospel. When Christianity is twisted into a religion through either our legal obedience for self-justification, or experiential emotionalism, then “church righteousness” is developed whereby we all seek to establish our own common righteousness as a group that is based on the performance of our respective religious associations. We become denominational when we substitute a unique culture of church righteousness for the gospel of freedom.

This was the contextual religious environment that Paul addressed when he wrote to the Christians in Colosse. Some in Colosse were in the process of developing a church righteousness after the meritorious systems of the idolatrous religions of the Gentiles, or the legal religiosity of Judaism (Cl 2:20-23). They were bringing into the church of the free a meritorious system of religiosity by which they would move Christianity into a religion. The gospel of freedom was being set aside by religious rites that had no authority of the word of God.

In the context of any attempts to establish a church righteousness by which we would seek to save ourselves, we must again take another look at the core nature of the gospel. The gospel destroys any attempts to substitute church righteousness for God's righteousness. Our peace of mind in reference to our relationship with God depends on conforming to His will, not the will of the “pastor,” or the unique religious group to which we belong. Church righteousness gives birth to a unique religious sect when the adherents of the particular group commonly agreed upon a set of religious rites. On the other hand, the gospel insures allegiance only to Jesus and His word, regardless of whether one is obedient to the religious culture of any unique sect that is identified by unique religious rites that are accepted by the group.

In order to gain the peace that passes all understanding in these matters (Ph 4:7), we must base our world view of faith upon Paul's arguments in Romans 3. Paul begins with the statement, “But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested ... even the righteousness of God that is by the faith of Jesus Christ to all those who believe ...” (Rm 3:21). As earlier stated, it is significant to notice first in this statement that the article “the” in reference to law is not in the Greek text. What Paul is establishing is the fact that God's righteousness was not revealed through law, nor any other religious law of man. We must be cautious, therefore, not to establish a unique “church” that is based on adherence to the religious rites that a particular group of people have imposed on themselves.

Here is the principle: The gospel was not revealed because God was obligated by law to offer His Son. The gospel came to us apart from law, not because of law. Jesus had no obligation to die on the cross in order to fulfill any law. God was not in debt to man to pay the sacrifice of His Son on the cross. If the cross was according to law, then there was no grace. If our obedience to law obligated God to save us, then grace was given out of debt.

Now apply this principle to unique church religious rites that we might impose on ourselves who would be the church. Since God did not reveal the gospel on the basis of law, then certainly we would not establish the church on the basis of law. The church of Christ is based on the gospel, not on the members' conformity to a certain list of religious rites. If we would base the church on conformity to law, then what is the difference between a law-based church and a church that bases itself on commonly agreed upon religious rites? Simply because a law-based church might have a passage of scripture below each point of belief and behavior for their “church doctrine,” does not set aside the inability of each member to keep law perfectly in order to be identified as the “true church.”

However, simply because no member of the church can keep law perfectly does not mean that God has given no law to His people. The identity of His people is first by their obedience to the gospel, but also by their continued efforts to live according to His will, regardless of whether they can live perfectly according to His will. Christians are the children of God because they make every effort to live by the will of their Father, as well as believe the truth of His word.

Since the church is composed of people, there is always problems in reference to obedience. If church exists because of perfect law-keeping, then the church would never exist in its perfect form simply because none of the members can keep law perfectly. But as previously stated, it is by the grace of God that those who have obeyed the gospel exist as “church,” and remain as the people of God because they seek to follow the authority of the word of God in all matters of faith.

As law did not obligate God to reveal the gospel, neither does law obligate us to set aside the gospel as the foundation upon which the church is built. The church is based on the gospel, not on law. The church exists because of those who have conformed to the gospel of Christ. Those who obeyed the gospel on the A.D. 30 Pentecost, were added to the church of believers by God. They were not added because they sought to conform to a system of law, but because they conformed to the gospel in obedience thereof (At 2:47).

Since all of us as members of the body of Christ have fallen short of self-justification through lawbreaking (Rm 3:23), then there was the necessity of free justification “by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rm 3:24). For this reason, God sent forth His incarnate Son on the cross as an eternal atoning sacrifice through His blood. He did this “in order to declare His righteousness,” not to make a payment to us for our good works, or as a reward for our flawless obedience to His will (Rm 3:25). At the cross, therefore, God declared “His righteousness that He might be just and the justifier of him who believes in Jesus” (Rm 3:25). Our faith in our Father to take care of us as prodigal children resulted in Jesus’ sin offering for us. We are the body of Christ, therefore, because through the gospel we have been redeemed into membership through

His free offering. Nothing has changed in reference to God’s relational offering of Jesus for us as we walk in the light as members of the body of Christ (1 Jn 1:7).

Since through our obedience to the gospel of the cross we are made righteous before God, then there is no room for any church righteousness about which we would boast on our own behalf. We would not boast of our performance of law in order to be the church, neither would we boast of any self-imposed church righteousness that would identify us as the correct church. We are “church” because of the gospel, not because of what we do as church. There is never an occasion in which we can boast of what we do in reference to perfect law-keeping.

So Paul asked, “Where then is boasting?” He frankly answered, “It is excluded” (Rm 3:27). It is excluded through the law that we are justified by faith in the work of God through the cross, and not in how much “church work” we would do in a supposed effort to make ourselves continually righteous before God on the merit of how we perform as members of the body.

Neither is our boasting in how well we have performed law in order to be the “true church.” This is what Paul had in mind when he wrote, “You [members] who make your boast of law, do you dishonor God through the breaking of law?” (Rm 2:23). This is a penetrating question. The fact is that we do dishonor God when we boast in our law-keeping or religious rites in reference to being the church. Paul’s quotation of the prophets in reference to the lawbreaking of Israel is appropriate for all those who would claim to be the right church on the basis of perfect law-keeping: “The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles because of you” (Rm 2:23; see Is 52:5; Ez 16:27; 36:22). As lawbreaking caused the people of God in the Old Testament to be blasphemed by the nations, so the same is true today when we claim to be the people of God on the foundation of our perfect law-keeping. God’s name is blasphemed because the world sees that we do not keep law perfectly.

Must we remind ourselves here that Jesus said that His people would be identified by their love for one another, as He and the Father loved them through the incarnational offering of the cross (Jn 13:34,35)? The church that Jesus built on the foundation of His Sonship is not identified by law, but by gospel loving (See Mt 16:18,19). And love inherently refuses to boast, whereas through law-keeping we always seek an opportunity to pride ourselves on having the right name, the right “acts of worship,” the right works, the right church righteousness.

On the contrary, our boasting as members of the body of Christ, as Paul wrote, is in Christ (the gospel). "He who boasts," Paul admonished, "let him boast in the Lord" (1 Co 1:31). And he said it again, "But he who boasts [as a Christian], let him boast in the Lord" (2 Co 10:17). "In the Lord" means to boast in the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is not boasting about being "in the church," but boasting on the foundation of the gospel. It is not boasting about being "the right church," but boasting about the right gospel. In a different statement, Paul said it thus: "For I am not ashamed of the gospel" (Rm 1:16). Therefore, Paul boasted in the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we would boast, therefore, we do as Paul who wrote, "If I have to boast, I will boast of the things that concern my weakness" (2 Co 11:30; see 2 Co 12:5). The reason for boasting in weaknesses is that in Christ we are strong. "For when I am weak, then I am strong" in Him (2 Co 12:10). And finally: "But God forbid that I should boast, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world has been crucified to me and I to the world" (Gl 6:14).

In reference to trusting in the gospel through faith, Paul continued Romans with the example of Abraham. "For if Abraham was justified by works [of law], he has something about which to boast, but not before God" (Rm 4:3). Before the giving of the Sinai law, even Abraham was not justified by any law before God. "Abraham believed God and it was credited to him for righteousness" (Rm 4:3). Now here is the point: "Now to him who works [as a Christian], the reward is not credited according to grace [the gospel], but according to debt" (Rm 4:4). If one meritoriously obeys law in order to justify himself before God, then he obligates God to keep him saved according to debt and not grace. Out of faith, Abraham worked because of his faith that God had already saved him. He could boast before men of his works, but not before God because he continued in the favor of God through grace. He already had his salvation because of his faith. The same is true of the "faithful" member of the body of Christ.

On the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30, would we ask the respondents if they felt that God owed them the cross because of their obedience to law? We would certainly conclude that three thousand people in the Jewish audience did not respond because they felt that God owed them the cross. On the contrary, they realized that their own unrighteousness was the reason why God had to save them by His free grace. It was their self-confessed unrighteousness that produced their response to what God freely offered.

If we conclude that the three thousand were indeed moved because they realized that their religious performances of Judaism were futile in reference to being justified before God, then the same should move people today when they recognize the futility of religious performances. We conclude that it would have been a mockery of grace for the respondents on Pentecost to plead for another set of laws to obey, when their dysfunctional performance of law had actually brought them to their knees before the cross. The same is true today. Church righteousness is a mockery of the grace of God if we assume that we can "do church" in order to demand the grace of God. We must not forget that gospel living is not legally doing church righteousness.

Now consider Paul's conclusion to this matter: "But to him who does not work [to meritoriously justify himself], but believes in Him who justifies the ungodly, his faith is credited for righteousness" (Rm 4:5). We therefore stand justified before God in His righteousness, not because of our self-righteousness, but because of the righteousness of God that comes through the cross. We are justified to be righteous before God through our faith in His grace, not by any faith in our own performance of church righteousness by which we would demand salvation.

The experientialist exhausts himself emotionally every Sunday in order to justify himself before God. But such meritorious emotionalism fails to give credit to God for His righteousness that has come to the believer through faith. The same is true of the legalist who imposes on himself and others his own performances of church law in order to be justified before God. He has forgotten that the gospel that he obeyed brought him into Christ where he is already justified through the incarnational offering of the Son of God. He does not stay in Christ because of any perfect keeping of law, or meritorious church righteousness. He walks in the light of Christ because of what the cleansing blood of Jesus continues to do every day of his life (1 Jn 1:7).

The legalist must rejoice in remembering that he is freely justified in Christ. The experientialist must also remember that meritorious emotional performances will not put God in debt to keep one saved. We are already saved through the gospel of the cross. It is for this reason that the one "who does not work" meritoriously to save himself, but has faith in God who justifies us, is given credit for the righteousness of God (Rm 4:5).

In concluding this point we would remember a beautiful statement that Paul quoted from David: "Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven and whose sins have been covered" (Rm 4:7; see Ps 32:1,2). Happy is the person who believes that his sins have been vanquished at the cross, and thus, does not have to labor daily in fear that he has not kept law perfectly, or performed enough good works to atone for his own sins. Since we are justified freely by God's grace, then "we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works" (Ep 2:10).

Christians thus work because they are justified, not in order to be justified. They seek out what God would require of them (law) in order to be obedient children. They seek to follow the healthy teaching of the word of God in order to manifest their faith. They are eager to preach the word of God, knowing that there are many who "will not endure sound teaching" (2 Tm 4:3). Because they love the truth of God's word, they study the Bible in order not to be led astray by the deceiving teachings of men (2 Th 2:10-12). For this reason, every Christian labors in study and teaching, not in order to earn salvation, but to bring others out of the darkness of deception (See Ph 2:12). The "church work" of the saved is in appreciation of what they have, and can offer through teaching a world in darkness.

THE INCARNATIONAL SACRIFICE

It is our quest to discover the heart of God at the cross. Since the descendants of Abraham in A.D. 30 had a two thousand year old illustration of the obedience of Abraham—who lived before the Sinai law was given—they were prepared to respond to the revelation of the heart of God. The cross was another offering of a son, but this time the offering had eternal consequences. The sacrifice that was offered (the Son of God), and the ones for whom the sacrifice was made, would carry on into eternity.

Only when we connect all the dots between Abraham and the cross do we fully understand what occurred when God gave the following command to Abraham:

Take now your son, your only son Isaac whom you love, and go into the land of Moriah and offer him there as a burnt offering upon one of the mountains that I will tell you (Gn 22:2).

What seems so incomprehensible about Abraham's response to this command of God is what is recorded in the following verse in the Genesis 22 text: "Then Abraham rose up early in the morning and saddled his donkey" (Gn 22:3). There was no questioning by Abraham. There were no emotional arguments. No debates. There was not even a sleepless night, for the text states that he "rose up" from his bed (sleep). There was only obedience, and the obedience was without question. And for this reason, James wrote of the obedience of Abraham that he was justified because of His faith. Abraham had faith in the work of offering his son on the basis of his faith that God would take care of both himself and Isaac (Js 2:21).

What transpired on the occasion of the offering helps us venture into the heart of God at the cross. When we compare Abraham's offering with the offering of the Father on the cross, then our minds begin to wonder concerning what actually transpired at the cross.

When Abraham raised his knife in obedience to the command of God to offer his son, God responded out of heaven with the command, "Do not lay your hand upon the lad ..." (Gn 22:12). Because God spared Abraham from carrying out the command to offer his son reveals the motive of God behind the command. God revealed His motive for the command in the following statement He made to Abraham: "Now I know that you fear God, seeing you have not withheld your son, your only son from Me" (Gn 22:12).

Abraham's obedience to offer his only son revealed his heart's obedience to do all that God would ask of him. If we were to ask Abraham, "Is there anything that you would not do in order to be obedient to God?" Abraham's answer, that was validated by his obedience to offer his son, would be, "No." In the obedience of Abraham, we understand the obedient faith of Abraham. God's people of faith would not understand the full meaning of why God gave this command to Abraham until two thousand years later.

For two millennia, the example of Abraham molded the hearts of those who would seek God. Those of faith would understand from Abraham that he would do all that was necessary in order to be obedient to his Father. When Paul used the example of Abraham being justified by faith, he was asking his readers to consider the faith of Abraham that moved him to be obedient to the Father in all areas of life.

The time eventually came in the history of Israel when the occasion to offer a son was reversed. The Jews understood the obedient heart of Abraham to do all that the Father asked. It was now time that they understand the "obedient" heart of God in reference to the offering of His Son on their behalf.

Abraham had the heart of God because he offered his son without an explanation from God, nor a reward for doing so. In the same manner the Father “obediently” offered His Son on our behalf without conditions from us. The cross did not happen because of the requirements of law, for we could manufacture no law to give to God that demanded the offering of His Son. God’s heart, therefore, was revealed at the cross unconditionally, and without His payment of some debt that He owed to those of faith who had worked meritoriously to demand the offering. On the contrary, the incarnational offering was the result of the deplorable problem of sin of those of faith, not because those of faith had put any demands on God to make the offering.

In our sins we all cried out to our Father for redemption. The Father replied with unconditional love. He was “obedient” unto our cries. Because of His heart, there was nothing He would not have done in order to bring us out of our deplorable condition of eternal death through sin so that we might be in His loving fellowship forever. This is the heart of God.

Did God have to act on our behalf? Yes, He did! He is a God of love (1 Jn 4:7). “In this the love of God was manifested to us, that God sent His only begotten Son into the world so that we might live through Him” (1 Jn 4:9).

Abraham’s sacrifice that he was willing to offer would cost him his only begotten son. God’s sacrifice for us cost Him His only begotten Son. The difference between the two offerings was that there was no one greater than God who could hold back the cross in order that the nails of the crucifixion not be driven through the incarnate hands of the Son of God. Because there was nothing greater to hold God back from the offering of His only begotten Son, then we begin to understand that the incarnational offering of the Son was truly the ultimate offering for our sins.

The offering of an eternal sacrifice reveals the heart of God for His creation. Offering the eternal sacrifice of His Son reveals that God, too, would do anything that was necessary in order to bring us into His eternal glory. David, a man after God’s own heart, revealed something unique about the incarnational offering of the Son of God. Paul spoke to the rulers of the synagogue in Antioch of Pisidia, “Now concerning the fact that He [God] raised Him [the Son] up from the dead no more to return to decay, He said on this, ‘I will give You the sure mercies of David’” (At 13:34). The gospel was the revelation of the mercy of God that was revealed through David’s merciful behavior as the king of Israel. It was mercy that cost God the eternal sacrifice of His Son. Sufficient sacrifices out of mercy that atone for sin come with a high price.

At one time during his reign, David made a burnt offering to the Lord. What transpired during the events that led up to the offering reveals that David was truly one after God’s heart. Knowing that David wanted to make the offering, Araunah said to David, “Let my Lord the king take and offer up [free] what seems good to him” (2 Sm 24:22). What Araunah was offering David was both the location to make his offering, as well as all free oxen that were necessary to make the sacrifice. Araunah wanted to give all the sacrifices to David for him to make his personal offering to the Lord.

David’s response to Araunah, as Abraham in the offering of Isaac, revealed that he truly understood the cost of offering an acceptable sacrifice. David responded to Araunah, “No, but I will surely buy it from you at a price. Neither will I offer burnt offerings to the Lord my God of that which did not cost me anything” (2 Sm 24:24).

And so it was when Abraham, without question, sought to offer his only begotten son. And so it was also when God offered up His only begotten Son as a sacrifice for our sins. As David would not offer a free sacrifice on behalf of his own sins, God would not offer for our sins a sacrifice that cost Him nothing. God’s offering at the cross was in the same sacrificial nature as what He called on Abraham to do, and which David did. There is no acceptable offering to God that does not come without expense.

This is the heart of God that was revealed through the incarnational sacrifice of the only begotten Son of God. This message of the gospel was what cut to the heart of the three thousand descendants of Abraham on the day of Pentecost. They knew the unconditional love of Abraham to do all that God commanded. They knew through David that sacrifice costs. And now they knew that God was willing to make an unconditional eternal sacrifice that would suffice for their sins, but it would come at a very high price.

Peter and the apostles revealed that God’s incarnational sacrifice for the people came with a great price, and thus, they could only respond as Abraham’s faith moved him to obey in all things. The gospel message cut straight to the hearts of all those who heard on the day of Pentecost. When the message of the gospel is focused on the heart of man, there is an instant response in the hearts of those who seek to walk by the faith of Abraham and David.

The gospel penetrates to the heart, and then reaches to the mind. It is then that the heart is stirred into action in order to do all that God wills in our lives.

The gospel message cut the Pentecost audience to the heart because the people realized that God was not willing to hold back from paying any price necessary in order to bring those of faith into His eternal fellowship. The old song was truly correct in expressing the heart (action) of God through the incarnational sacrifice of His only begotten Son.

Gone is all my debt of sin,
A great change is bro't within,

And to live now I begin,
Risen from the fall;
Yet the debt I did not pay
Some one died for me one day,
Sweeping all the debt away,
Jesus paid it all.

LAW CONDEMNS — FAITH SAVES

We need to remain standing beside the three thousand on the day of Pentecost in order to see ourselves condemned through law. We must continue to listen through their ears and understand with their hearts. We must extract our Western definition of the heart from the picture in order to understand why so many immediately understood the message of the gospel once all the prophecies were connected with all the events surrounding the death of Jesus, His resurrection and ascension to the right hand of God. It is only when we stand in their shoes do we really comprehend the “heart nature” of the gospel that was preached and received on that day.

At least three thousand of those who attended the Pentecost of A.D. 30 understood one very important matter concerning law. Paul revealed in two letters the principle that the three thousand immediately confessed, and consequently, stepped forward to do what was needed in response to the gospel message. In Antioch, Paul reminded Peter of their spiritual state of legal religiosity before they obeyed the gospel,

... knowing that a man is not justified by works of law, but by the faith of Christ Jesus, even we [Peter and Paul] have believed in Christ Jesus so that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by works of law, for by works of law no flesh will be justified (Gl 2:16).

And then in another letter he wrote to the Roman Christians, “Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of law” (Rm 3:28).

In order to understand the heart of God at the cross, it is imperative that we understand curse of law with which the three thousand lived for centuries. When faithful Jews stood before the apostles on that notable day, they stood there with jaws dropped and joy in their hearts. They could not believe what they were hearing.

In the preceding Galatian statement of his own response to the gospel, Paul introduced a profound truth that was self-evident in reference to law. The Jews who were there on the day of Pentecost were not theologically ignorant. They were the most dedicated of the world, for all of them had made a lengthy journey over hundreds of kilometers in order to be there for Passover and Pentecost. Some made the journey every year. We must not question their sincerity, nor their desire to be obedient to the law of God. But there was a self-evident problem in law that they all realized.

Notice the obvious conclusion to law-keeping that Paul made in the Galatian statement: “knowing that a man is not justified by works of law.” There was no need that this truth come to them through revelation. When Paul made this statement, he was speaking directly to Peter on behalf of all Jews and ourselves who seek to be obedient to God. As a follow-up to this self-evident truth, Paul said to Peter, “even we [faithful Jews] have believed in Christ Jesus.”

Peter was the Jew of Jews, for on the occasion of this incident he had withdrawn himself from the Gentile Christians in Antioch when the traditional Jews came up from Jerusalem. Paul himself had first persecuted Jewish Christians in Judea because he considered them apostates from Judaism. But when both Paul and Peter saw the heart of the gospel, they had to confess that all their lives their efforts to justify themselves through perfect obedience of law was a futile attempt of religiosity. They were honest lawbreakers who knew that something was very wrong with their efforts of self-justification. Law was not the problem. For example, “the [Sinai] law is holy, and the commandment holy and just and good” (Rm 7:12). The problem is with those to whom law is given, whether Jews or Gentiles, and now, even Christians.

All who were honest and sincere on Pentecost, realized that there was a flaw in the theology of justification by works of law and meritorious atonement through good works. In fact, Paul stated, “But that no one is justified by law in the sight of God is evident” (Gl 3:11). It took no theological reasoning to come to this conclusion. This is an axiomatic truth in reference to law, a truth that is self-evident.

Those on the day of Pentecost realized that for centuries it was not within the ability of man to walk perfectly the road of righteousness that is based on man's performance of law and good deeds. All break law. Enough good deeds could never be performed in order to atone for one sin. Therefore, the obvious conclusion the honest Jews made was that there was never any atonement for lawbreakers through the offering of animal sacrifices or self-sanctification through good works (See Hb 10:1-4).

In the context of Paul's arguments in both Romans and Galatians, it is significant to remind ourselves again that the article “the” is not in the Greek text of Galatians 2:16 and Romans 3:28 in reference to “law.” It has unfortunately been added by some translators. What Paul was actually writing was a truth that defined human inability: “A man is not justified by works of law.”

By adding the article before the word “law,” some have evidently tried to take the pressure off themselves as dysfunctional lawbreakers. By adding the article, we might conclude that Paul's reference was only to those who lived under the Sinai law. In the case of the Jews, this was true, for the Sinai law was given only to them. But Abraham was justified by faith long before the Sinai law was given on Mt. Sinai. If Paul's reference was only to the Sinai law, then we might conclude that we can devise any “law unto ourselves,” and subsequently, be justified by our own self-made “church laws,” as some in Colosse were attempting to do.

Without the article in the text, however, Paul would be moving the focus of the statements of Galatians 2:16 and Romans 3:28 beyond Israel to all who would seek to be justified before God through any law. It is simply impossible for any man to live perfectly before God through law-keeping, regardless of the law under which one might bring himself into submission.

In his arguments leading up to the Romans 3:28 statement, Paul revealed that from the creation to the cross, the Gentiles lived under “law written in their hearts, their conscience also bearing witness and their thoughts alternately accusing or else excusing one another” (Rm 2:15). Because Paul did not use the article in these texts in reference to law, both Jews and Gentiles must recognize the principle that man cannot be justified before God by meritorious works of law. This principle applies to everyone, not just to the Jews who lived under the Sinai law. It applies to anyone who might devise any system of law by which to justify himself before God. It is simply a truth of honest hearts who recognize that there is no possible way for a man to justify himself legally before God through perfect obedience to law, “for by works of law no flesh will be justified.”

The problem, as previously stated, is not with law, but with man. The Hebrew writer reminded those who were seeking to return to a covenant of law, “For if that first [Sinai] covenant had been faultless, then no place would have been sought for the second. For finding fault with them ...” (Hb 8:6,7). The fault was not with the Sinai covenant and law, but with the people. The same principle is true today. Any religion that is based on justification through meritorious religious rites or law-keeping has established a futile theology in reference to producing reconciliation with God. The more one religiously seeks to be right with God through religious rites and perfect law-keeping, the further he moves himself away from being that which he seeks to be, that is, righteous before God.

Before any person would seek to establish laws by which he would consider himself faithful before God, he must be honest with himself and confess the obvious truth that we are all lawbreakers. The honest Jews on Pentecost knew this in their hearts. They had followed their leaders' traditions (laws) for years, knowing deep in their hearts that such religiosity was futile in reference to standing legally justified before God.

Honest Jews knew that the Sinai law could not be kept perfectly. Those Christians who would even consider the “law of Christ” to be a legal system of justification should remember this. They should lest we run to the New Testament in order to construct a legal system of law by which we would attempt to justify ourselves before God. Those who legalize the law of Christ for self-justification are seeking to change Christianity into a religion of men, for in religion one focuses on his own ability to perform law in order to be justified before God, and not on the gospel of Jesus Christ.

When Paul spoke of the “law of Christ” (Gl 6:2), he was not establishing again a legal system of law under which the Jews were kept in bondage from the time of the giving of law at Mt. Sinai. He was not promoting a paradigm shift from the legalities of the Sinai law to the same, but different legalities under the law of Christ. If one cannot be justified by legalities under any law, even the Sinai law, then there would also be no justification by the legalities of a supposed legal system of law in Christ. What was true under the old would also be true under the new. If there was no justification by perfect law-keeping under the old, then certainly the same inability on the part of man to perform law perfectly stands true under the new.

What some have forgotten in their efforts to make the law of Christ a legal system by which we would seek to justify ourselves before God, is that the law of Christ is what James explained it to be in James 1:25. It is the “perfect law of liberty.” The law of Christ liberates us from the demands of justification through law-keeping. If one would seek to turn the law of Christ into a system of condemnation, whereby lawbreakers would seek to justify themselves before God, then Paul has an exhortation for them. It is an exhortation that concluded his arguments against such legal law-keepers in Galatia, but an encouragement for those who seek to walk by faith in the gospel of Jesus Christ: “Stand fast therefore, in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1).

Paul considered it a very serious matter to think that we could justify ourselves before God through law. He considered it so serious that he made the following statement, “You have been severed from Christ, you who seek to be justified by law. You have fallen from grace” (Gl 5:4). These words should not be taken lightly.

The reason why one’s efforts to establish any system of law by which he would attempt to justify himself before God is discovered in the fact that such an effort is a denial of the heart of the gospel. It is thus, the “other gospel” (Gl 1:6-9). The reason such is the “other gospel” is that self-justification, or church righteousness, denies the sufficiency of the incarnational sacrifice of the Son of God.

Paul wrote to the Roman disciples, “Much more then, having now been justified by His blood, we will be saved from wrath through Him” (Rm 5:9). We are saved from the wrath of God through the cleansing blood of Jesus, not through our efforts to protect ourselves through perfect law-keeping. If we would revert to law-keeping in order to save ourselves, then we have denied the gospel of the cross. We have sought to substitute our own works of righteousness for the effective cleansing blood of Jesus. We have denied our faith in the sufficiency of the atoning blood of the gospel.

On the day of Pentecost in Acts 2, three thousand people immediately recognized a solution for which they had struggled for generations. The Jews had proven throughout their history the futility of justification through law-keeping. They had failed so many times throughout their history that they lived in a hopeless religiosity, knowing that surely God had something better. In an effort to find some assurance in their obedience to law, their religious leaders kept adding more statutes and precepts (religious laws) to the Sinai law in order to guarantee strict obedience. They added tradition upon tradition, precept upon precept. But all the additions were to no avail in solving a most evident truth, that by works of law no man can be justified before God. Their additions, therefore, became subtractions. They were subtracting themselves from faith in God to a faith in their own ability to supposedly live as perfect law-keepers.

But on that wonderful day over two thousand years ago, good news finally came. By the resurrection of the Son of God, it was proven true that the message of the grace of God through the atoning blood of the Son would bring them into the arms of God. When God’s heart burst forth through the incarnational sacrifice of His Son, there was a spontaneous explosion of obedience across the ancient world. Both Jews and Gentiles of faith, who had been struggling with the futility of self-justification, realized for the first time in history that they could be accepted into the realm of God’s righteousness through grace. It was a beautiful message. It still continues today.

We would be careful, therefore, not to construct a religiosity out of works that would annul the gospel of grace. If we do, then we would be preaching another gospel that is foreign to the gospel of grace (See Gl 1:6-9). We must never forget the following words of Paul: “Therefore, having been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rm 5:1). Therefore, “being justified by His grace,” we are “made heirs according to the hope of eternal life” (Ti 3:7).

THE CLEANSING BLOOD

If we are feeling stained with sin, then we must be sure to make our way to the totality of the gospel.

The cross of Jesus deals with legal matters between ourselves and God. Through the gospel of grace, God dealt with the matter of our inability to legally stand just before Him. God knew this inability before He created us, and thus, He revealed at the cross His justice in creating us, for the cross happened in order “to declare at this time,” Paul wrote, “His righteousness that He might be just and the justifier of him who believes in Jesus” (Rm 3:26).

Because we could never legally make ourselves right before Him through perfect keeping of law, the sacrificial offering of Jesus had to be by grace, and grace had to be free. It could not be earned, for that would throw us back again into the futility of trying to earn our salvation through law-keeping. We would not, therefore, ever consider establishing another law system by which we would seek to justify ourselves before God. Neither would we seek to establish a religious system of church righteousness by which we would seek to earn the grace of God, or even obligate God to make the incarnational sacrifice of His Son.

God's righteousness worked on our behalf because of the sanctification that came through the blood of the incarnate Son of God. When we study through this subject, there is one point that must be clearly understood. Paul explained, “For you are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ” (Gl 3:26,27).

When any biblical subject is discussed that uses the phrase “into Christ,” or “in Christ,” we must always understand that one comes into a relationship with Christ through his or her obedience to the gospel by immersion into the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus. Too many people confuse themselves and others by ignoring how one becomes justified by the washing away of all sins (See At 22:16). We must simply keep in mind that faith without action is dead. And we have already explained that baptism can never be a meritorious work of law. We must also remember that faith can never stand alone without obedience to the will of God, especially when discussing the subject of obedience to the gospel (See 2 Th 1:6-9; 1 Pt 4:17).

In reference to sanctification, Paul addressed the letter of 1 Corinthians “to those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus” (1 Co 1:2). These were previously sin-stained people who lived in the bondage of sin. “Such were some of you,” Paul reminded the Corinthians. “But you were washed. But you were sanctified. But you were justified ...” (1 Co 6:11). Because they were justified, and cleaned up by the blood of Jesus when they were baptized in order to wash away all their past sins (At 22:16), they were brought into a sanctified relationship with Christ because they had been baptized into Christ.

There is no magic in the waters of baptism. There is no saving power in the action of immersion. All the magic and power resides in the cleansing blood of the gospel. Herein is the power of the gospel (Rm 1:16). It is the blood of the incarnate Son of God that accomplishes the cleansing of those who come into Christ through the waters of baptism. Hebrews 10 is critical in explaining this truth. The principle upon which the Hebrew writer wrote was, “By this will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all” (Hb 10:10).

The incarnational offering that was revealed at the cross was good news. It was an offering that terminated all offerings for sin (See Hb 7:27). But even more encouraging is the verb that the Hebrew writer used to explain the results of Jesus' sin offering for us. We “have been sanctified.” The verb is passive. We have been “acted upon” by Jesus in order to be washed clean of all sin. At the cross, Jesus acted upon our death in sin in order that we be cleansed and made presentable to the Father at the time of our immersion into Christ. Jude's final words are encouraging:

Now to Him who is able to keep you from falling and to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy, to the only God our Savior, through Jesus Christ our Lord (Jd 24,25).

The Hebrew writer continued to explain to his readers: “For by one offering He has perfected forever those who are being sanctified” (Hb 10:14). Those to whom he was writing had been “acted upon” by Jesus through the cross, and thus “perfected” in Christ. The sanctifying power of the cross continued “perfecting” even to the day that the Hebrew writer was inscribing these words. Every time someone is baptized for remission of sins (At 2:38), therefore, the sanctifying blood of Jesus, that was poured forth from the cross, begins to flow throughout his or her faithful gospel living in order to be cleansed of sin. “But if we walk in the light as He is in the light ... the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn 1:7).

Now suppose we would seek to return to a religion that was similar to the legal Judaism from which Paul, Peter and the early Jews fled? When they discovered the gospel of grace, they left their efforts to justify themselves through efforts of self-sanctifying good works. When they saw the sanctification of the cross through the blood of Jesus, they fled from their own efforts of self-sanctification and the failure of sanctification through the blood of animal sacrifices.

The Hebrew writer was inscribing his words of exhortation to some Jewish Christians who were seeking to return to a futile religious system of self-sanctification through law and animal sacrifices. And today, there are those who have unknowingly established the same for themselves through the self-sanctifying efforts of good works. They assume by their meritorious works that they too can be justified by faithful obedience to church religious rites, thinking that “the church” saves apart from the power of the gospel. This is the same as returning, as some of the Jewish Christians, to a religious system of self-justification and sanctification through meritorious works or performances of the rites of Judaism. But notice what the Hebrew writer continued to say about such efforts:

Of how much severer punishment do you suppose will he be thought worthy who has trodden under foot the Son of God, and has counted as a common thing the blood of the covenant by which he was sanctified, and has insulted the Spirit of grace? (Hb 10:29).

All who would seek to establish a meritorious religious system by which they would seek to be self-justified by religious performances of religious rites or meritorious sanctification through works of the “church,” should seriously consider this question that the Holy Spirit posed through the Hebrew writer. We might think that our obedience to the “church” is necessary in order to supplement the gospel, but in doing so, we have “trodden under foot the Son of God.” We have “counted as a common thing the blood of the covenant” by which we have been totally sanctified. We must remember that “the church” saves no one. We are saved by the gospel, not by “the church.” And because we are saved by the gospel, we are the church of our Lord Jesus Christ.

When the church is relegated to a religion of ceremonial performances, we are making efforts to sanctify ourselves apart from the blood of the gospel. Religion is thus a denial of the sufficiency of the gospel. Since all religion exists because of man's efforts to choose his own way into the grace of God, then one's way to the cross is detoured through the maze of the religious performances of men to prove one's own worth before God. If we seek to bypass the sufficiency of the cleansing blood of the gospel with our own performances of religion, then we have shamed the Holy Spirit, and counted the blood of the cross to be an insufficient effort on the part of God to cleanse us of our sins.

The cleansing of our sins is something that God does. God has chosen us for salvation “through sanctification of spirit and belief in the truth” (2 Th 2:13). We were sanctified by Him (1 Co 6:11). If we try to do God's job in reference to our own sanctification, then we are bypassing His work at the cross, and the continual cleansing work of the blood of His Son. Christians are the sanctified (Hb 2:11). But their cleansing was the work of God, not a debt paid to them because of their meritorious accomplishments in performed religiosity. If we seek to be self-justified through self-sanctification, then we nullify the gospel.

Through the cross, God set aside perfect law-keeping as a condition to stand just before Him. In reference to our sin problem, He washed us of sin in the blood of His Son. If we seek His justification through the efforts of self-sanctification in religious performances, then we have denied the effect of the gospel. We have trodden under foot the Son of God and counted His shed blood a common thing.

We would not, therefore, misunderstand what Paul said in 1 Thessalonians 4:3,4:

For this is the will of God, your sanctification, that you should abstain from fornication; that every one of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor ....”

We do not abstain in order to be sanctified. We abstain from the works of the flesh because we were initially sanctified by the blood of Jesus. This is walking in the light of the gospel. We abstain because we were initially sanctified upon our obedience to the gospel. If we were to abstain—in our walk in the light—in order to become sanctified, then we would meritoriously be seeking justification before God on the merit of what we would or would not do. But the fact that we are continually sanctified by the blood of Jesus is the motivation that we guard ourselves against sin in our walk in the light.

Our sanctification by the blood of Jesus at the cross does not mean that we will live sinless after we have been washed in His blood at the time of baptism. If we say we can live without sin, then God says we are liars (1 Jn 1:6). But if we continue to respond positively to the grace of God in our lives by living the gospel of Jesus, then “the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn 1:7). We walk the life of the sanctified, therefore, because of the cleansing that we received through the gospel of Jesus at the cross.

The sanctifying blood of Jesus was not held up at the cross. The cross was only the fountain that released the cleansing power the blood of Jesus upon all those throughout all history who would obey and walk in the gospel of the Son of God.

A RESURRECTIONAL WORLD VIEW

It often requires a readjustment of thinking to learn that the Bible is not first about us. It is first about the gospel of Jesus who is the incarnational offering of God in order to bring us into His company and prepare us for eternity. For the legalist the Bible is considered a rule book of laws by which one seeks to legally justify himself before God. But for those who live after the gospel, the Bible is an instruction manual on what to do and avoid in living the grateful life after being saved by the gospel. The following text turns on a light in our thinking concerning this truth:

For the grace of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live sensibly, righteously and godly in this present age, looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Christ Jesus, who gave Himself for us ... (Tit 2:11-14).

This one passage defines the world view of the Christian. In this statement, the word “grace” sums up the totality of all that God did on our behalf in order to accomplish His eternal plan. Grace reveals the purpose for the existence of this world. This is the gospel. This is the world view by which Christians live the gospel. And thus, Paul personifies this grace as our “instructor” concerning how we are to live in this world in preparation for that which is to come.

In the statement, it is grace (the gospel) that does the teaching. Or better, it is grace that gives us the motive to “live sensibly ....” It is the gospel of grace that is our motivation to look “for the blessed hope and glorious appearing [of Jesus] ....” It is the gospel that is deep in our hearts that controls our thinking and behavior in order that we be prepared, not just for the coming of Jesus, but also that we be morally refocused in our hearts in order to dwell in eternity in the presence of His Holiness. Only by submitting to the “instruction” of grace can all this happen before He comes again.

The gospel is the underlying motivation that gives us a reason to deny “ungodliness and worldly lusts” in order that we look for the coming of the incarnational and resurrected “Savior Christ Jesus.” The gospel inspires us to change our lives, and then have hope for a better environment of existence in the presence of our heavenly Father. It was this grace into which the prophets of old searched diligently to discover (1 Pt 1:10-12). We have been so fortunate that all this was revealed in this last dispensation of time on earth (See Ep 3:3-5).

“By faith Abraham ... was looking for a city that has foundations, whose builder and maker is God” (Hb 11:8,10). Our faith in all that the gospel of Jesus is turns our minds away from worldly lusts in order to yearn for a heavenly habitation in the presence of God. The purpose of the entire Bible, therefore, is based on defining the gospel as our motive by which we would live in the present in preparation for the future.

The Holy Spirit states this purpose in other words to the Colossians: “If you then were raised with Christ, seek those things that are above .... Set your mind on things above ...” (Cl 3:1,2). The exhortation means that by faith we go down into the tomb of water with Jesus, but then we are “raised with Christ.” Paul questioned why some in Colosse had been buried and resurrected with Christ if they turned again to focus on living the immoral life. His argument is that gospel obedience assumes gospel living.

Paul said this in a similar question that he posed to some Corinthians who believed that Christ was not raised from dead: “Otherwise, what will those do who are baptized for the dead, if the dead do not rise at all? Why then are they baptized for the dead?” (1 Co 15:29; see Rm 6:3-6). The rational conclusion for the Corinthians was that in their recognition of formerly being the old dead man in sin before their obedience to the gospel, why were they baptized to put away the old dead man if they discontinued believing in the resurrection? Why would one obey the gospel in the first place, if the motivation of the gospel does not lead one away from worldly lusts?

Paul’s questions to both the Colossians and Corinthians were based on the truth of the gospel. If they responded to the gospel by being baptized into the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus, then why would they seek to live according to the world in which they were dead in sin? His argument infers that the gospel (grace) teaches us to do better.

When we were dead in trespasses and sin (Ep 2:1,2), we heard the gospel, and then we believed in the good news of the resurrection. We were then moved to “seek those things that are above.” It is the Bible that gives us this direction, and thus the purpose of the Bible is to increase our faith in the incarnational work of the Father through Jesus in order that we grow in faith, for “faith comes by hearing and hearing by the word of Christ” (Rm 10:17). The gospel is the motivation, and the Bible is the road map.

It is now that we understand what Peter was encouraging us to do in 2 Peter 3:18: “But grow in the grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.” We are encouraged to study the Bible in order to better understand the grace (gospel) of God that teaches us to live a godly life. We study the Bible in order that we may know more about “our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.” We thus study in order to understand His work through the gospel to bring us into His eternal presence. The more we learn about the gospel, the more the gospel (God's grace) activates a gospel walk of gratitude. The Bible, therefore, is first about that in which we must base our motive (heart) in order to be directed in our living the gospel.

Some of the disciples in Achaia, especially in the city of Corinth, were questioning the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Therefore, it is not unusual that the greatest text on the resurrection of Jesus was placed in a letter that deals with so many problems in the relationships of Christians with one another. Problems concerning dysfunctional and ungodly attitudes and behavior permeated the Corinthian church. The reason for this was based squarely on the denial of the resurrection by some in Corinth who were attacking this fundamental motive for gospel living. They were denying the resurrection of Jesus, and thus, removing the motivation for living according to the gospel. Paul frankly stated, “Now if Christ has not been raised, then your faith is vain” (1 Co 15:17). In fact, he eventually comes to the point in his rebuke of those who denied the resurrection by saying that the Christian life is useless if there is no resurrection.

If there were no resurrection in the gospel message, then there is no impetus for godly living. It was in reference to this subject that Paul again was laboring for them as a father over an immature child. He had written similar words to the Galatians: “My little children for whom I labor in birth again until Christ is formed in you ...” (Gl 4:19). The gospel of Christ had not yet been formed in the hearts of some Corinthians and Galatians, and the result was dysfunctional behavior.

If there is no such thing as a resurrection of the dead, “then Christ has not been raised” (1 Co 15:16). And if Christ was not raised, “then those who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished” (1 Co 15:18). And thus, “we are of all men most to be pitied” for a foolish belief in a resurrection (1 Co 15:19).

The foundation upon which our behavior as disciples of Jesus is founded is the resurrection. It was by Jesus' resurrection that He was proved to be the Son of God (Rm 1:4), and thus, we behave in a godly manner because we believe that Jesus is the Son of God. We know that we will eventually give account for our behavior because He was raised from the dead. Therefore, 2 Corinthians 5:10 must bring us to attention:

For we must all appear before the judgment seat of [the risen] Christ, so that everyone may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad.

THE GOSPEL FOUNDATION

So if Christ were truly raised from the dead, then everything is changed. Lives are transformed (See 2 Co 3:18). Destinies are changed. Hope springs forth in the hearts of those who have lived in despair. Gospel living becomes the identity of those who believe the gospel.

The gospel of the resurrection remains the foundation upon which we emotionally stand (1 Co 15:1,2). The Bible is primarily about the gospel of the Son of God in order that we understand the eternal work of God through the incarnate and risen Christ. Corinth could sort out their ungodly behavior only if the resurrection penetrated to their hearts in order that they have the motive (heart) to change their behavior. When one understands the heart of God that was revealed through the gospel, he or she has the heart to live the gospel life.

Since the Bible is about the revelation of the heart of God through the gospel, then the legalist must step back for a moment and take another look at how he uses the Bible. The legalist usually considers the Bible a “combat manual” to win legal arguments in theological discussions, and thus self-justify himself through perfect obedience to the laws of the manual. He preaches the Bible to establish “sound” doctrine in order that thinking be correct, regardless of behavior. He memorizes Bible passages in order to be ready to win any theological argument that may come his way. All these things are honorable, but what the legalist must not forget is that his motive (heart) for preaching and confronting error must be the gospel.

If the motive for the legalist's use of the Bible is transformed into reaffirming the gospel in his own life, then the reason for his dependence on the Bible changes. It changes from a motive of self-justification to win theological engagements to helping people to be transformed into the image of Christ (See Rm 12:1). He begins preaching Jesus and not prooftexts. He begins to believe that people are not saved through perfect law-keeping, but through the power of the gospel. In his transformation, the Bible changes from being a textbook on law to a motivating revelation of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

When the early disciples first received the gospel (1 Co 15:1), they had no Bibles. Even those on the A.D. 30 Pentecost had no New Testaments to study among themselves. When the early evangelists went about preaching the gospel, they carried no Bibles to be distributed among the people. The apostles laid hands on certain individuals in order to be blessed with the gift of knowledge (See At 8:18,19). But this blessing was limited to the presence of the apostles to distribute the miraculous gifts.

Therefore, to the astonishment of the legalist, the baptized disciples lived the transformed gospel life simply because they based their faith on the foundation of the gospel. What transformed their lives was the message of the gospel, not the memorization of a host of legalities, or even daily Bible reading, for there were no Bibles. They sacrificially lived the gospel without some organizational structure of either law or religion.

The book of Acts is actually a history of the work of the gospel to transform lives, as well as lead lives. And all the time, we have been using the book of Acts to find "prooftexts" in order to win this or that theological argument with "the denominations." Or, we have used Acts to construct a legal outline that we presumed to meritoriously obey without flaw. We could then declare that we have justified ourselves saved because we are legally defined as "faithful" Christians. In all our biblicism, we have lost the heart for godly living in our scurried search to find prooftexts to legally justify ourselves. We forget that a teacher of the Bible will be more effective in changing the thinking of others when he allows the gospel to transform his own life.

In view of the preceding, consider what Peter said in 1 Peter 3:15 would be the impetus that would inspire people to ask questions concerning who we are. As we read through this statement, we see gospel living as the spark that inspires inquiry:

But sanctify Christ as Lord God in your hearts and be ready always to give a defense to everyone who asks you a reason for the hope [of resurrection and heaven] that is in you, yet with meekness and fear.

Those who sanctify in their hearts the One who gave up being on an equality with God, will not give an arrogant answer to those who ask him questions concerning his hope of a future resurrection unto eternal glory. Answers will always be "with meekness and fear" by those who have in their hearts the incarnate Son of God. And because we live by the gospel, others are inspired to ask why we are motivated to so live as we do.

The Bible is about defending the gospel of Jesus because the gospel is the primary reason why we behave as we do. Christians who live the heart of God always have inquiries directed to them concerning their hope. People seek to know what makes Christians behave as they do.

When we understand that the gospel must be the totality of our world view and motivation for our behavior, it is then that we begin to understand that answering inquiries concerning our hope is simple. Our answer is not based on knowing a catalog of appropriate scriptures, nor what we consider to be the best translation of the Bible. It is based on the message of the gospel and how effectively we have translated the gospel into our lives.

We can think of a host of questions that the world today often asks the Christian in order to understand why we live as we do. For an example, a common question that is directed to Christians today is his or her belief concerning homosexuality. The answer to this commonly asked question is simple. Our first response to this question would be, "Was Jesus raised from the dead?" If Jesus were not raised from the dead, then we have the right to live as we please. Paul said it this way: "If the dead are not raised, let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die" (1 Co 15:32). If the dead are not raised, then we have a right to live as homosexuals, or in any manner we so choose, as long as we can get away with it within our society.

The question, therefore, is not about homosexuality. It is about the gospel. If indeed Jesus were raised from the dead, then everything changes in our lives. It is then that we must consult the word of Jesus for direction. Otherwise, the word means nothing, because Jesus would have been just another good religious man of history who was crucified and was buried.

Paul concluded his logical arguments concerning the centrality of the resurrection to the gospel message with the following statement to the Corinthians:

Be not deceived, evil company [with those who deny the resurrection], corrupts good morals. Awake to righteousness and do not sin, for some have no knowledge of God [through the gospel]. I speak this to your shame (1 Co 15:33,34).

Paul warned Timothy of some who taught that there was no more resurrection (See 2 Tm 2:17,18). Believing the gospel would lead to an increase of ungodliness (2 Tm 2:16). If one does not believe in the resurrection, then his faith is overthrown (2 Tm 2:18). But if the gospel is believed, and obeyed, then there is a paradigm shift in one's behavior. The change is so drastic that one's closest friends will ask concerning what happened in the transformed life of their friend.

GOSPEL LIVING

There is a difference between believing in the resurrection as just another doctrinal point on a legal outline of doctrine, and living the resurrection as the gospel of our lives. If we base our faith only on accepting the fact of the resurrection, but can never get it off the pages of our legal outline and into our behavior, then our hearts go untouched and our lives unchanged. It is our challenge as students of the word of God to lift our knowledge of the resurrection off the pages of the Bible and translate it into our hearts. It is only then that our behavior will be transformed into the image of the incarnate Son of God.

It is here that those who approach the Bible from a legal point of view of knowledge only will have some difficulty. However, the experientialist too has the same difficulty in allowing the gospel to be a life-changing experience. Both the religious legalist and experientialist often minimize the power of the gospel in our lives because they minimize the influence of the gospel in their lives through self-imposed religiosity.

The experientialist assumes that religion is about him. Having emotional experiences are to be enjoyed for the purpose of receiving some satisfaction from one's faith, or self-validating one's relationship with God. But in all our experientialism, the gospel is minimized as the heart of our faith, and thus, the impetus for godly behavior. In other words, the experientialist seeks to generate an emotional experience for the purpose of validating his faith. And if his faith is validated solely by emotional experiences, then there is little need for the historical gospel to be the foundation of his faith. Gospel, therefore, as a life-controlling revelation of the heart of God becomes a side issue.

It is in this area that both the legalist and experientialist must be careful in reference to their assemblies. For example, the legalist constructs an assembly of law in order to validate his existence as true. The experien-tialist, on the other hand, has an assembly of meritorious behavior whereby he seeks to validate his faith through an out-of-control experience that he presumes to come from the Holy Spirit. His hope is that the Holy Spirit shows up at the same time on Sunday morning as he does in order to validate his faith. Both legal and experiential assemblies are based on the merit of either law or emotional experiences.

The biblicist is self-oriented because he seeks to win the argument that he is legally correct while neglecting the emotions of the moment, or the life-changing impact of the gospel in his life even before he arrives at the assembly. The experientialist is self-oriented because he affirms that he is emotionally correct, while neglecting the word of God that he may have created religious behavior after his own desires. He too fails to experience the life-changing power of the gospel because he uses his experiential assembly to validate his faith.

Unfortunately, both the legal biblicist and the religious experientialist are missing the power of the heart of God that is unleashed in our lives through the gospel. Their primary motivation for approval is based on either performance of law or experientialism. If their assemblies were gospel centered, then their assemblies would be first and totally focused on Jesus, and not the merit of either performing law or religious rites. This is why those who would emotionally cry out "Lord, Lord" ("Jesus, Jesus") often miss the power of the gospel that is manifested in one's life in response to the commandments of God (See Mt 7:21).

A good example to better understand where one is in thinking in reference to this point is how contributions (giving) are generated in one's life. The legalistic biblicist will quote scripture after scripture, precept upon precept, that one must give his money to God. The audience responds grudgingly with tokens in contribution in order to feel that they have legally complied with the commandments to give. The contributors, therefore, give on the basis that they will sanctify themselves holy, and in compliance to law, if they would only release their money into the collection plate. Since their money is the security of their lives, they are cautious about relinquishing too much of their security.

This helps us understand why legalistic churches view 1 Corinthians 16:1,2 as a legality for contributions every Sunday, and why the gospel starved Corinthians were having problems in this area. They had failed to come through with their contribution, as part of the universal body, to help the famine victims of Judea. Some were questioning the central validation of the gospel, that is, the resurrection. They lost their motivation, and it took a letter from the Holy Spirit to renew their commitment.

In the New Testament, contributions were always for special needs, though often collected conveniently on the first day of the week. Even the contribution on Sunday in 1 Corinthians 16 was for the special need of the famine victims. But the legalist has a difficult time understanding what Paul said in verse 2, “... so that there be no contributions when I come.” Since he has established a law for Sunday contributions, it is difficult for him to understand this statement.

While Paul was in Corinth for several Sundays after writing 1 Corinthians 16:1,2, there were to be no contributions made on the “first day of the week.” Since the legalist has made a law out of Sunday morning contributions, with 1 Corinthians 16:1,2 being the proof-text, he has marginalized free-will sacrificial offerings that arise out of the motivation of the gospel in our lives. Contributions on Sunday are relegated to law-keeping.

The Sunday morning contribution is convenient, but one should not feel guilty because he or she has nothing to put into the collection tray when it passes by. Law would produce guilt in such a situation, but grace would produce peace of mind.

If we approach 1 Corinthians 16:1,2 from a legal perspective in order to identify an “act of worship,” then we will have difficulty understanding that giving must come from the heart, not from a legal compliance to law. Gospel dictates that we give because we want to, but law dictates that we have to give in order to be justified righteous before God. In fact, the “grudging giver” that Paul identifies in his second letter to the Corinthians, is actually the one who would be giving out of obligation in order to keep law (See 2 Co 9:5). The result is that the legal contributor has the desire to hold back as much as possible in order to protect his financial security, but give enough to satisfy his conscience.

One of the best examples for giving out of gratitude took place after the children of Israel, who were by God’s grace, delivered out of Egyptian captivity. In preparation for constructing the tabernacle, God asked Moses, “Speak to the children of Israel so that they bring Me an offering. You are to receive the offering for Me from every man whose heart moves him to give” (Ex 25:2; 35:5,21-29).

God asked that the motive of the giving be based on how the heart of each person moved him to give. At the time, the Israelites were extremely grateful for what God had done for them in their deliverance. In fact, Moses said, “The people bring more than enough ...” (Ex 35:5). The result of their giving, therefore, was phenomenal. The giving was so abundant that Moses had to proclaim, “Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering .... For the material they had was more than sufficient for all the work to make it” (Ex 35:6). These were grateful givers who were moved in their hearts because of what God did for them. They were not legally required to give, but gave out of gratitude.

Unfortunately, legalists are almost always grudging givers. They are cheerful givers only when they have calculated that they can give a certain amount of their security, while holding back enough for security reasons (See At 5:1-4). If one gives out of this motivation, then he will not understand why the poor widow, during Jesus’ ministry, gave her last two coins (See Lk 21:1-4). The legalistic giver simply feels legally compliant and guilt free by flipping in the collection tray ten coins that might be a great deal of money in comparison to the poor widow. However, the one who has been touched in the heart by the heart of a giving God will put in his or her last two coins.

We must not forget the experiential preacher who generates hysteria in the audience, and then proclaims that the people are all “robbing God.” The people then emotionally respond out of guilt because they do not want to be “God robbers.” The focus of their giving, as the legal biblicist, is also focused on themselves, and thus, their giving is also from a motive of self-sanctification.

Add to the self-sanctifying motives that are generated by both the legal biblicist and experientialist, the self-enrichment theology that “God will bless you if you give to Him.” This theology is not only carnal and self-oriented, it is totally contrary to the gospel living that was behaved throughout the ministry of the incarnate Son of God. Those self-oriented religionists who teach that giving is some sort of “investment plan” need to take another look at the foundation upon which they have established their religion. We see none of this in the lives of those in the first century who responded to and lived the gospel.

What the legal biblicist and experientialist have done is generate legal, guilt-ridden, and selfish reasons for the people to relinquish their security, that is, their money. But suppose for a moment that the people were touched by the heart of the One who became poor in all things on our behalf (See Ph 2:5-9). This poverty stricken incarnate Son lived without His own house throughout His earthly ministry. He had no money to buy food, and thus all food had to be given to Him during His ministry. He had no closet full of robes and shoes. He had only one robe, and laid His head down for sleep at night in numerous beds that were not his own. He traveled around in Palestine, not on a “Mercedes” camel, but with feet on which were worn out sandals.

Having been born in a barn, He went out of this world in death in a borrowed tomb. In all this poverty, He gave; He gave the totality of His incarnate life for us who claim to be His disciples. And when we consider the eternal incarnation of His sacrifice, His giving was far beyond what we could possibly do in repayment. He was the revealed heart of God who asks only that we respond to His eternally sacrificed body that was viewed on a wooden cross outside Jerusalem.

And now we understand why it was said of those first respondents on the A.D. 30 Pentecost, “Now all who believed were together and had all things in common. And they sold their possessions and goods and divided them to all, as anyone had need” (At 2:44,45). And now we know that after being Christians for only a few days (At 16:12), the Philippian disciples lived the gospel by sending support to Paul: “For even in Thessalonica you [Philippians] sent once and again for my needs” (Ph 4:16; see 4:15,16). We understand why these new disciples impoverished themselves for the sake of others who were in need. Read the legacy below about those Macedonian Christians—including the Philippians—who lived the gospel for the sake of others:

Moreover, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God that has been given to the churches of Macedonia, that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty, abounded in the riches of their liberality. For I testify that according to their ability, yes, and beyond their ability they gave of their own accord” (2 Co 8:1-3).

When the gospel (grace) of the heart of God penetrates the heart of a disciple of Jesus, as it did the Macedonians, there is no need to beg for contributions. Giving is simply the natural response of those who realized that so much has been given to them through the gospel. When we live the gospel, we do as God did for us through the eternal incarnational offering of His Son. Those who hold up on their giving because of a fear of losing their financial security, have not yet given themselves fully over to the security of the gospel. They are not yet fully standing on the gospel that they have received (1 Co 15:1).

We would conclude this thought with a statement that is probably a sarcasm by which the Holy Spirit sought to embarrass some rich Jewish Christians. First consider the dictionary definition of a sarcasm: “A taunting, sneering, cutting, or caustic remark; a gibe or jeer, generally ironical.”

Now consider this definition in the context of the rich Jewish Christians to whom James wrote. The rich in his audience were rebuked with the warning, “Come now, you rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you” (Js 5:4). These were those about whom James judged to be fraudulent: “Behold, the wages of the laborers who have mowed your fields, which you kept back by fraud, cry out against you” (Js 5:4). These rich had been so brazen in their materialistic behavior that they cheated their laborers by holding back their salaries. Many of those who were the recipients of the letter of James were these fraudulent religionists.

These self-reliant religionists, who found security in their finances, claimed to be disciples of the Poor Preacher from Galilee who was buried in a borrowed tomb. Now we are in the context of James’ audience and his task to shame those who claimed to live the gospel, but persisted in basing their security on their wealth.

In order to understand James’ sarcasm that he gives in James 1:27, we must compare what those, who were first touched by the gospel, did in their relationships among themselves. As the number of the disciples was increasing in Jerusalem in the early years, it was only natural that the disciples take care of the widows among them (See At 6:1-6). Some problems developed because a group of Grecian widows were neglected in the daily distribution of what was regularly contributed for the widows. The problem was solved, and the body of believers carried on. One of those who was chosen to administer the contribution to the widows was Stephen, a man who was “full of grace” (At 6:8). He was full of and driven by the gospel of grace, and thus, he was one whom the disciples could see in his life that he was driven by the heart of God.

Now consider the rich religionists to whom James wrote. They were not filled with the gospel of grace, and thus, they behaved materialistically. They did not allow the grace of God to teach them anything about gospel relationships. The gospel was not the motivation of their hearts. James wanted to remind them that the gospel moves our behavior beyond religion. So James taunted them with something that even in the society of religious people, who did not believe the gospel, would do out of common decency. Even the religious idolaters would take care of orphans and widows. These self-proclaimed religionists to whom James wrote, who sought to live under the name of Jesus, should at least do the same as religious idolaters. But they did not. So James possibly wrote with sarcasm the following statement, “Pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father is this, to take care of the orphans and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world” (Js 1:27). James was essentially saying the same to these “faith only” rich as those about whom Paul wrote: “If anyone does not provide for his own, especially for those of his own household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever” (1 Tm 5:8).

The concept of religion in all its forms in the Bible are negative. In the Old Testament, religion is referred to as idolatry. The use of the word “religion” by James—the only place it is used in the New Testament—would be the same as the idolater who has created a religion after his own desires, which thing some in James’ audience were trying to do. They idolized their money (See Cl 3:5; 1 Tm 6:10). They had assumed that they were Christians, but they were not even being good religionists in their “faith only” thinking (See Js 2:14-26).

We would conclude that in the context of James’ audience, the word “religion” is used in a negative sense. James was taunting the rich. He was shaming them. If they would at least identify themselves as religious, then certainly they would at least take care of orphans and widows. But the religionists of James’ audience did not.

The rich in James’ audience were not doing this simply because James wrote the exhortation to take care of these needy people. The rich were posing to be religious without giving even to orphans and widows.

When the gospel of the heart of God penetrates to the heart of man, we respond as the early disciples who naturally made provision for the orphans and widows among them. At least the novice believer would take care of orphans and widows. If one would claim any religiosity at all, it would be reflected in his or her care for orphans and widows.

Taking care of the poor is our identity with the poverty of the One who made Himself poor by giving up being on an equality with God and humbling Himself to be incarnate in the likeness of man. He willingly gave up His security in heaven, for the insecurity of this world. He asks no less of us. It is for this reason that the Bible is all about the gospel of the heart of God, for when we discover the heart of our Father in the gospel, money loses its personal security. Money becomes the instrument by which we can express the gospel in our own lives as Jesus expressed the gospel from the cross for our lives. This is what those on the day of Pentecost discovered immediately in one day. This is what the Philippians discovered in only a few days as Christians. This is what was reflected in the lives of the Macedonians as they impoverished themselves on behalf of famine-stricken brothers and sisters in Judea. We discover this gospel living when we freely give as He freely gave Himself to us. Our giving freely, therefore, is the identity of our discipleship of Him who gave all for us. Gospel living assumes that one is a giver. Gospel living can be summed up with only one brief statement from the apostle of love: “We love because He first loved us” (1 Jn 4:19).

GOSPEL ASSEMBLIES

There is no command in the New Testament that Christians should partake of the Lord’s Supper every first day of the week (Sunday). But the first Christians did, and thus, our question is, “Why?” Depending on how one would answer this question will determine if he or she is simply trusting in tradition, or seeking to base his or her faith on the gospel.

If our faith has digressed to meritorious law-keeping, then there is always a frantic search for laws by which we can validate our existence or identity. This frantic search is nowhere more intense than when we seek to identify ourselves through a legal definition of the assembly of the saints. And in our attempted legalistic validation to be the “right” church, we often miss the heart of God. And in missing the heart of God, we miss the full impact of the gospel through which God’s heart was revealed, and the foundation upon which our faith must be grounded. We forget that law and gospel are opposed to one another if law is used for self-justification. If law is so used, then the law of Christ is no longer “the perfect law of liberty” (Js 1:25).

Partaking of the Lord’s Supper every first day of the week is one of the best examples to illustrate that many may have, in a rush to self-justify themselves by law, bypassed the gospel of grace. In doing so, they have subsequently relegated the Lord's Supper to a legal religious performance to merit grace every Sunday morning through law-keeping. We must remind ourselves that religion exists because of what we attempt to do for God in order to merit His favor, whether by meritorious law-keeping or good works. Christianity, however, exists because of what God did for us through the gospel of grace.

What we meritoriously do does not define us to be Christian. Religion is based on meritorious rites we perform. We are Christian, however, because of what God did through the gospel of grace that was poured out through the incarnational offering of His Son on the cross. Unfortunately, what many seek to do is meritoriously and legally "perform" the Lord's Supper in order to self-sanctify themselves until next Sunday morning. This is legalistic religious behavior, and thus, an attempt to self-sanctify ourselves before God.

Jesus' establishment of the Lord's Supper was centered around the gospel, which at the time of the upper room experience was not completely revealed. "This is My body" and "This is My blood of the covenant" were statements of gospel that inferred His incarnation (Mt 26:26-28). In the Supper, therefore, Jesus sought to bring the disciples' thinking to the revelation of the gospel, from the incarnation to the ascension. It would not be surprising, therefore, that Jesus said in reference to the institution of the Supper, "This do ... in remembrance of Me" (1 Co 11:25). All that surrounds the Lord's Supper is about remembering and reminding. We remember the gospel, and in doing so, we remind Jesus of the final chapter of the gospel that He return and take us home with Him.

The assembly of those who have obeyed the gospel springs out of the fact of their belief in the gospel. Those who have obeyed the gospel come together to celebrate, study, remember and proclaim the gospel (1 Co 11:26).

On the other hand, legalistic religionists assemble in order to validate their identity through meritorious observances of self-sanctifying legalities. Experiential religion is another system of self-sanctification. Experientialists assemble in order to validate their existence through self-sanctifying outbursts of emotions. Regardless of whether one is legal or experiential, both adherents are missing the heart of God by focusing on what they can do in either their meritorious performance of law or emotional hysterics.

But the gospel is about what God has done in sanc-tifying us through the blood of the cross. Therefore, when Jesus said, "This do," nothing was ever inferred that He was establishing a meritorious legal religious rite that would contradict the very purpose of the gospel of grace. "Doing" the Lord's Supper was never instituted as a law in order to undo the grace of God that freed us from law. What the legalist does, however, is ignore the grace of the gospel in an attempt to self-sanctify himself every Sunday through his observance of the supposed "law" of the Supper.

The experientialist has focused so much on his own emotional performances in assembly that he feels little motivation to remember the atonement of the gospel by observing the Supper. Subsequently, he ignores the Supper, counting it to be only an occasional religious rite to be performed on Easter or Christmas.

The assembly of those who have obeyed the gospel is naturally all about the gospel. When those who have obeyed the gospel through their union with Jesus on the cross, His journey to the grave, and then His glorious resurrection, it is only natural for them to regularly recall their fellowship with the One who revealed the grace of God (See Rm 6:3-6; Ti 2:11). The totality of their lives, including their assemblies with one another, is about the gospel.

If we forget the gospel, or any part of the gospel, as some Corinthians forgot the resurrection, then we "do not come together for the better but for the worse" (1 Co 11:17). The gospel is the central purpose for the gathering of those who have obeyed the gospel, and thus, the Lord's Supper is naturally the central focus of the assembly of the saints.

Because some in Corinth were denying the apologetic foundation of the truth of the gospel—the resurrection—their coming together digressed into an occasion for division that is totally contrary to the unifying nature of the gospel (1 Co 11:18). Because they had questioned the gospel of the resurrection, their coming together was "not to eat the Lord's Supper" in remembrance of the gospel (1 Co 11:20). They were coming together only for a common meal. But they, Paul said, could eat a common meal in their own homes before they came, if all they were going to do was come together for a divisive, gluttonous and drunken meal (1 Co 11:22).

The manner by which the Corinthians ate the Supper manifested that they had forgotten the most fundamental result of the gospel in their relationships with one another. They had forgotten one of the fundamental reasons for their response to the gospel: "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Gl 3:27). They forgot the following result of this obedience of the gospel: “For you are all one in Christ Jesus” (Gl 3:28). The divisive assembly in Corinth, therefore, revealed their denial of the unity that the gospel should produce among them (See Ph 1:27).

The Corinthians had forgotten the unity of the one universal body of Christ that resulted from their common obedience to the gospel. Their eating of the love feast together became divisive: “For in eating, each one takes before others his own supper. And one is hungry and another is drunken” (1 Co 11:21). Because they had forgotten the purpose of assembly in celebration of the unifying gospel, they had despised “the assembly of God” to come together to celebrate their unity in Christ (1 Co 11:22). It was in this context, therefore, that Paul once more reminded the forgetful Corinthians of the gospel of remembrance that the Lord had instituted (See 1 Co 11:23-25).

Paul continued to mandate the centrality of the remembrance of the gospel in the assembly of the saints with these words: “For as often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you proclaim the Lord’s death [this is gospel] until He comes [and this is gospel]” (1 Co 11:26).

Now this would bring us to the reason why the disciples in Ephesus naturally determined that the phrase “as often as” meant every time they came together on the first day of the week. Those, as the Ephesians, who had obeyed the gospel, would naturally do what the Ephesians did: “Now on the first day of the week when we were gathered together to break bread ...” (At 20:7).

Some make the mistake of not understanding what “break bread” meant in the Acts 20:7 statement. Luke wrote both the epistle of Luke and Acts to Theophilus (Lk 1:3; At 1:1). At the time, we suppose that these were the only written inspired documents that Theophilus had in hand. Therefore, we must understand that when the term “break bread” is used throughout these two documents, Theophilus would conclude that Luke was talking about a full meal (See Lk 24:30-35; At 2:42-46; 20:7; 27:35).

The early disciples carried on with the Passover meal, but changed the meaning to a gospel love feast (See 2 Pt 2:13; Jd 12). They continued to take the bread and fruit of the vine during a love feast they ate together. And when there was no bread or fruit of the vine, as is the case with many Christians throughout the world today, then we suppose they had a moment during their love feasts every week to meditate on what their assembly and life were all about. We say this because surely the preaching of the gospel to the world went even to those regions where there was no bread or fruit of the vine. Regardless of whether there is bread or fruit of the vine to be accessed, the meeting of the saints is always about teaching, singing and remembering the gospel.

In order to enjoy their oneness in Christ, the early disciples ordinarily came together to enjoy a meal together, as was common with all the Christians in Achaia who came together in the city of Corinth (1 Co 11:17-33). However, from the 1 Corinthians 11 context, and because of their sectarian behavior and lack of love, we would conclude that the Christians of Achaia turned the love feast of unity into a fiasco of division. Their love feasts became the opportunity for some to manifest that they had forgotten the loving unity of the gospel (See Jn 13:34,35). Nevertheless, this common meal of the disciples in the first century was the natural result of their common obedience to the gospel, and thus, the background upon which they partook of the Lord’s Supper.

The problem the legalist has is that he will seek for a law for the Lord’s Supper to be experienced when the saints come together on the first day of the week. He will subsequently use bad hermeneutics to make the example of Acts 20:7 a legal mandate for observing the Lord’s Supper every first day of the week. But in his zeal to twist an example into a command in his search for a legality in reference to the observance of the Lord’s Supper, he actually, in his self-contradiction, misses the gospel of grace that set us free from law. He has forgotten that it would be a contradiction to use law to celebrate freedom from law through grace.

The legalist has forgotten a crucial part of the gospel about which the Holy Spirit reminded some legalistic Christians in Rome: “... for you are not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14). In view of their efforts to self-justify themselves, the Spirit pronounced the following judgment against the legalists of the Jews’ religion: “For they being ignorant of God’s righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God” (Rm 10:3).

The Lord’s Supper to some has become a cold legal formality to establish their own self-righteous law-keeping every Sunday in order to justify themselves before God. In doing so, they have forgotten the grace of the heart of God in their futility of establishing their own righteousness. Law says that we have to observe the Supper. Grace says we want to. Law makes the Supper a meritorious religious rite. Grace makes it a gospel privilege, and thus, a celebration.

Because the gospel is peripheral to the assemblies of many religionists, the Lord’s Supper has also become peripheral. It is relegated to an occasional religious rite that is periodically observed throughout the year.

Inherent in religion is self-justification, and thus, in one's effort to self-justify himself emotionally, the Lord's Supper does not play a significant role in the life of the religionist. Narcissistic religiosity is inherently exclusive of a total focus on the gospel, and thus, the Lord's Supper in remembrance of the gospel is almost lost among many religious groups who focus only on pleasing the attendees. After all, who really needs a remembrance of the gospel when one can supposedly emotionally receive atonement for himself on the merit of his own Sunday morning performances?

We have now answered the initial question as to why there is no command in the New Testament that Christians partake of the Lord's Supper when they come together on the first day of the week. If we understand the gospel, there is no need for a command. If fact, if there were a command given, then we would end up as self-sanctifying legalists in partaking of the Supper in obedience to law, and not as a response to the gospel.

When Christians come together as a result of their common obedience to the gospel, the gospel is the central purpose for which they come together. It is the center of their assembly. Their teaching of the word of God emphasizes the gospel. Their fellowship meal is centered around their common fellowship as a result of their obedience to the gospel. Their singing is in praise of God for the gospel. Their prayers are in thanksgiving for the gospel. Their giving is a response to God for giving His Son. The Lord's Supper is the climax of an assembly that is centered around the gospel. Why would we need a command for that which is only natural for gospel-obedient children of God to remember?

PARABLE OF THE HEART OF GOD

Jesus' parable of Luke 15:11-32 is usually referred to as "the parable of the prodigal son." But at the very beginning of the parable, Jesus said, "A certain man had two sons," and these two sons had a relationship as sons with their father (Lk 15:11). If Jesus' intention were to speak only concerning the attitude and actions of the younger prodigal son, then He would have probably mentioned that the father had only one son who became a prodigal. The parable, however, involves the relationship of two sons with their father, and thus, the focus of the parable is how the father related to the behavior of the two sons.

The fact that Jesus speaks of the behavior of both sons in relation to their father indicates that the lesson of the parable goes far beyond the behavior of either son. He wants us to discover the heart of our heavenly Father in the behavior of the Father toward us as His sons.

Jesus wants us to see ourselves in the parable as we seek to reflect on our gospel living in our relationship with our Father. This is truly a parable that takes us into the function of God's heart that should be reflected in our lives as we live the gospel.

There are three ways by which we can live in this world: (1) religiously, (2) irreligious, (3) or by the gospel. In this parable, Jesus illustrates religion through the behavior of the older brother. He illustrates irreligion through the behavior of the younger brother in the wilderness. In the illustrations of both behaviors, He seeks to unveil the heart of "gospel living" that was soon to be revealed to everyone in His audience through the gospel of the cross and resurrection. But in order for His audience to understand how one lives by the gospel after the nature of the heart of God, they must first see the inadequacy of their religious approach to the Father.

In the parable, it was the ambition of both sons to secure the wealth of their father. Each approached the matter from different perspectives. Out of frustration, the younger son demanded the immediate reception of his inheritance, and then went on his way. The other older son sought to secure his share of the father's wealth by remaining in faithful obedience to the father. As the parable reveals, one son lived very bad and squandered his inheritance. The other son lived supposedly very good in order to secure his share of the wealth of the father for his future.

However, we must not miss the point of what Jesus was trying to say to His audience in reference to our Father's relationship with us as His sons, regardless of how we come before Him. The father of the two sons manifested grace toward the sons who came before Him regardless of the former behavior of either son. We must never forget that our Father does the same to us.

In the parable, Jesus unveiled the heart of God to which we seek to be close because we cannot resist His love to forgive. The father's behavior, not the sons', is the focus of the parable because Jesus seeks to reveal the forgiving heart of our heavenly Father. We are thus driven to live the gospel of grace because we would never merit the grace of God who is defined by love (1 Jn 4:8). Regardless of what we do, we always have His love because we are always His created sons. We must simply live in response to who He is and what we already have because of our origin from Him.

We must also keep in mind that Jesus was, through the parables, leading the people to the heart of God that would soon be revealed at His last Passover/Pentecost feast. With the example of the two brothers, He sought to reach out to everyone who was striving to be close to the Father solely on the merit of their own obedience. Therefore, in the behavior of both brothers, we discover ourselves in our efforts to receive meritoriously the “wealth” that is freely given by the Father through His grace. The parable focuses on the gospel of grace to which Jesus was leading His audience, and to which grace all must respond on the basis of our total dependency on the Father. We cannot, as either the younger or older son, leverage grace from God through any meritorious behavior on our part. Grace is a free gift that is received only through experiencing its glorious nature.

Two key statements in the parable reveal the underlying motives of the two brothers in order to leverage a forgiving relationship with their father. The younger said to the father, “I am no more worthy to be called your son” (Lk 15:21). The older said to the father, “I have never transgressed your commandment at any time” (Lk 15:29). Both brothers sought to establish their relationship with their father upon a wrong premise. Both based the foundation of their relationship with their father on meritorious behavior, whether repentance from bad behavior or faithful behavior in staying with the father.

One brother sought to restore his relationship with his father through meritorious repentance, and the other sought to maintain the same through the merit of his faithful adherence to the father’s commandments. Both misunderstood the heart of the father in the father’s relationship with his sons through grace. Grace is free, not earned. It is difficult for meritorious religionists to understand that our Father’s grace is always present for those who want to accept it. But we must not forget that God’s grace is not earned through meritorious obedience, neither through meritorious repentance to comply with self-imposed obedience to our own religious rites.

A. The younger brother:

The saga of the story began with one son straying from the father and one son staying with the father. The younger son said to his father, “Father, give me the por- tion of the inheritance that falls to me” (Lk 15:12). And so the father handed over to him the wealth of his inheritance. The younger son then “gathered everything together and took his journey to a far country. And there he wasted his inheritance in wild living” (Lk 15:13). Fortunately, as many young men who have sought to spend some time in the wilderness, the younger brother “finally came to himself” after wasting all his inheritance. It was only then that he began to consider his predicament, and then, work out a plan to change his environment (Lk 15:17).

Notice what the younger brother said upon his decision to return to his father: “I am dying with hunger ... I will arise and go to my father and will say ‘I have sinned ... I am no more worthy’” (Lk 15:17-19). He was certainly reflecting on what he had done and where he was. But his reflection was on what he would do in order to change the deplorable circumstances of his predicament. Because his focus was on what he would do in order to earn a limited reconciled relationship with his father, he sought a meritorious solution that was based on what he could do. “I will arise and go to my father” (Lk 15:18). This was not a repentant response to the “invitation song.” It was the response of one who only wanted to place himself in a better environment that was based on his performance to do those things he established for himself. He went back to the father to earn something for himself. His return was commendable and right. But how he would establish for himself a relationship with the father that was based on his own conditions was questionable.

The younger brother’s problem was in the fact that he assumed that the father was obligated to receive him back on the merit of what he would do. Upon the merit of his return to be only a servant in his father’s fields, he sought to obligate the father to restore him to a meritorious relationship as only a servant, but not as an heir as a son. His “repentance” was only a return ticket to at least enjoy again the wealth of his father, even though it was from a distance as a meritorious servant in the servant fields.

Though the younger brother’s desire was commendable in knowing where to find a solution for his problems of life, it might be good to consider also the fact that his return to the father was still self-centered and meritorious. His repentance to servanthood was only an outward effort to earn a limited relationship with his father. Though he would return as a servant to work in his father’s fields, he was still comparing his existing situation of feeding pigs in the field with his father’s fields (Lk 15:15).

In order to change his predicament, the younger son assumed that he would simply change locations. Instead of changing his heart, the younger brother wanted to simply change locations from the pig fields to the father's fields. His repentance to the servanthood of his father, therefore, was only an outward expression of an inward desire that still focused on himself. He was not dealing with the sin beneath the sin. He thought that if he could only earn a limited relationship with the father, then he would be right with his father on the basis of his servanthood. If he could "self-sanctify" himself through humble servanthood in doing good in the servant fields, then certainly he would have earned the right to be in at least a limited relationship with his father.

Changing his location was in his thinking, not changing his life-style by changing his heart. Changing from pig fields to the father's fields did not change his heart. His outward change was commendable. However, unless he corrected the sin beneath the sin, he would be the same person in his father's fields as a meritorious servant as he was in the pig fields.

The younger son assumed that he would be forgiven by the father on the merit of his willingness to serve in his servants' fields, even if it were service with his father's servants. He sought to merit his acceptance by the father on the condition of his willingness to work only as a servant. He trusted that the father would thus forgive him on the merit of his willingness to serve in the humble location where only servants labor and not sons.

The younger son's problem, therefore, goes deeper than being a good servant. The "repentant" younger son was willing to trade his sonship in order to be just a simple servant in the fields. He reasoned that if he would simply return to service, he would merit forgiveness from the father. His decision to return was based on being received back by the father only as a faithful servant, but not in the position of a son.

So when the younger son did return, he said to the father, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and in your sight, and am no more worthy to be called your son" (Lk 15:21). The younger son forgot that no one is "worthy" to earn sonship from the father. Sonship is by birth and cannot be changed. It does not come through "earned sonship." Doing better in one's life is not a condition for sonship, for we can never do enough. The Holy Spirit reminds all of us: "The Spirit Himself bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ" (Rm 8:16,17; see Gl 3:26-29; Ep 3:6).

The younger son wanted to obligate the father to at least make himself a worthy servant on the merit of his return to the father's servant fields. He was seeking to earn his way back into the grace of his father as a servant only, forgetting that he was always a son regardless of his performance of the father's commandments.

We sometimes forget that our location, or circumstances—pig fields or servant fields—will not change our hearts even if we change locations. It is true that the pig fields will humble us to the point of repentance. We can have a changed mind in the midst of trying circumstances. But trying circumstances are no guarantee for a changed heart. We forget that God is not expecting us to earn our way back into His heart. To Him, we never left. So for us, it is a matter of recognizing where we always were in His heart as His children by inheritance through creation.

The Gentiles, who would later hear this parable, needed to remember this. We are His sons in the pig fields, as well as in the fields wherein we should be as His sons. The heart of God is not limited to our location, neither is His love for us conditioned on how well we would perform as His servants. He still loves us while we are squandering ourselves away in wild living, or living close by religiously in faithful obedience.

The younger son had thus misread the father's love. When this son returned, the father said, "And bring here the fattened calf and kill it. Let us eat and be merry, for this my son was dead and is alive again" (Lk 15:23,24). The younger son was dead in his relationship with the father while he was in the pig fields. However, the father's love for his son was the same in the pig field, or at home in his presence. The father's love toward his son was never dead in his relationship with the son, for the son was always his son. Upon the son's return, and before he could even speak one word, his father responded in his love for the son. "When he [the younger son] was still a great way off, his father saw him and had compassion. And he ran and fell on his neck and kissed him" (Lk 15:20).

The younger son underestimated the heart of his father. And for this reason, he was not returning because he was drawn to his father's heart, but for the purpose of removing himself from the pig fields. His bad experience had changed his mind, but not his heart. We might say that his repentance was initially in reference to changing his situation, rather than changing his heart. But when he experienced his father's reception upon his return, it is then that we assume his heart was melted. When we experience the gospel of God's heart, it is then that we truly understand the heart of our Father, and thus, we respond.

The younger son's love by the father, therefore, did not depend on the merit of the son's behavior of returning to the father. The younger son could not merit himself back into the love of his father, for the father would always receive a wayward son back as a true son and rightful heir because he had not ceased to love his son. This is simply the heart of a father in relation to all his children. Being sorry for the bad things we do cannot limit the wealth of the love that God is willing to pour out upon us. Love is always there for us in abundance when we are ready to return.

We can only imagine the surprise of the younger son when the true heart of his father was revealed in his forgiveness. The younger son had thought that he had given up his sonship. But the father's loving grace was always there. The son was still the father's son in the pig fields. All the younger son had to do was to come back into the realm of his father's heart. No meritorious conditions, as the younger son assumed, were necessary in order to receive the fattened calf and the celebration feast. No meritorious conditions were necessary to be worthy of the father's love. The younger son did not earn the celebration for his return. It was always there anticipating his return. The calf simply continued to fatten until the day the son returned.

B. The older brother:

In their struggle to receive that which both sons so earnestly desired from the father, the older son may have been further away from the heart of the father than the younger son who took his wealth and ran away to a far land. The older brother was far away from the heart of his father because he thought he was so close.

In another parable Jesus spoke of the older brother: "Now He spoke this parable to some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised [judged] others" (Lk 18:9). As the Pharisee in the parable, the older brother would say to the father in reference to the younger brother, "God, I thank You that I am not as other men" (Lk 18:11). The Pharisee boasted of his obedience in comparison to the wayward ways of the tax collector: "I fast twice a week," the Pharisee bragged. "I give tithes of all that I possess" (Lk 18:12). The conclusion to the behavior of the older brother's attitude would be as Jesus concluded the parable concerning the self-righteous religionist:

I tell you, this man [the tax collector] went down to his house justified rather than the other [self-righteous Pharisee]. For everyone who exalts himself will be abased. And he who humbles himself will be exalted (Lk 18:14).

It is difficult to repent of self-righteousness. It is difficult to turn from one's confidence in his own self-righteous goodness. The self-confident religionist finds confidence in his religious experiences and performances of religious rites. He prides himself in an assortment of self-proclaimed self-righteous deeds that he has faithfully performed and bad things he has not done. But in all these merits of self-righteousness, he has forgotten that living the gospel begins first by recognizing the inadequacy of our meritorious spirituality, which is simply religion in action.

The older brother had forgotten that grace teaches us to stay close to the Father because we want to live in appreciation of the Father's grace. The grace of the Father teaches us that He has always stayed with us, even while we were in sin (See Rm 5:8). It is not that we stay close to the Father because we are meritoriously obedient to the commandments of the Father, but because it is there that we find grace for our dysfunctional obedience. Our confession of our violations of His commandments is what keeps us close to the heart of God (See 1 Jn 1:6-10).

When the older son heard the noise of the celebrations for the returned brother, "He became angry" (Lk 15:28). His anger revealed the self-righteousness of his heart and moralism by which he judged his younger brother. He complained to the father, "I have been serving you. I have never transgressed your commandment at any time" (Lk 15:29).

He had sought the father's approval and wealth on the basis of his own faithful behavior as a true son. He thus sought to obligate the father through his own good behavior as a faithful son. He too forgot something that is essential to being a faithful son. He based his faithfulness on his meritorious obedience as a son. He subsequently compared his moral obedience to that of his wayward younger brother. He reasoned that faithful obedience should merit a reward. He thought that he had earned a fattened calf. He forgot, however, that the father also loved him because he was his son, just as he had always loved the younger son who had just returned to His presence.

Herein was revealed the self-righteousness of those Jews who thought they had an advantage with the heavenly Father over the Gentiles because of their meritorious obedience. Jesus thus cautioned His disciples in view of the self-righteous religionists among them: "Take heed that the light that is in you is not darkness" (Lk 11:35). "Therefore, let him who thinks he stands [in his own self-righteousness] take heed lest he fall" (1 Co 10:12). "For they [the self-righteous] being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God" (Rm 10:3). And for this reason, Jesus, as in this parable, spoke to self-righteous religionists “in parables because seeing they do not see and hearing they do not hear, nor do they understand” (Mt 13:13).

Because of his “self-righteous faithfulness,” the older brother, as the Pharisees, placed himself in a position of being a moral judge of the younger brother. Descendants of the older brother today would be saying to the descendants of the younger brother, “We have faithfully been good and not done bad things. We have not strayed, but stayed.”

In our “faithful” and supposed perfect performance of the Father’s commandments, we too are seeking to continue our sonship with the Father. And by doing such, we seek to obligate God to respond to the performance of our faithfulness with a reward. In our self-righteously established sonship we seek to establish ourselves, as the older brother, as moral judges of all the younger brothers who have done this or that which we judge to be contrary to our moral and doctrinal code of brotherhood that we have self-righteously established for ourselves. Because of our supposed righteousness, we have convinced ourselves that we have earned the right to morally judge others. We seem to forget this statement by the Holy Spirit: “For Christ is the end of law for righteousness to everyone who believes” (Rm 10:4). In establishing our own self-righteousness, we have ignored the righteousness of God. We need to remember the exhortation that James made to some self-righteous judges: “There is one lawgiver who is able to save and to destroy. Who are you to judge another?” (Js 4:12).

The error of the elder brother was that he trusted in the performance of his obedience to the Father’s will, and thus, he became a moralistic judge who condescended to the “issues” of the younger brother. Descendants of the older brother see issues everywhere by which they would judge others. They denominate themselves aside as a unique sect of moral judges who would cast judgment on all those who do not conform to the standard of their religious rites. They forget that the Father has other sons living out there in the wilderness of religion for whom He is waiting to return to His loving grace.

It is important, therefore, that the older brothers do not denominate themselves into a unique religion of rites to which they would seek to convert others. Older brother Christians must not deceive themselves into believing that they have earned the right to judge others. We must remember that when we invite others to come to the Lord, that we are not inviting them to join our denomination of moral judges. Our invitation to others must not be to “our religion of judges,” but to the grace of God that exists apart from religious performances that are created after our own desires.

Older brothers are often blinded by their own religious self-sanctification by which they seek to obligate the Father to reward their faithfulness with a fattened calf. In making a moral judgment against his wayward younger brother, the older brother thought he had earned the father’s favor. And in doing so, he sought to move the focus of the father away from the younger to himself. At least, he wanted to put restrictions on the younger in order that his acceptance by the father come through merited obedience. His anger originated out of his heart when he compared his own self-righteous faithfulness with the unrighteous behavior of his younger brother. But in his jealous comparison, he found himself with an unrighteous heart of anger.

In our efforts to be righteous before God, we must be cautious that we do not assume that our behavior puts the Father in debt to reward us. We must remember that we are His sons by grace. This is the message of the gospel. “For by grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God” (Ep 2:8). We receive fattened calves by grace, not as a payment of debt.

When we live the gospel of grace, we are of the heart of our Father who is seeking to throw a feast for all his sons, wherever they may be. As those who are invited guests to this feast of celebration, we must go out and compel others to come. The Father says, “Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in so that my house may be filled” (Lk 14:23; see 14:15-24). Now we know why the older self-righteous and religiously contented brother never went searching for his young brother while he was in the pig fields. When we are content with our own self-righteousness, we are not moved to go looking around in pig pens for those who are looking for a way home.

If we are not going forth and proclaiming the gospel of freedom, then we do not fully understand the nature of the gospel. Since the gospel is the good news about the incarnation of the Son of God, His atoning death, resurrection of hope, ascension to glory, and kingdom reign, then the gospel must be proclaimed to every soul on earth. If we truly understand the heart of God that was revealed through the offering of His Son, then we cannot help ourselves but preach the gospel. It is simply the nature of the gospel to be preached. If we are gospel-obedient disciples, then we should not have to be asked to preach the gospel. It is only natural because of the joy that we experienced when we obeyed the gospel. We must give others the chance to experience the same joy that we had when we were initially obeyed the gospel.

GLORIFY THE SON OF GOD

During His ministry, Jesus made a specific promise to the apostles, as well as a declaration. In the context in which both were stated, His following promise was made specifically to the apostles:

But the Counselor, the Holy Spirit whom the Father will send in My name, He will teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance that I have said to you [apostles] (Jn 14:26).

Jesus had personally spoken many things to the apostles during His ministry. Of all these things, the Holy Spirit would remind them a few weeks later. But in conjunction with this, the Spirit would teach them all things that the Father wanted to reveal to the church through the apostles.

On the same occasion when Jesus was personally with the apostles immediately before His arrest and crucifixion, He identified the “all things” that the Spirit would reveal to them: “*When He, the Spirit of truth, has come, He will guide you into all the truth” (Jn 16:13). This promise made the apostles the source of all truth that would be delivered unto the church. This truth was recorded in the New Testament, and thus, it is with us today and will be with us until the good news announcement of the last trumpet.

We live in a world where some overzealous people have forgotten the function of the Holy Spirit in reference to the motivation that must stimulate life changes. Though the Spirit played a significant part in the establishment of the early church, especially in the revelation of all truth through the apostles, and the miraculous gift of teaching that aided the early Christians, we must not forget one very important declaration that Jesus made in reference to the function of the Spirit. In the following verse where Jesus spoke of the Spirit of truth, we must not forget what Jesus said in John 16:14: “*He [the Holy Spirit] will glorify Me, for He will take of Mine and will declare it to you.”

On the Pentecost of A.D. 30, Peter and the apostles preached Jesus, not the Holy Spirit. The people were cut to the heart by who Jesus was and is, not by the Holy Spirit. It was the message of Jesus (the gospel), not the Spirit, that moved the people. When the people asked the apostles “Men and brethren, what will we do?”, they were not asking what they could get from the Spirit (See

At 2:37). They were asking what they could get rid of, that is, get rid of their sins that caused them great guilt. They asked the apostles “what must we do,” not how they might receive the Holy Spirit.

Since it was the heart of God that was crucified on the cross through the Son of God—not the Holy Spirit—then it was Jesus who was glorified as our Savior on the cross. And it was in obedience to the gospel of the cross that the obedient repentant could receive the remissions of their sins (At 2:38).

The people were promised to be given the “gift of the Holy Spirit” upon their obedience of the gospel of Jesus. However, this promise did not come to them until after they were cut to the heart by the gospel. When they did receive the gift of the Spirit, the Spirit would not supplant the Son of God as the primary motivation for the people to repent. They did not receive the Holy Spirit until after they repented and had been obedient to the gospel in baptism. Jesus commissioned the early Christians to preach the gospel, not the Holy Spirit (Mk 16:15). It was through obedience to the gospel that people would be saved (1 Co 15:1,2). When people start glorifying the Holy Spirit more than Jesus, they often start minimizing the significance of the gospel of Jesus as the primary motivation for life change. Any true Pentecostal outreach is always based on Jesus.

Throughout the history of the early growth of the church that Luke recorded in Acts, it was the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ that moved people into obedience of the gospel. The early messengers did not preach “a gospel of the Holy Spirit,” nor a “gospel of miracles.” Therefore we, as Paul, have determined “not to know anything among you except Jesus Christ and Him crucified” (1 Co 2:2). Our message to the world is about Jesus and Him crucified. The Spirit is the serendipity to obedience of the gospel. But the main event is Jesus Christ, the Son of God. This is the gospel message that moves the hearts of men to respond to the heart of God that was revealed on the cross. As the gospel of God’s heart moved about three thousand people on the first day of the beginning of the body of Christ, so the same will move men and women today to be cut to the heart. When we preach Jesus Christ and His crucifixion for our atonement, we can expect no less a response as that in the first century as we go forth into all the world.

Implementing Gospel Living

Opportunities for the application of Bible principles in our lives arise on a daily basis. It is often that we do not have a particular scripture for a particular occasion or trial that may come our way as we live according to the gospel of Jesus. However, there are always principles in the Bible by which we can make decisions, and thus, respond to circumstances that we face every day as Christians.

The chapters of this book are written for the purpose of bringing to life principles of the Bible that help determine our response to the world in which we live. There is no particular order of the subjects in this book, though we have tried to organize them together in order that the subjects compliment one another. We make no apologies for any redundancy in the material because each chapter was originally published independently in order to deal with a particular challenge for daily gospel living.

We seek to bring the gospel into real life experiences. Because people have commonly created religions after a doctrinal identity, it has often been challenging for some to view Christianity as an experience of living. For this reason, we have sought to challenge traditional doctrinal identities that are outside the authority of the Scriptures. We have done this through the practical application of the gospel in our lives. If there is ever a contradiction between the principle of the gospel, and the dictates of our religious behavior, then religion must be sacrificed for gospel.

Many religious people have difficulty understanding what is meant by gospel living. They have lived so long after the heritage of their own religiosity that they find it difficult to understand that living after the gospel inherently brings together those who are living the gospel. When we all live according to the principle of the gospel that was revealed through Jesus, we are drawn together. Denominational religiosity must vanish in the presence of those who live according to the gospel.

In Philippians 2:5 the Holy Spirit wrote through the hand of Paul, “Let this mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus.” After making this statement, He then proceeded to give an account of the gospel journey of Jesus from the form of God to the Man on the cross. What the Holy Spirit expects of us is to follow in mind this behavior of Jesus. If we can humble ourselves as Jesus, give ourselves for others as Jesus, then God will exalt us (1 Pt 5:6). With the mind of Christ revealed through our behavior, it is our responsibility to humble ourselves in gospel service as Jesus. It is God’s business to exalt us to reign with Christ in this life (Rm 5:17). If we live the gospel, He will exalt us to reign with Christ in life.

It is our goal to challenge people to implement in their lives the gospel behavior of Jesus who came for us through the cross. When this aroma of Christ shines forth in our lives, it is then that we are living with Jesus. It is then that we have the “mind of Christ” in our daily behavior. And it is then that our light truly shines before the world as others perceive that He who lives in us is greater than he who lives in the world.

Living the gospel is the natural response of all those who have obeyed the gospel of Jesus' death for our sins and His resurrection for our hope. And since there is no remission of sins without washing them away in a grave of water, then there can be no hope in a resurrection as Jesus came forth from the tomb. However, if we have obeyed the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus, then there is motivation to live after the gospel of His death for our sin and resurrection for our hope. This is what gospel living is all about. It is as Paul reviewed for the disciples in Colosse:

If you then were raised with Christ—[and we were]—seek those things that are above, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God. Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth. For you are dead [Gl 2:20], and your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ who is our life is revealed, then you also will appear with Him in glory (Cl 3:1-4).

Chapter 1

“MAKE AMERICA GREAT AGAIN”

*“If anyone is not willing to work, neither let him eat.”
(2 Th 3:10)*

When President Trump adopted the slogan, “Make America Great Again,” I presume that there were few people who really understood what he was saying, especially those of the younger generation of America, and particularly, those outside America. Trump is 70 years old, and his voting constituency near the same. All those old gray haired old-timers who stood behind him during the campaign rallies knew what the slogan really meant. If you are less than a half century old, and especially, if you are of the Millennial Generation (those who are just barely off their parents health insurance), then the slogan probably meant little to you. To some it simply meant more food stamps, welfare and government handouts, which means someone else is paying the bills. To the unemployed it meant continuing the legacy of being a job seeker or living on unemployment, and not a job producer. And to many, it might have meant not doing a job with which one is not pleased, or as the reality TV show, doing “Dirty Jobs” in order to survive. Therefore, those who are 70 and older were probably only those who truly understood what the slogan meant. Many of you will not like our definition—I am of that old-timer group. Now you must remember that when the chant was echoed to make America great again, you must define the meaning according to those of us who were there when America was great. This means that you must be an American old-timer.

I can only relate to you my personal experiences when America was truly great. In the middle of the nineteenth century, my ancestors emigrated from where some of the first slaves in history originated. I cannot trace my ancestry back that far, but I can assume that some of my ancestors were slaves to the Roman Empire when Rome raided north Ireland for slaves for the Empire. After the Empire fell in A.D. 476, a thousand years later my ancestors sought for a new start and freedom in a new world.

So two Dickson brothers in their youth caught a ship in the middle 1800s and made their way to America, the New World. The two brothers lost contact with one another in New York City upon arrival, never seeing one another again. (To this day we do not know where the other brother went.) But my great grandfather Dickson fought in the US Civil War, and then headed for central Kansas to farm three quarters of land that had been granted to him for his service in the Civil War. It was a time to make America great.

When I was a young man growing up on that same dirt that my great grandfather settled, as a boy I could walk in the pasture behind our old farm house and see old farming implements that were used by my grandfather and father. There was a horse drawn plow, wagon, field rake, and other implements. My grandfather and father stepped over horse manure as they carved out a future for our heritage in order to make America great. There were no government handouts. There was no one to fall back on, other than other neighbors who were doing the same. And since there were no food stamps or welfare, what the land produced was all there was to eat and to survive. In his youth, my Kansas father walked behind a horse to plow the land. It was not until 1935 that my grandfather and father owned the first engine-driven D John Deere tractor on steel wheels. It was a time when America was great and getting greater.

When America was great, I remember that my brother and I fought to drive the tractor to farm the land.

(We still drove that old D John Deere tractor.) When I was 10 or 12, I kept begging my father to let me drive the tractor 14 hours a day to farm the land. My brother did the same. He was a year and a half older, and thus preceded me in being allowed to drive the tractor. It was a time when America was great. Hard work, sweat, sunburns, 16-hour days, bruises and callouses. It was America the great.

We loved to work, and especially, we loved to farm. As children in a farming family, we did not have to be asked to work. Work was the culture of life that had been handed down to us from our forefathers. When we were teenagers, we always knew what had to be done on the farm. I remember when a particular field had to be plowed since it had just rained. So I hooked up the plow to the tractor at about 9:00 at night and headed for the field. I plowed all night under the lights of the tractor that gave only a limited environment of vision. When the sun was just coming up in the morning, I made my last plowed strip and the field was done. I put the tractor in high gear and headed home for bed. I pulled up the driveway, parked the tractor, and went straight to bed. I remember that at the usual time (6:00am) when our father awoke all of us for a day's work, my father came up to our bedroom, and said, "Well, it's about time to get up." I had had one hour of sleep. I sleepily responded, "I just finished that field." He had mercy and went downstairs. It was a time when America was great.

America was made great by hard work. It was made great when a civilization had a mind to work, and not ask for handouts from others. Community defined the "welfare" system. When one farmer had trouble, every farmer in the county made sure his fields were tended. A spirit of independence and hard work was what made America great. If the same culture of work is not revived in the present generation, America will not be made great again. Governments must remember that handouts will never make a nation great. Governments cannot tax themselves into prosperity. Nations are made great only when the citizenship has a mind to work and has a culture to help one another with a spirit of dignity to be better. This is the beauty of Christianity for culture building. When love is implemented as the foundation for a culture, it is then that the culture becomes great again. But when love is lacking, then the culture is headed, as national Israel was in A.D. 70, for destruction (See Mt 24:12).

FAKE NEWS

We were overjoyed when a South African friend forwarded on to us the following news:

"PRESIDENT TRUMP SIGNS AN EXECUTIVE ORDER TO ALLOW SOUTH AFRICANS TO TRAVEL TO THE UNITED STATES WITHOUT FIRST APPLYING FOR A VISA!"

The official-looking announcement from "the White House" went into detail concerning how easy it now was for a South African to arrive in America and acquire a tourist visa. All that was needed was to purchase a plane ticket, fly into an airport in America, and then, a tourist visa would be automatically stamped into one's passport upon arrival. We emailed our South African friend that it was great news for South Africans going to America, for it had always been the policy that Americans could fly into a South African airport and immediately have a tourist visa stamped into their passports. But America had no reciprocity deal with South Africa.

The following day after receiving the great news, my South African friend emailed me again. He said that someone explained that the executive order from the President was only FAKE NEWS! There was no such executive order and the news was false. We were all greatly disappointed.

When the comatose guards at the empty tomb of the crucified Jesus reported back to the Jewish chief priests in Jerusalem all that had transpired at the tomb early on the first day of the week, the dishonest priests told the nervous guards, "You are to say, 'His disciples came by night and stole Him away while we slept'" (Mt 28:12). FAKE NEWS!

Imagine how hard it was for the early disciples to overcome this FAKE NEWS as they reported from village to city throughout the world that Jesus was truly raised from the dead. Their claim was totally contrary to the FAKE NEWS of the day that was being spread like wild fire throughout the early world of the Roman Empire. Unfortunately, some who had initially believed in the resurrection of Jesus were also reconsidering this truth as reported by the early eye witnesses. The message of the early witnesses was totally contrary to the FAKE NEWS. The early disciples were considered liars by the general public. They were the ones who were spreading fake news by saying that Jesus was resurrected. The social intimidation was harsh.

Because some disciples themselves started to question what they formerly believed concerning the resurrection, Paul wrote a defense statement from the Holy Spirit in order to defend the initial report of the early evangelists. He wrote to the Corinthian disciples that if they believed the FAKE NEWS that “Christ has not been raised, then our preaching is vain and your faith is also vain” (1 Co 15:14). If the FAKE NEWS of the priests and guards was correct, and the disciples actually stole away the body of Jesus, then “we are found false witnesses of God because we have testified of God that He raised up Christ” (1 Co 15:15). If what the apostles reported was actually fake news, which news was contrary to the FAKE NEWS of the priests and guards, then they were guilty of reporting fake news that Jesus was raised. If this were true, then “we are of all men most to be pitied” (1 Co 15:19).

FAKE NEWS spreads fast. It does so because it fits into the natural course of events, and life itself. It is often what people truly want to believe. It would only be natural to believe that the disciples of Jesus, in order to defend their hero Jesus, would steal away His body, and then claim that Jesus was actually raised from the dead. After all, resurrections of the dead were not something that was natural. It would only be natural to believe that a report concerning the resurrection of a man was really “fake news.”

FAKE NEWS is often easier to believe because it is news that people want to hear and believe. Therefore, when one reports something that is contrary to the FAKE NEWS that seems so logical and natural to believe, then he or she is considered someone to be pitied by those who believe anything that is contrary to the FAKE NEWS.

The apostle Paul once stepped into an arena of inquisitive philosophers in Athens, Greece. He boldly proclaimed to these philosophers something that was contrary to the FAKE NEWS of the priests and guards that was surely circulated throughout Athens. He proclaimed the resurrection of Jesus to the philosophers. But the resurrection of Jesus was something that was proclaimed only by the “pitied people.” So the philosophers, many of whom were eager to believe the FAKE NEWS about the Christian body snatchers, “heard of the resurrection of the dead” that Paul proclaimed. However, “some mocked” (At 17:32). They mocked because it was more socially acceptable to believe the FAKE NEWS of the priests and guards.

Nevertheless, some of these philosophers reasoned concerning the evidence that Paul presented. They started to question the validity of the FAKE NEWS. So they said to Paul, “We will hear you again concerning this” (At 17:32). The honest intellectuals had enough sense to believe that there were some very inconsistent facts and logic about the FAKE NEWS. Christianity had grown so fast throughout the Roman Empire that it was simply not logical to conclude that the disciples stole away the body of Jesus. The supposed act of body theft by the disciples just did not square with the circumstances surrounding the occurrence of events at the time. So they needed more information from which to make a decision.

Christianity rests upon the fact that the report of the priests and guards concerning the theft of the body of Jesus was in fact FAKE NEWS. The foundation of Christianity is the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. “If Christ has not been raised, then your faith is vain. You are still in your sins. . . . those also who have fallen asleep in Christ have perished” (1 Co 15:17,18).

In the early part of the 20th century, a British advertiser and writer by the name of Albert Henry Ross set out to prove that the myth of the resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth was truly a myth. He subsequently conducted extensive research on the matter, having believed the FAKE NEWS that was reported by the priests and guards. But as some of the Athenian philosophers, Ross thought that there was something that just did not sound right if the FAKE NEWS was true. He had a hard time believing that Christianity was simply based on the covert actions of some over zealous body snatchers.

So after a great deal of research and reasoning, Ross published a book concerning his conclusions. The book contained the evidence that led him to conclude that the FAKE NEWS of the priests and guards was actually dead wrong. He subsequently published in a book the evidences and logical conclusions that led him to believe that Jesus was truly raised from the dead. The book he wrote was entitled, Who Moved the Stone?, and was published under the pseudonym of Frank Morison. Since its first publication in 1930, the book has gone through ten reprints, the last being in 2006. It seems that thousands of other honest researchers have come to the same conclusion as Ross. The FAKE NEWS of the priests and guards was truly FAKE NEWS.

THE SOURCE OF A TRUE GIFT

My wife and I have a very precious copy of the Bible in our possession. The elders of the church where we grew up personally bought this Bible for us in 1966. They presented the gift to us when we were married. This Bible means a great deal to us because we know that these elders personally sacrificed their own time and money to buy this Bible specifically for us. On the first page of the Bible are inscribed the words, “Presented to Roger & Martha Dickson by the Elders.”

Because the elders personally paid for the gift, we know that the free gift to us was given personally by them. They were the sacrificial source of the gift because they financially partnered with the people who printed the Bible. They did not ask for a free Bible from some other church in order to freely give us this Bible, and then claim that they were the true source of the Bible. Their gift was personal because they personally sacrificed for it.

The significance of this principle of being the sacrificial source of a gift is one of those biblical principles that is probably one of the most ignored in the Bible, if not commonly violated.

There were no printed Bibles when Paul rebuffed the Christians in Achaia in reference to circumstances surrounding this principle. He, and the other apostles, were the Bibles (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). They were the ones who sacrificed themselves in order that others be taught the truth of God.

As one of the “walking Bibles” of the first century, Paul rebuked the Achaian disciples, “I robbed other churches, taking wages from them, in order to serve you” (2 Co 11:8). The one who teaches the word of God to Christians has the right to receive financial support for this labors from those he or she teaches (1 Co 9:13,14; Gl 6:6). Therefore, the “walking Bibles” in the first century had the right to be paid as the medium through whom the Holy Spirit communicated the word of God. The apostles were the source of all truth, and thus, they were to be supported as the “Bibles” who taught the people.

In the preceding case, the Christians in Achaia did not take ownership of their reception of the “walking Bibles” by supporting Paul, the only Bible to which they had access. As a result, they allowed others to assume the responsibility that they as Christians should have assumed themselves. Christians in Macedonia sent foreign support to pay for “the Bible” (Paul) that those in Achaia enjoyed (2 Co 11:9). In other words, the Mace- donian Christians paid for and gave a free Bible (Paul) to the Achaian Christians. The Christians in Achaia allowed others to pay for their Bible. They thus involved Paul in “church robbery” in order that they might have a Bible for themselves.

The elders of our home church who presented us with a Bible did not ask someone else for a free Bible in order to give a free Bible to the Dicksons. They financially partnered with the source of Bibles, and thus, sacrificed (paid) for the gift themselves. They would not involve themselves in “church robbery” in order to give the pretense that they were giving a free Bible for which they had not sacrificed. They took ownership of the Bible by paying for it themselves, and then presenting it to the Dicksons as a gift from them.

Suppose Martha and I took our free Bible that was given to us at no sacrifice on our part, and then we gave it freely to someone else with the statement, “Martha and I want to give you this Bible.” We just lied! We had no ownership of the Bible because we did not pay for it. We were not the source of the gift. Just as the Achaian Christians, we had not paid for the gift ourselves. If we allowed the recipient to assume that we paid for the gift of the Bible, then we would have left the recipient with the impression that we were the original source who had sacrificed (paid) for the Bible. We would have both lied and deceived the recipient into believing that we sacrificed for the gift in order to freely give to others.

Paul was very cautious never to boast in another person’s sacrifices (or, labors) (See 2 Co 10:12-18). The one who claims ownership of a gift that cost him nothing, but which he gives away free in his own name, is boasting in the sacrifices of others who paid for the gift. With the help of the Macedonian Christians, Paul supported himself through tentmaking when he ministered the word of God to the Christians in Achaia (2 Co 11:7-9). But others in Achaia were now taking ownership of his sacrifice (labors). They claimed that the results of his sacrificial labors in teaching were the result of their own efforts. They were deceiving others by boasting in his labors.

As disciples of Jesus, we support the evangelist to go into all the world in order that he does not need to take up a contribution from unbelievers (3 Jn 7). However, as members of the body of Christ, we must take ownership of our own financial responsibilities in order to be responsible for those who teach us as believers.

When one comes forth from the waters of baptism, he no longer has the right to receive teaching without charge. It is now his or her responsibility to pay the one who sacrifices hours in study in order to teach the word of God (Gl 6:6). As Christians, we support our teachers. But also, we have the responsibility of sending preachers to unbelievers. We do this so preachers who are sent forth do not charge the unbelievers for the message of the gospel (Rm 10:14,15). This is what the new Philippian Christians did immediately after they were born again into Christ (Ph 4:15,16). We have always wondered why the new converts in Philippi immediately recognized this responsibility while they were still dripping wet from the waters of baptism.

We can never grow spiritually through the unspiritual behavior of taking ownership of that for which others sacrificed. If a Christian continually has his hand held out to receive something free, which he in turn freely gives in his own name, then those who give the free gifts enable the recipients to stagnate spiritually. There is no free ride to spiritual growth. It is paved with sacrifices (See At 14:22). If one is not willing to sacrifice as his Savior who sacrificed on the cross for him, then he will never be transformed into the living sacrifice which is pleasing in the sight of God (Rm 12:1,2). When we obey the gospel of Jesus, it is only natural to live by the gospel. And in living by the gospel, we live as Jesus who sacrificed for us.

We freely give because Jesus first sacrificed to freely give to us. However, that which we give can be a personal gift from us only if we sacrificed for it. We thus expect nothing free in order to give to others as a gift from ourselves. We will take ownership for our own spiritual growth by sacrificing for the gifts we give. We seek to be the original source of our gifts. If a Christian asks for something free from another Christian in order to give as a free gift to another, then he has hindered his own spiritual growth, and possibly, deceived the recipient concerning the origin of the “gift.” If a Christian has received something free, then he is obligated to freely give to others. If one received a free Bible in the past, then he or she is obligated to freely give a Bible to someone else in the future.

Ever hear the term “regifting”? Regifting is when one gives you a gift, and then later, you give the same gift to another person while pretending that the gift originated with you. Such a practice is repugnant, and deceiving. Why would it not be the same in reference to Bible distribution? It is acceptable to give out free Bibles, but we must not deceive people into thinking that we personally paid for the Bibles that we are giving out to others free. Christians give honor to whom honor is due (Rm 13:7). Therefore, they are cautious to give honor to those people who made the sacrifices for the purchase or printing of the Bibles that we give out free to others.

We have paid for thousands of Bibles ourselves in order to give as we were given to by the elders. We can truthfully say when we present these Bibles to others, “We want to give you this gift of a Bible.” In this way, that one Bible that was given to us over fifty years ago has been multiplied into thousands that we have printed and paid for ourselves in order to present to others. We are the original source of the Bibles we print because we paid for the printing. We have asked others to partner with us in making Bibles available. And thus, others have financially partnered with us in this printing and giving of Bibles, but we do not take credit or glory for the sacrificial gifts (labors) of these givers.

If one desires to grow spiritually, then he or she should go buy a Bible and give it freely to another. We must not expect others to pay for our sacrifices. This was a principle of David, a man after God’s own heart. On one occasion, Araunah offered to freely pay for David’s sacrifices to the Lord by giving him free cows and a free place to offer his sacrifices. But David responded, “No, but I will surely buy it [the threshing floor] from you at a price. Neither will I offer burnt offerings to the Lord my God of that which did not cost me anything” (2 Sm 24:24). David’s heart of God was revealed in that he knew he had to pay for his own sacrifices.

Jesus said to His disciples, “Freely you have received, freely give” (Mt 10:8). He gave freely to the disciples to go out and freely heal the sick. But have you ever considered the tremendous sacrificial price Jesus paid in order to give them a free gift to freely give to others? (See Ph 2:5-11). He was the original source of that which He freely gave. He had sacrificed heaven in order that He might freely give to them. And for this reason, the early disciples never took ownership of that which they freely gave.

We have heard others bring judgment on organizations as the United Bible Societies for printing and selling Bibles. Those who had made such irrational and foolish judgments against the printing and selling of Bibles are actually promoting the total eradication of Bibles from planet earth.

Now think about this for moment. Those who complain about having to buy a copy of the Bible, either for themselves or to give to another, should consider that when the last printed Bible on earth is wasted away because of use, then that would be the last Bible on earth. When that last Bible was gone, then all Bibles would be gone because no one would have paid the printer to print more Bibles.

If the behavior and thinking of some self-centered Christians in Achaia had not been checked by the Holy Spirit through the “walking Bible” Paul, then today we would have no Bibles from which to quote. There would be no quotations from the Bible in all the world because there would be no Bibles.

The next time we ask another brother for a free Bible to freely give to another, we should remember that someone had to sacrifice in order to pay the printer to print the Bible for which we ask to be given to us as a free gift. What would become of all Bibles if everyone had the theology that Bibles must always be printed free and given away free? If the original source of the Bible from which we expect to be freely given a free Bible, no longer makes the sacrifice to pay for the printing of the Bible, then all Bibles will eventually be gone!

We had a Christian brother who was a refugee in the country in which we now live. He made his living by receiving a few cents as a “car guard,” because as a refugee, he could not be employed. Without receiving a salary, he stood all day in the hot sun in a vehicle parking lot to watch over other people’s vehicles. He depended on the benevolence of a few cents from those whose vehicles he kept safe from car thieves.

One day our dedicated “car guard brother” showed up on Sunday morning with a new leather-bound Study Bible. He was ecstatic about his new Bible. We asked him how much it cost and he explained that it cost him about US$100. After we recovered from our shock, we estimated that it probably took him at least a month of tips as a car guard in order to earn this amount of money. Nevertheless, he was so proud of his Bible, and thus, he was as David who said, “O how I love Your law! It is my meditation all day long” (Ps 119:97). Our “car guard brother” cherished the truth so much that he bought his own Bible. He did as Solomon instructed, “Buy the truth and do not sell it” (Pv 23:23). We do not think he would ever sell his leather-bound Bible to any other person.

Because of dedicated car guards as this, the Bible will continue to be printed, and thus continue to exist on this earth. Thank God for sacrificial car guards who are willing to take ownership of the word of God by buying a Bible. And for this reason, we would encourage everyone to invest in their spiritual welfare by buying a Bible, their for themselves, or for someone else.

THE ONE GOD

Ever hear this statement: “The youth are the future leaders of the church”?

If you have either heard the statement, or made it yourself, then there is something you might want to consider in reference to Jesus and His selection of the twelve apostles.

It is supposed that the apostle John was the last Christ-sent apostle to die. It is traditionally believed that he died either during or shortly after his exile to the island of Patmos (See Rv 1:9). And it is supposed that he died an old man in his eighties. Let’s say he was 85 when he died—it is just a guess—since it is supposed that he wrote the visions of Revelation around A.D. 96, and died shortly thereafter

If John died in A.D. 97—again, just a guess—then we must count back to A.D. 30, the date, according to our calendar today, when the church was established on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2. This would have been 67 years before his death in A.D. 97. When we subtract 67 from 85 (the age of his supposed death), John would have been 18 when he stood up with Peter and the other apostles on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30 (See At 2:14).

Jesus began His ministry when He was about 30 years old (Lk 3:23). After a few months of ministry, He identified the twelve apostles, one of whom was young John (Lk 6:13). The duration of Jesus’ ministry was about three and a half years. So if John was about 18 in A.D. 30, then we could subtract at least 3 years from 18. This would make John about 15 years old when Jesus called him and the other eleven disciples to be His apostles. This would not have been unusual since a Jewish Rabbi in those days called their disciples when they were in their early or middle teens. So at the age of 15 John was called for a ministry that would change world history.

Now consider when John, and his older brother, James, during the middle of Jesus’ ministry, asked their mother to ask Jesus for special positions at the right and left hand of Jesus in His supposed earthly kingdom reign to come (See Mt 20:20-28; Mk 10:25-45). If the request occurred during the middle of Jesus’ ministry, then John would have been 16 or 17. Though growing up as a fishermen in Galilee, both of the brothers, as the sons of Zebedee, were known by the Jewish leadership in Jerusalem (See Jn 18:15). Both had been influenced by religious leadership even when they were young boys.

In His admonition of James and John for their earthly thinking concerning what leadership would be in His kingdom, an unusual statement was made by Jesus in reference to their request to be at the right and left hand of Jesus. After Jesus said that they would indeed drink the cup of leadership responsibility and be baptized into the sufferings through which all leaders go, He said to both of the ambitious brothers, “But to sit on My right hand and on My left hand is not Mine to give, but it is for those for whom it has been prepared” (Mk 10:40). Our question is, “Who is ‘the whom’ for which these positions were prepared?”

The answer is found in Luke 22 when a similar occasion about a year and a half later arose when the disciples were arguing about who was the greatest among them (Lk 22:24). It was the time of the last supper and the final hours of Jesus’ ministry on earth. On this night Jesus said to all the twelve apostles, “And I grant to you a kingdom ... so that you [apostles] ... sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel” (Lk 22:29,30).

At the time, none of the apostles truly understood what Jesus meant, though they understood what He said. “The whom” about whom He had admonished James and John on the Mark 10 occasion a year and a half before, would be the apostles of the Luke 22 promise. In other words, the 16/17 year old John of “the whom,” would at the age of 18, and after spiritual maturing and after being empowered with the Holy Spirit, would be judging the twelve tribes of Israel on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30 by preaching the judgment words of the Christ (Jn 12:48).

Now do you suppose that some old Jewish leader of the 120 in Acts 1, or possibly someone among the 3,000 who were baptized in Acts 2, said to the 18-year-old John on that day of Pentecost in A.D. 30, “John, you stay in there. You will be one of the future leaders of the church”?

If we would make that statement today, then we would be questioning the wisdom of Jesus in selecting a 15/16 year old young man, who, when he turned 18, would be one of the leaders upon whom Jesus would establish a foundation of truth to build His church (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). Yes, there was an 18-year-old young man standing up with the apostles on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2 who was also proclaiming that Jesus was the Christ and Son of God.

This would possibly explain why Peter was given the keys of the kingdom to be the first to proclaim the gospel message on Pentecost (See Mt 16:18,19). To our knowledge from the Scriptures, Peter was the only apostle who was married at the time of the ministry of Jesus (See Mt 8:14,15). We would assume, therefore, that he was the oldest of all the apostles. And being the oldest, it would naturally have been him to whom Jesus would have given the responsibility to open the door into eternity through the first announcement of the gospel.

The other younger apostles accepted the privilege that Jesus had given to Peter. Therefore, the eleven began the preaching on the day of Pentecost. After their preaching, they called on Peter to give the conclusion and invitation to what they had already announced in reference to Jesus being the Christ of Israel (See At 2:14).

THE SUNDAY AFTER

The A.D. 30 Pentecost of Acts 2 was the greatest Sunday of all history. The Jewish Pentecost was a glorious day of celebration that was observed by the Jews the day after seven consecutive weeks after Passover. Acts 2 is a historical description of what transpired on this unique Passover over two thousand years ago. What transpired marked the beginning of what Jesus had promised during His ministry. It was the fulfillment of what prophets had prophesied for centuries. In view of the “church of Israel” that had previously existed over fourteen hundred years before the A.D. 30 Pentecost (At 7:38), and the promise of Jesus about one year before this day that He would build His church (Mt 16:18,19), a new identity of “church” was established on this pivotal Sunday of a new era.

The week before this Pentecost Sunday, the initial disciples of Jesus were still in some confusion concerning what would mark the beginning of the new era about which Jesus spoke during His ministry that led up to this Pentecost Sunday. In their own ignorance, and their false expectations as nationalistic Jews, the apostles had asked Jesus, “Lord, will You at this time restore the king- dom to Israel?” (At 1:6). On our side of the A.D. 30 Pentecost, we would judge this to be a somewhat foolish question. But at the time, Jesus kindly reminded these leaders, who would later lead His disciples in less than a week, that they should not be diverted to debates over issues: “It is not for you to know the times or the seasons that the Father has set by His own authority” (At 1:7).

At the time the apostles made the preceding inquiry that was based on their Jewish nationalism, Jesus had been with them for forty days after His resurrection. During this time in Bible class He spoke to them “of the things concerning the kingdom of God” (At 1:3). However, their question revealed that they failed their final exam at the end of the forty-day Bible class. Nevertheless, one week after the failed exam, the Holy Spirit took over and connected all the dots and filled in all the blanks. All truth was revealed to them on the Sunday morning of the Acts 2 Pentecost (At 2:1,2; see Jn 14:26; 16:13).

We need to backtrack in preparation for this Sunday that marked the dawn of a new age. In preparation for the seven weeks of the Passover/Pentecost feast, Jews throughout the existing Roman Empire at that time came together in the city of Jerusalem. It was a glorious occasion when Jews reaffirmed their faith and nationalism. Thousands made the awesome journey from distant corners of the ancient world in order to come together for this annual event that lasted for fifty days.

For many, the journey to Jerusalem was too long to bring their own animals for sacrifices, so they bought their needed sacrifices upon arrival in Jerusalem. Some possibly assumed that a great deal of bread and wine were stocked in local stores in Jerusalem for the occasion, and thus they waited until they arrived to purchase these needed items in order to celebrate the Passover. Grain for making bread could also be purchased in local shops. Accommodation was booked in hotels throughout the city as an estimated one million plus Jews crowded into Jerusalem.

In the seven weeks that led up to the A.D. 30 Pentecost Sunday, all the Passover celebrations had been concluded. It was now time for the sojourners to prepare to go home after being shocked by the crucifixion of three men outside the city during what was to be a festive occasion. Hotel keys were being turned in, luggage packed, and reservations reconfirmed for the first “flights” out of Jerusalem on Monday morning. There was only one last event of the seven-week festivities to attend before sojourners would vacate Jerusalem in order to return to their homes in distant lands. This was Pentecost and God had a special surprise on this Sunday for all those who had witnessed the ordeal of the crucifixions.

On the first Sunday of this new dispensation of history, God had a message that He wanted the sojourners to take back home to their local synagogues. So the Holy Spirit initiated the activities of the day with a great and mighty wind (At 2:1,2). Tongues as of fire from on high identified the apostles as the keynote speakers (At 2:3,4,14). The schedule of events began early on Sunday morning, and the day would end with an overwhelming experience that changed the world through the changed lives of all those who were present.

What made this Sunday so special was a public announcement of the gospel message, and the recruitment of additional messengers to proclaim this message throughout the world. The message was that the week before, the crucified and resurrected Master of the message, had ascended to the right hand of God to reign on the throne of David (At 2:14-36). The crucified Carpenter of Galilee was now Lord and Christ. He had fulfilled all prophecies in reference to the Messiah (At 2:36). And now, the proclamation was first made that in Him only there was salvation offered to all people throughout the world (See At 4:12). It was a simple, but glorious gospel message.

Recruitment of messengers started when repentant individuals who believed the message and Master, asked what to do in order to sign up with the reigning King (At 2:37). The answer was simple: “Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins” (At 2:38). The result was tremendous, for about 3,000 joined themselves to the King, and thus, upon their baptism for remission of sins, they were added by the Lord to the already existing group of about 120 disciples (At 1:15; 2:41,47). There were now about 3,120 individuals who composed the brotherhood of disciples of King Jesus. When “the Lord added” the approximate 3,000 baptized believers to the 120, and “church” officially began (At 2:47).

The addition of new members continued daily throughout the week as believing individuals obeyed the gospel through immersion in water in obedience to the death, burial and resurrection of the King that occurred seven weeks before. The 3,120 total on the Pentecost Sunday included only the initial members. We must also add their children, and those who submitted to King Jesus throughout the week. The number of individuals before the Sunday after now increased substantially. What we do know is that all the adult baptized believers existed as “church” before they had their first assembly the following Sunday after the Pentecost Sunday.

Now according to our often misguided understanding today of how we either define or behave as “church,” there would have been some tremendous challenges that we would suppose those initial members faced throughout the week after the Pentecost Sunday, and the Sunday after. First, we must not forget that they became on that first Pentecost Sunday the church that Jesus built before the Holy Spirit ever used the word “church” in the book of Acts (See At 5:11). Second, they were “church” before the Sunday assembly after that initial Pentecost Sunday when they all joined themselves to Christ through baptism into Christ (See Gl 3:26-29). So before the Sunday after, we could, according to our thinking today, assume that furious planning began. We can only imagine the frustration. If we read our modern-day definition of “church” back into the historical events that transpired after that first Sunday on Pentecost, then we might assume that these first disciples had a very frustrating week. We would assume that they were in great confusion as to how they supposedly must organize for the Sunday after.

With the prejudice of our modern-day “church righteousness,” we might suppose that they scurried around Jerusalem, going from shop to shop, looking for some wine and bread in order that they might have the first Lord’s Supper. For certainly, according to our thinking today, they could not be validated as “church” until they partook of the Lord’s Supper in an assembly on the Sunday after.

And then some may have been worried about even being considered “church” unless all of them in their thousands first assembled somewhere in order to perform certain acts of worship that would identify them as “church.” This meant that some were concerned about where they would meet for this officially acted-out “worship” in the community in order to be identified as “the church.” This posed a serious problem for some. They concluded that unless the 3,120 members, with all their children, and the added members throughout the week, could all come together at the same time and in the same place, they would be considered “churches,” and not one “church.” The community would think that they were divided if they did not all meet together in one place (See At 2:44).

So someone hurriedly arranged a “business meeting” in order to iron out democratically all the complications for the Sunday after, for now things were becoming hectic. During the “business meeting,” some of the first-time sojourners to Jerusalem inquired, “Where is the ‘church house’ in which we can all assemble together as one group, for surely Jesus and the Holy Spirit thought this thing through before they signed up thousands of us since last Sunday?”

Then someone responded, “What’s a ‘church house’? Is this a Roman thing? If I understand what you are saying, then there ain’t any such thing in all the world.”

Then another member suggested, “So where is the nearest civic hall?”

The reply was, “There aren’t any halls throughout all of Jerusalem.”

In desperation, others anxiously inquired, “Then where are the school halls?” The local residents replied, “There are no school halls.”

Then someone thought they had the assembly dilemma solved. “We can meet in the temple courtyard.”

This idea was quickly squashed when a converted temple guard informed everyone, “There are temple guards at the temple to keep apostates like us out of that area. And specifically, there is a middle wall that bars any Gentiles among us from entering certain areas of the temple courtyard. And besides this, there is not enough area in the courtyard to accommodate several thousand people as we are this day. Also keep in mind that it’s hot out there in the open in the direct sun light, and cold and freezing in the winter. Do we really want to subject our children and elderly members to this? We need to seriously consider other possibilities.”

Now frustration set in because some assumed that if they did not assemble the Sunday after in the same place, then they would not be “church,” for they erroneously assumed that “church” was validated as such only by the assembly of a collective of individuals who had signed up with the King the Sunday before. How could they be “church,” they concluded, without first having an assembly in order to “perform” church rites that a “church” should do?

Others worried that they could not be validated to have been added to God’s people as members unless they also placed their membership with some assembly the Sunday after Pentecost. They felt that they needed to validate their own membership in conjunction with God’s addition of each one of them to His family upon their individual obedience to the gospel.

There was only one recourse in reference to assembly. And to some, this recourse certainly meant denominationalism, for everyone could not meet at the same place and at the same time the Sunday after. Including the initial 3,120 disciples, plus their children, and the addition of other members throughout the week, there were at least about 5,000 people who had to assemble somewhere the Sunday after.

The problem was that only about 25 people could assemble in the average small house of the local members. This meant that there would be about 200 assemblies of the approximate 5,000 people throughout Jerusalem the Sunday after. Some were shocked with this possibility, because according to their thinking, this meant 200 supposedly autonomous, and thus, denominated “churches” in the city. To them, the disciples in the city would be “churches” and not “church,” because all the members could not meet at one place at the same time the Sunday after. And unfortunately, this also meant that the apostles and teachers among them would have to go from house to house among all these groups without “placing their membership” with any one particular group (See At 2:46; 20:20).

Now if they were going to meet in so many different houses, this sent the “church organizers” into a frenzy. They scattered throughout the city in search of pews and at least 200 pulpits. They reasoned that the “pulpit preachers” would have no way to subject their audience to mute spectators unless they could stand pompously behind an elevated pulpit in someone’s dining room. And Bible class teachers for the children? It seemed to be an impossible task just to have that first assembly the Sunday after.

During that first week after the A.D. 30 Sunday, the women were also scurrying around Jerusalem from store to store looking for bread and wine for the Lord’s Supper. Every store keeper replied, “All the bread and wine was consumed during the Passover meal weeks before.” Others were looking for collection trays in order that contributions be made to also validate their existence as “church.” They reasoned that without a contribution every first day of the week, the disciples, who had been added by the Lord to them the Sunday before, and throughout the week, would not be identified as the church. And then there was a great concern as to where they would deposit their contributions on Monday morning. And songs? No one knew any “Christian songs.” Someone even suggested in frustration, “We can’t have ‘church’ without a guitar!” Regardless of all their confusion and frustrations, they all “split up” the Sunday after and assembled in about 200 houses throughout the city of Jerusalem.

In the house assemblies of the Sunday after there was certainly a great deal of disorder according to our standards, for no one had time to draw up an “order of worship” in order that all things be done decently and in order. How could these first disciples have ever been “church” without having organized themselves as “church” on a Sunday morning?

According to our “church thinking” today, that Sunday after was surely confusing, so confusing that some today would conclude that the church did not exist even before the members had their first “organized” assembly the Sunday after. Others resigned themselves to the fact that “church” would be started later when the apostles got their act together and wrote some “church orders” for official assemblies. In all this confusion, these people forgot that “church” is identified by individuals who have obeyed the gospel, not by a collective assembly of individuals who have legally and orderly performed a system of religious rites as an assembly.

On that first Sunday after, the first disciples simply met together in homes throughout Jerusalem for praise and hugs. They were simple people who simply fellowshiped with one another around a dining room table in someone’s house. They had no Bibles, only the simple message of their King who had been crucified fifty days before and was resurrected to reign over their lives from a heavenly place. They had no name for themselves as a group. They were not even called Christians, which reference came many years later in Antioch (At 11:26).

Discipleship does not exist because of ritualistic assemblies, but by an endearing love that baptized believers in Jesus have for one another on a day by day basis (Jn 13:34,35). This love was so strong among the early disciples on that first Sunday, and immediately thereafter, that the local resident disciples sold their possessions in order to keep the sojourning new disciples in town in order to stay enrolled in the apostles’ Bible class, for the apostles were their “Bibles” (At 2:42-45). Everyone continued evangelistically teaching Jesus as the Messiah in the temple courtyard to the unbelievers, but they also encouraged the believers from house to house throughout the city of Jerusalem (At 2:46; 5:42).

When all is considered, discipleship of Jesus is actually a simple way of life in seeking to glorify God by one’s behavior on a daily basis. The first disciples would have been truly thankful that one of our “church organizers” of the modern organized church was not in town and in their midst the Sunday after.

FERAL CHRISTIANS

We like Webster’s Dictionary definition of the word “feral”: “A term applied to wild animals descended from tame stocks, or to animals having become wild from a state of domestication.”

My wife and I recently adopted these two cats that looked so innocent and loving in their first impression pictures online. So we signed up to adopt the two felines in hope of replacing a most loving cat of ours that had passed on. We longed for another to grow into the same domain of our affection.

When we saw these two very cute cats online, we yearned for cat company. (Cat lovers should never watch cat videos online.) Upon our request, and without previous visitation of the cats by ourselves, the owner of the two fluffy balls of hair brought them over to our house/warehouse. She unleashed them, and then they immediately scrambled into obscurity. They exiled themselves to some unknown den.

What we did not realize before agreeing to take in the two hobos was that both felines had gone feral for lack of attention. They had been rescued as wild run-aways, and thus, upon their arrival at our house, and for fear of us, they returned to the wild somewhere in our house/warehouse. When no love is shown, cats in a short time go feral. They follow their instincts to go back to the wild. It is how God created them. God created cats with the innate instinct to preserve themselves in the hostility of the wilderness.

After two days, we finally caught a glimpse of one of the phantoms when we awoke in the early night hours while he was on the night shift prowl. But for three days, both of the critters remained hidden and unseen, obscuring themselves like poltergeist somewhere in our house/warehouse. Nevertheless, we knew they were there somewhere, for during the night hours we would hear this cry, “Meooooooooow.”

After the eventual “capture” of the two “ghostly” fluff balls, they were immediately sent straight to solitary confinement in a single room where there was no place to hide. It was then our challenge to bring them in from the wild. Special visitation rights were given to their new owners. At first, when we lovingly squeezed them in our arms, they strained against our caress in order to make an escape. But we were more persistent than they. Our love of cats overpowered their love for the wild.

We knew an interesting characteristic about domesticated cats even if they have gone feral. They cannot resist a God-created instinct about their very nature. They cannot help themselves. Even the most wild and vicious cats of the jungle cannot help themselves. When tamed, they purrrrrrrrr when loved and scratched.

For example, when I was once on a seminar safari in Africa, I visited a lion sanctuary where old wild lions were brought into a caged area to be tamed and protected. In the caged area of the sanctuary there was this flimsy fence that separated tourist and beast. There were several of us tourists on the “safe” side of the fence when I decided I would bravely take a picture of the monster cats on the other side of the fence.

So I got down on my knees, pushed the lens of my camera through an opening in the fence, and then proceeded to snap a picture of a beautiful maned male lion that was not too far away. But unbeknownst to me, and while I was intently gazing through the camera lens to secure the best focus, another lion saw me on my knees, and then came running along the fence toward me from my blind side.

Of course everyone standing there who was witnessing the spectacle gave me no warnings. They were willing to allow me to be lion food for the day just to get their own unique pictures of a mauled tourist with blurred pictures who had been attacked by the king of the jungle.

Upon arrival at my prone position, the head of the “charging” lion hit my extended camera lens and I flew backward flat to the ground in total fright. When I regained my composure, and brought my heartbeat back below 100, everyone was laughing head over heels about what to them produced memories for a lifetime to tell their friends back home.

And the fearsome beast? With a deep purr, he was just standing there, rubbing his head against the fence, trying to entice me to scratch his head. All he wanted was some loving affection, even from a startled cameraman.

So into our loving arms these two fierce feral feline friends had been released in order to be tamed by our persistent care and tender love. Whenever we would capture one of the furry felines, we would scratch and rub their backs and heads. But it was difficult for them to let go of their natural instincts to live in the wild. Nevertheless, these beasts who had gone feral purred again while we tenderly scratched their ears back into domestication.

Now there was an irony of the behavior of our feral friends. Our two new prodigals remembered the good old days when they were once domesticated to be house cats by some loving owner. It may have been that they just let go of their wildness for a moment in order to allow their basic instincts to purr to take over. They naturally loved to be scratched, and thus, they just purred away as we scratched their backs and heads.

If you would become impatient with bringing feral cats in from the cold, it might be good to remember when we ourselves were once “feral” in the wilderness of sin. When we had all gone “feral” in the wilderness, God sent His incarnate Son to the cross in order to reveal that He still loved us. With His heart, He wanted to scratch us until we purred. It was then, by His heart of love on the cross, that He drew all of us out of the wilderness of sin in order to enjoy the gospel (good news) of His love. Believe me, most of us were so “feral” that we fought Him all the way to the cross. Some of us must indeed confess that God had to do a lot of “scratching” in order to make us purr in thanksgiving. Nevertheless, though we strained against His love, we could not help ourselves but to be drawn to the cross of His heart. We eventually relinquished in repentance.

How could we refuse the heart of God that was nailed to the cross? After our struggle through repentance, we eventually succumbed to love. We purred. And we continue to purr in gratitude for the cleansing blood that continues to flow from the cross of love. But we admit that there is still some “feral” nature in us as we seek to keep ourselves from the call of the wild. If we do not continue to focus on Jesus, we will become feral Christians. We therefore walk the walk of gratitude of being delivered from the wilderness. His constant scratching reminds us that we are loved by a God who so loved us that He gave His only Son. And for this reason, we continue to snuggle into the loving arms of the One who, through love, captured us out of the wilderness.

We have no desire to become “feral Christians.” Been there. Done that. And we all have the dirty, stained T-shirts hanging somewhere back in our “feral closets” to remind ourselves of who we once were before we were touched by the heart of God. We continue to remind ourselves of the Holy Spirit’s comforting exhortation: “But you were washed. But you were sanc- tified. But you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus in the Spirit of our God” (1 Co 6:11). GLORY HALLELUJAH!

Now back to our two feral friends. Love has conquered resistance. Wherever we walk in our house/warehouse, our two feral friends are right there at our feet, pestering us with their obnoxious fear of leaving our presence. When they do somehow venture outside our presence, we hear this deep cry for us. We simply answer, “Here,” and they come running to our presence for security and more love. When we are working at the desk, they are there lying somewhere close. When we lie down, they are there close to lie down beside us. They no longer want to be outside our presence.

When God drew us out of the wild through His revealed heart at the cross, our behavior became no different than our two tamed feral cats. We never want to be outside His presence.

He is not finished with us, but He is making great progress, so much so that our “feral sins” of the past are becoming obscure as a distant memory. They are a memory as the apostle Paul who never forgot that he once persecuted God’s people, and thus, was the chief of “feral sinners” (Read 1 Tm 1:12-17). But it is God’s continued love that moves those memories of our past further into obscurity. We cannot help ourselves now. We just purr away in the caress of His love. We now, as Peter confessed, have nowhere to go, but closer to Jesus (See Jn 6:68). The temptation to walk in the wilderness is long gone.

THE HEART OF GOD

I sat there in the office of a secretary who had long been working in ministry for over two decades with this particular fellowship of disciples. As we sat there and discussed this and that about our partnership in world evangelism, there had just come into the office before my arrival this older gentleman whom I had never before met. Age had wrinkled his face and arduous labor had bowed his back. But all these signs of age were covered with a beautiful smile from ear to ear. His arrival at the office a few moments before was a surprise to the secretary who knew him well, and where he was supposed to be. I was just a bystander as she commenced to question him for being there. She lovingly exhorted him to return from the place from which he had just escaped.

What I soon learned was that the jolly escapee was a new brother in Christ. He had just decided to release himself from confinement after spending several days cooped up in a hospital room. He had had enough. So he grabbed his clothes when the nurses were out of his room, and escaped to his old pickup truck in the parking lot. He then made a fast getaway to people to whom he had been drawn by love.

So there in that office of this secretary I encountered this runaway. The secretary had before my arrival made a secret call for help. So the secretary, unbeknownst to me and the escapee, was there in patient conversation with us while she awaited the “Mod Squad” of love.

Our escapee was a new convert who had just come into a realm of love that he had never before experienced. He had lived alone for several years at a small rural location with his beloved dogs, cats, goats and sheep. While surviving in an old shack that was dilapidated beyond imagination, someone who was living the gospel of Jesus eventually made contact with this hermit of circumstances.

When first contacted, this companion of animals immediately felt something for which he had been yearning for years. It was something that was incredibly beyond what dogs, cats, goats or sheep could offer. He subsequently relinquished to unconditional love and joined with Jesus on the cross, in the tomb, and resurrection from the waters of baptism.

And there he was in that office as an escapee from the care of the hospital, for he was not in good physical condition. In fact, he was nigh unto a stroke that could have sent him on into eternity at the very moment we tried to convince him to return immediately to the hospital. His condition was so severe that the hospital had to keep him under close observation at all times just in case.

What happened next still brings a lump in my throat. Two of the servants of that group of disciples eventually showed up at the office in answer to the secretary’s call for help. These two brothers walked in that office without even the inclination of a smile on their faces. They were serious about getting the one for whom they cared so much back to the hospital. They were deputies of love who had come to capture an escapee whom they loved, for they, too, were fearful for his life. They were deeply concerned for the old fugitive. So they immediately commenced to reason with the brother to please return to the hospital, for someone in his condition could die immediately.

The pleading of the deputies of love went on seriously for over thirty minutes. All the time I sat there and experienced the aroma of the heart of God in action. I restrained tears in the presence of two brothers who could not help themselves but to radiate the glow of God’s heart in the confinement of that office. It was overwhelming. I have never witnessed gospel living to the extreme that I witnessed that day. Those two loving brothers had no smile on their faces in order to reveal the seriousness of their love for an old man whom the world had discarded to live alone as a hermit in an old dilapidated shack.

There needed to be no smiles on that occasion, no hugs, just the flow of deep love in order to convince the sick brother to surrender to their loving service for him. If ever “tough love” prevailed, it did that day. So eventually, the escapee surrendered to the intoxicating aroma of love that filled the room. He was personally driven back to the hospital by one of the brothers. His pickup truck was confiscated in order to discourage another escape. He was reassured that others would continue to feed his beloved dogs, cats, goats and sheep, just as they had been doing since he entered the hospital.

These two angels of love touched more people on that day than just an old man who needed for them to stay close in his later years. They touched me. Embedded forever in my mind is the incredible experience of the heart of God that was at work on that day. Embedded in my heart is a true example of how God’s heart works in the hearts of His people. Only God knew that an old man and an old evangelist both needed an injection of love on that day.

Gospel living needs no fanfare, no mention in church bulletins, no newspaper articles, and no slaps on the back. It is a daily walk of life by those who have truly discovered the heart of God. And on the day I sat in that office, I had the privilege of experiencing the heart of God at work in the hearts of two brothers who could live no other way since they too were brought into the sanctuary of the gospel. I cannot remember the words that were spoken by the two angels of love on that memorial day, but I can remember the intense gaze of love that came forth from the two brothers who had the awesome heart of God within them for a dear brother with whom they desired to remain in their fellowship for a few more years. They were truly being fathers in the faith to a new child of God who needed to be loved ... intensely.

Their love probably saved a life that day when a sick old brother they loved relinquished to their love. The old young brother’s response to love encouraged the two angels of love to continue their ministry to the saints in order to release the love of God that poured forth from their hearts (See 1 Co 16:15,16; Hb 17:13). Once their love had been released on that particular occasion, they immediately went in search of other opportunities to once again reveal the heart of God. If I ever find myself an escapee from where I am supposed to be, I can be assured that these two brothers will come looking for me. There is a certain reassuring comfort in this thought. One might say that this is the magic of Christianity.

LIGHT FOR A NEW DARK AGES

We once listened intently to the interview on TV of an 84-year old man enrolled in a primary school in Eldoret, Kenya. Kimani Maruge had set the Guinness Book of World Records in 2004 for being the oldest man in the world enrolled in a primary school.

During the interview, Maruge sat there with fellow students surrounding him. They had elected him to be the “head boy.” As the interview progressed, the interviewer asked the aged Maruge, “Why did you enroll in this school?”

The answer was short and clear. “I wanted to learn how to read,” replied the old primary school student.

The interviewer admired the ambition of the formerly unschooled senior. So she asked, “Why do you want to learn how to read?”

The secular interviewer was surprised with the answer. “I want to be able to read the Bible for myself,” was the reply of the senior primary school student.

Now the interviewer was curious. So she followed up Maruge’s response with the question, “And why do you want to read the Bible for yourself?”

“Well,” Maruge quietly replied, “those pastors preaching on Sunday, you can’t trust them. They don’t know the Bible and they don’t preach the Bible.”

Out of the mouth of the innocent aged the truth was spoken. What the 84-year old primary senior citizen student was saying was more than the words that came out of his mouth.

We live in a world today where self-proclaimed apostles and prophets stand up every Sunday morning and preach, but they know little about the Bible. With eloquent speech, they keep their audiences spellbound in ignorance because they themselves have little knowledge of and often little regard for, the preaching of the Bible. On the other hand, we must say, there are those sincere teachers who are quietly doing the best they can with what they know. But unfortunately, there are too many noisemakers standing behind pulpits about whom Paul wrote. They are “always learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth” (2 Tm 3:7).

As a result of the ignorance of the Bible behind a lot of pulpits throughout the world today, “Christianity” is moving into another Dark Ages. The first Dark Ages of human history prevailed during a time up to and around five hundred years ago. Before the sixteenth century in Europe, the Bible was forcefully kept from the people by the religious leaders who prevailed over the minds of the people. The common people were barred from a direct knowledge of the Bible because the autocratic religious leadership of the time refused to allow the Bible to be translated into the common language of the people. Because the Scriptures were only in Latin, the common people who did not know Latin could not read the Bible for themselves. Religious leaders kept people in darkness in order that they remain dominant over the faith of the people. It was thus, the Dark Ages.

The religious leadership of the Dark Ages had every reason to control the translation of the Scriptures into the language of the people. If the Scriptures were translated, then the people could read the Bible for themselves, without going through the twisted interpretations of the religious leaders. If the people could read the Bible for themselves, then the people would discover that there were some serious problems with the dominant religion of the day.

Nevertheless, some very brave men as Husk, Tyndale and Wycliffe during those Dark Ages, gave their lives in order to translate and print the Scriptures into the language of the common people. Against the will of the religious leaders of the time, brave translators took on the noble task of leading the people out of darkness through the word of God. With Gutenberg’s invention of the moveable-type printing press around 1440, the controlling religious leaders at the time could no longer keep the Bible away from the people. In fact, the first book that rolled off the Gutenberg press was the Bible.

This did not mean, however, that the controlling religious leaders relented in their militant efforts to destroy the Bibles that were printed in the language of the people. “Bible burnings” were common. When copies of the printed Bible were found that had been printed in the language of the people, the controlling religious establishment gathered them up and burned them.

Autocratic religious leaders reigned in those Dark Ages because the people could not read the Bible for themselves. If the authority of the Bible was minimized in the lives of the people, then the religious leaders could maximize their control over the faith of the people. In their ignorance of the Bible, people were thus in the bondage of the religious establishment. And as long as the people were in the bondage of the religious leaders, they could not be free in Christ Jesus. Those who would be free, and thus not bow to the authority of the established religious leadership, were excommunicated, and sometimes burned at the stake.

Satan is still using the same old tactics today to keep the people in ignorance of the Bible. He still uses established religious leaders, but in a more subtle way. His tactic today to keep the people ignorant of the Bible is through a biblically ignorant leadership. This new Dark Ages is creeping upon us because those of faith are still being controlled by their own ignorance of the Bible. It is not that any particular religious group automatically reigns as in the Dark Ages of centuries ago. Nor are people barred from owning a Bible and reading it for themselves.

Satan has become more sinister. He has changed his tactic to using the zeal of a biblically ignorant and eloquent pastor, who produces a lot of noise in order to dominate a willing audience of people who have relinquished their minds to a preacher who knows little Bible. The people have itching ears and follow after those who can excite their minds with fanciful prognostications of “end of time” speculations. It seems that the more noise a preacher can make, the more excited an ear-itching people become. What Paul wrote of a generation in the first century, is also prevalent today:

For the time will come when they will not endure sound teaching. But to suit their itching ears, they will surround themselves with teachers who will agree with their own desires (2 Tm 4:3).

Serious Bible students know that there is nothing new about this tactic of Satan. Except for a very small remnant, over two and a half millennia ago, Satan captured an entire nation in the same way. Even after Divine intervention on Mount Sinai, the nation of Israel eventually went into the apostasy of Bible ignorance. It was not that the people became irreligious. On the contrary, they remained religious in their apostasy of willful ignorance of the word of God. When the nation was brought to an end in the promised land, one of God’s prophets stated God’s judgment as to why the people were destroyed:

“My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge [of My word]. Because you have rejected knowledge [of My word], I will also reject you so that you [as a nation] will be no priest to Me. Seeing you have forgotten the law of your God, I will also forget your children” (Hs 4:6).

That same pronouncement could be made today throughout the world in reference to many who presume to be pastors and apostles of churches, but refuse to study and preach the Bible. Those who would be God’s children are being forgotten because they are being led by those who have little concern for the authority of the word of God. Self-proclaimed religionists trust in their eloquent ability to speak and their positions of religious authority as part of some religious establishment. Independently, some have just captured a church of ear-itchers for themselves.

In their coveted positions of religion, they have become the blind guides of those who are religious, but who are not hungering and thirsting after the righteousness of God (See Rm 10:1-3). As the established religious leadership during Jesus’ ministry, there are the blind guides today who are leading a generation of children into the ditch of destruction because of their lack of knowledge of the word of God. They fail to hear the warning of James: “My brethren, let not many of you become teachers, knowing that we will receive the stricter judgment.”

So what would Jesus say today to the attendees of churches who sit patiently every Sunday in order to hear some knowledge from God? As a generation of “children” who are about to be forgotten by God, they often do not know what Jesus warned His “attendees” during a similar situation over two thousand years ago concerning wayward religious leaders: “Let them alone. They are blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch” (Mt 15:14).

Would Jesus sign off on the blind guides of today? Possibly so, for He said the preceding to the religious leaders in His generation. A truly blind guide, according to Jesus’ experience with some during His ministry, were unwilling to listen to His word of truth. Since Israel was destroyed because the nation moved into a “Dark Ages,” so is the world of Christendom doing today by moving away from a Bible-based faith. It is for this reason that we seek for a Bible-believing remnant who will come out of those who are being led into captivity by those who are “blind guides.” We are calling for those throughout the world who still love their Bibles, to read the Bible for themselves. We would exhort this generation with the same words that Paul used to exhort Timothy, “Give heed to reading” (1 Tm 4:13).

FALLING OUT OF LOVE

Remember these words, “O how I love Your law! It is my meditation all day long” (Ps 119:97)? And again, “Great peace they have who love Your law” (Ps 119:165). Psalm 119 is a eulogy of David who loved the word of God so much.

We now live in a religious world of Christendom as that about which the God of heaven judged Israel: “My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge” (Hs 4:6). This is where many are today in a religious world that is fast giving up the authority of the word of God in matters of faith, and yet in some way, claiming to be “Christian.” If one would ask why we believe this, then please follow with us through the following statements that help us make a self-evaluation of where we are in our priorities in reference to our claim to be “Christian.” Please make a check if the statement in some way identifies your faithfulness:

- ☐ I need a concert on Sunday morning in order to draw me to the assembly.
- ☐ I need a hero (icon – personality – pastor/preacher) around whom I assemble with other fellow admirers of the “person of the hour.”
- ☐ I need to be drawn to a preacher because of his eloquent speech and dynamic noise.
- ☐ My faith is first based on the faith of another, or is validated by legal performances of religious ceremonies by which we identify ourselves as a Christian.
- ☐ My identity as a Christian is based first on how I react in a legally orchestrated assembly.
- ☐ The validation of my faith is based primarily on a subjective emotional experience that I have during an assembly of the saints.
- ☐ I believe in a God who exists only because of the attendance of believers to an assembly.
- ☐ I believe that my worship is acceptable to God only when I am at a unique location that is dedicated for worship.

- ☐ I identify myself as a Christian because I associate myself with a unique name, and not primarily by a gospel life-style of love.
- ☐ When I hear a call for Bible study, I am apprehensive about attending the study.
- ☐ I am not enthusiastic about teaching the word of God to others.
- ☐ I seldom read the Bible, but never study it with pen and paper.
- ☐ I am more excited about studying the books of men, rather than the Bible itself.
- ☐ I read more religious books by men than the Bible.
- ☐ I believe the books written by men are as important as the books of the Bible.
- ☐ As a father or mother, I am not teaching the Bible to my children in our home.
- ☐ My memorization of the word of God has not progressed beyond John 3:16.
- ☐ My faith is based primarily on my religious heritage.
- ☐ The traditions of my religious heritage have authority over statements that are made in the Bible which they may contradict.
- ☐ I am intimidated by the norm of the theological thinking of my friends.
- ☐ My salary as a preacher sometimes determines the theology of my teaching.
- ☐ Being accepted by others is more important to me than the truth of God’s word.
- ☐ My religious beliefs and behavior are often determined by social acceptance, rather than the word of God.

- ☐ I am apprehensive about teaching the truth for fear of being rejected by others.
- ☐ When I discover something new in personal Bible study, I am apprehensive about sharing it with those who sign my pay checks.
- ☐ I am emotionally disturbed when someone challenges my faith that is validated first by the word of God.
- ☐ I am afraid to study the Bible because I fear that I might discover that I am wrong in some of my beliefs and practices.

If we have checked any of the preceding statements, we must never forget the exhortation of the Holy Spirit through John: “For this is the love of God, that we keep His commandments” (1 Jn 5:3). If the word of God is not the absolute center of our faith, then we will create a “god” after our own subjective imagination or emotions. We will then assume that this “god” we have created in our minds will accept any worship that we may invent for ourselves (See Jn 4:24).

Faith still comes by hearing the word of Christ (Rm 10:17). And when religious people stop studying the word of Christ because they have stopped loving the word of God, then they will create a god and a christ who are twisted to their own self-created religiosity. We must never forget that if the Bible were extracted from our society, we would within one generation create in our minds a god and christ who could not be defined by the God and Christ of the Bible. We live in a world today where Bibles are available, but students of the Bible are rare.

WONDERING BEYOND WORDS

We would be presumptuous to write a doxology of existence before Deity uttered the first command, “Let there be ....” What could ever be said in human words before words existed? And if we could write anything about that which was before the beginning, then there would exist nothing about which to write.

After the end of a week of creative beginnings, and in order for us to wonder concerning that which Deity has willed into existence, the Holy Spirit had to take the mind of the biblical chronicler on an adventure of discovery when he inscribed, “And God said ....” It was only then that there was something about which to articulate in the words of man.

Words are the meager invention of existence. Vocal cords and sound waves of this atmosphere produce and transmit words. Ears intercept and decipher. But before the existence of any of these physical necessities for human communication, we would be elementary to assert that the Eternal had to pronounce words in order to bring into existence that which produces and transmits words. Surely there is metaphor in the Spirit’s ledger of the Genesis “words” to create, for a Being who had no vocal cords, plus there being no atmosphere to transmit spoken words, could not use the words of humanity to “pronounce” into existence that which we empirically experience. Our conclusion is that He “willed” the universe into existence. But until the universe fulfills its purpose, humans are allowed to communicate to one another their own “will” through words.

In our most distant wonder, we gaze through our telescope. We are overwhelmed. We are humbled by our insignificance in comparison to the vast galaxies that occupy space. We are humbled by discoveries of immense existence and conclude that we are only a cluster of biological cells on a speck of dust, which speck cannot even be seen—if it could be—from the center of our own galaxy. And there are trillions of earth-like specks of dust and millions of other galaxies that occupy space. Our telescope reveals to us that we are incredibly finite in an infinite existence.

All that we could possibly conclude through the lens of a telescope is what existed before the beginning was “energy” in motion. We find it impossible that a coalition of material specks and gases could create. Since the second law of thermodynamics of the material world cannot be reversed, then we can only conclude that what we witness in the present galaxies is that there was a beginning. But we wonder concerning that which existed before that which we now observe through our telescope.

We are told that the universe is expanding. We have no theology that would conflict with such an assumption. However, entropy is also increasing as a supposedly expanding universe suffers from the decay of released energy. Is existence returning to the nature of its origin?

Since the expansion of the universe cannot be brought to a conclusion, then we conclude that space is infinite, and that surely there will be some conclusion as there was certainly a beginning. As we can only imagine what existed before the beginning, so we are left to wonder what will be after an expanding universe has expanded itself into infinity, if indeed there is an end to infinite space.

Since we all conclude that the beginning was a point of transition from before to after, from nonexistence to existence, then we are all stuck with an unanswerable question. The atheist has no idea what lit the fuse of the speculated Big Bang Theory. The theist cannot imagine existence outside the material worlds to which he gazes through his telescope. If the theist concludes “Who,” instead of “what,” then he must conclude that he believes in a “Who” who needs no words of men to generate existence, for only that which exists in the material/physical world has the ability to produce words. This Deity must exist apart from the material world that He willed into existence. And since He is autonomous of all that exists, then we can only conclude that His existence does not depend on that which exists.

Before dictionaries were written, the “Eternal Who” occupied emptiness. If creation refers to bringing into existence that which is material, then we must assume that only “space” existed in eternity. “Space,” therefore, was the eternal dwelling place that was occupied by that which could will the galaxies into existence.

But why would the “Eternal Who” do such a thing, that is, bring into existence that which was inherently finite? Why would He call into existence an assortment of galaxies, and use only one dust particle of trillions on which to place a living being? We can only conclude that the Eternal Occupant of space and eternity is to be defined by love, for love must express itself, or it is not love at all. And for this reason, creation happened, not because there was loneliness in “space,” but because love had to act. And thus we would add, it is the nature of infinite love that it needs no material existence to exist, but it must create in order to be defined. The fact that we exist is the “proof” of His existence as a God of love.

We have no presumptions as to whether the “Eternal Love” (God) did all this before our present existence, or will possibly do it again after the terrestrial and celestial drama of this existence have played out their purpose for existence. It is simply not our business to surmise such things, though we yearn to speculate. We only wonder what the Eternal Creator will do with the rest of the galactic baggage after this speck of dust is wrapped up at the sound of the last trumpet, or simply allowed to explode away into limitless space. We wait in anticipation, realizing that since He brought it all into existence, then certainly He has everything under control. This is only a logical deduction that defines the One who has the power to bring into existence that which our telescope and Bible reveals.

OBJECTIVE ASSURANCE

There is a difference between subjective and objective influences and responses. Subjective focuses on inward feelings and emotions. Objective focuses on outward influences that often generate subjective responses. Our emotions and thoughts are subjective influences that determine our behavior. Influences from what we empirically experience around us, or read, are objective. Objective influences affect our subjective responses, but objective influences exist separate from our subjective being as a person. Though only God can judge us according to our hearts, He does not accept subjective responses alone in reference to our salvation.

Now consider this in reference to God generating a salvational response and behavioral changes in our lives. James referred to both the subjective and objective when he wrote, “Even so faith by itself, if it does not have works, is dead” (Js 2:17). Faith is inward, and thus subjective. Works, however, are objective, for they are an outward manifestation of that which is within us. Works are something that can be witnessed by others in one’s life. When James said, “I will show you my faith by my works,” he was rebutting those who affirmed that their faith alone could simply be accepted because it was self-proclaimed (Js 2:18).

But James is saying that God does not accept anyone's subjective faith without an open and objective demonstration. He does not accept anyone's declaration that "I am saved," without the objective testimony of obedience. And for this reason, He does not ask any Christian to accept anyone's faith that is not objectively demonstrated through fruit bearing.

Some self-righteous disciples in Corinth sought to masquerade themselves as saints. But Paul wrote that they were Satan's disciples among the sincere disciples. They "masquerade themselves as ministers of righteousness" (2 Co 11:15). But, Paul warned, their "end will be according to their works" (2 Co 11:5). Their inner twisted self-righteousness would be revealed to be false when they were objectively judged according to their works. Judgment will be fair, therefore, because "we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that everyone may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad" (2 Co 5:10).

Final judgment will be objective according to our works, and thus there will be no doubts as to why one is either saved or condemned. And for this reason, God allows us to make an objective judgment of others according to the witness of their works. This is what Jesus meant when He instructed His disciples, "Do not judge according to appearance [of what one pretends to be], but judge righteous judgment [according to his deeds]" (Jn 7:24). We are only allowed to make judgments objectively by witnessing the righteous works of others. In this context Jesus said, "You will know them by their fruits" (Mt 7:16). Christians have no right to judge the subjective motives of one another. However, they are to be cautious fruit inspectors.

We learn from this something very important from this in reference to how God considers both the salvation and faithfulness of any person. The faith that saves is objectively manifested and witnessed by others. It is declared by God to others when others see the obedience that God objectively requires in His word in order to be saved. Paul focused on this principle in the life of the erring disciple: "For godly sorrow works repentance to salvation" (2 Co 7:10). In other words, if it is sincere, subjective godly sorrow will manifest itself objectively in a changed life of repentance, which changed life is objectively perceived by others. As God accepted no faith without an outward expression, neither does He accept any repentance that cannot be objectively witnessed through godly behavior. He expects us to do likewise.

Now we need to apply this principle to those who seek God's approval in reference to their salvational relationship with Him. In the historical context of idolatrous religiosity, believers in Jesus in the first century sought to influence idolatrous unbelievers through the power of the objective gospel event of the incarnation, death, burial, resurrection and ascension of Jesus, the Son of God. Their initial objective statements gave direction to salvation for unbelievers: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you ... will be saved" (At 16:31). This was an initial objective statement that called for a subjective inward response of faith in the resurrected and ascended Jesus. The inquiring sinner had the opportunity to subjectively respond with inward faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. However, in order for the sinner to come into a salvational relationship with God, the subjective response had to be manifested with an objective demonstration.

The Ethiopian eunuch is a typical example of an objective response. Philip objectively presented the means by which the eunuch could reveal any subjective faith. Beginning with Isaiah 53, Philip "preached Jesus to him" (At 8:35). Philip's objective word about Jesus worked because the eunuch responded with a desire to objectively reveal his subjective response to Jesus. So he said to Philip, "See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized" (At 8:36). Baptism was an objective manifestation of an inward subjective faith.

The same scenario developed on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2. Peter presented the objective evidence that the crucified Jesus was the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecy (At 2:14-36). The people, therefore, subjectively responded, for they were "cut to the heart" (At 2:37). Their response was initially inward. However, they had to make an outward objective response before they could receive remission of sins. In order that they reveal their subjective "cutting to the heart," therefore, Peter revealed to them what they must do to objectively manifest before God and man that their faith was not dead: "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins" (At 2:38). A change in behavior (repentance), and baptism, were the objective responses to their subjective "cutting to the heart."

God never asked repentant believers to trust in their own intuition, feelings, or emotions in order to validate their own salvation. He has never required this of people for one simple reason: "O Lord, I know that the way of man is not in himself. It is not in man who walks to direct his steps" (Jr 10:23). If we were allowed by God to trust in our own subjective emotions as a guarantee of our salvation, then we would become narcissistic religionists. This is the belief of manmade religionists who call out to God in order to seek their own terms for their own salvation. It is an effort on the part of the individual to validate his or her own salvation without the objective declaration as to when God declares one to be saved.

As Peter uttered the mandate of the Holy Spirit in Acts 2:38, a God-directed objective response of faith must always be the point of reference where sins that separate us from God, are washed away in the waters of baptism (At 22:16). The objective experience of baptism into Christ is a point in one's life where faith is objectively revealed, both to God and to those who witness the occasion.

After years of spiritual growth, the objective response of baptism is a God-ordained point of reference to which one can always know that God saved him by washing away his sins. This is not the case with the subjective declarant who would spiritually grow beyond those youthful years where he or she sought to declare his or her own salvation by a self-proclamation that is not stated in the word of God. It is God who has the right to declare when we are saved, and His declaration is made by our objective obedience to the death of Jesus for our sins, and resurrection for our hope (See Rm 6:3-6).

Immediately before His ascension, Jesus explained it clearly: "He who believes [subjective] and is baptized [objective] will be saved" (Mk 16:16). The objective (baptism) substantiates the existence of the subjective (belief). However, Jesus continued, "But he who does not believe [subjective] will be condemned" (Mk 16:16). There is no reason to mention the objective (baptism) if one does not have the subjective belief to take one into and out of the waters of baptism. If one's subjective faith does not lead to an outward manifestation of objective obedience to Jesus' instructions, then his faith is dead. It is dead because it is a faith that is void of objective obedience.

We must caution everyone, therefore, that faith (subjective) comes by hearing the objective word of Christ (Rm 10:17). If we do not obey what God has objectively presented through words of instruction in reference to our faith, then we are harboring a dead faith about which James said would produce only death.

God never gave man the right to declare his own salvation through his own self-proclamation that he "received Jesus," "went forward during a 'church' service," or fell to his knees. It is God, not man, who, through His word, mandates the objective conditions that must be obeyed in order that we are assured that our sins are washed away. And His declaration is actually quite simple: "He who believes and is baptized will be saved" (Mk 16:16). It cannot be stated more clearly than that. Our assurance, therefore, is in the declaration of God that our sins have been washed away and forgiven at the point of our obedience to His instructions that we read about in the Bible. Our assurance is based on what God proclaims through His word and not on our own self-proclamation.

NOT KNOWING WHAT WE HAVE

John A. Hunter was a famous "white hunter" of Africa, especially during the unveiling of the continent during the 1920s. In his lifetime work as a hunter/guide across the African wilderness, he entertained numerous foreign guests, including movie stars and European royalty. On one occasion, he received a telegram from two hardy adventurous foreigners who wanted to hunt the legendary Ngorongoro crater of the Serengeti to which Hunter had never ventured. He was living in Nairobi, Kenya at the time, so as a young hunter/guide, he accepted the challenge.

Before the arrival of his adventurous foreign guests, Hunter set about organizing 150 hardy African porters, gathering supplies, and as much information as possible about the remote Ngorongoro crater. He wanted to make the three-month safari a success for his visitors.

Few outsiders had visited this remarkable wonder of an extinct volcano. The basin of the crater was surrounded by a crest that captured innumerable animals on plains that stretched about fifteen miles (about 24 kilometers) from crest to crest. It was an anomaly of nature, both geographical and in wild life. At the time, few people from outside Africa had ever witnessed this marvel of nature.

Once all preparations were made, the safari group set out and struggled for over two weeks through the hostile bush of the African wilderness in order to get to the remote Ngorongoro. While enduring the thorn bushes of the trek, and because the journey was so challenging, Hunter labored as the sole hunter/guide to keep everyone just above survival in order that their destination be realized.

And then finally, after the torturous journey had concluded in a legacy of travel, they reached the crest of the crater. The entire safari entourage gazed down with astonishment across the plains of the crater. It was covered with thousands upon thousands of animals. It was a hunter's wonderland. Hunter later wrote of the occasion:

“All the tales I had heard of Ngorongoro were as nothing compared to the great herds spread out over those green fields as though shaken out of a giant pepper pot. The crater seethed with game. The grass was cropped as fine as a lawn by the thousands of beasts. In the distance the herds seemed to melt together into a trembling mass of white and fawn. There were zebra, eland, giraffe, topi, waterbuck, reebuck, bushbuck, steinbok, Thomas gazelles, Grant gazelles, impala, wildebeest, duiker, oribi, and ostrich. This was how all the African veldt must have looked before the coming of the white man. Here in this isolated crater was the last great stronghold of game” (J. A. Hunter, Hunter, Harper & Brothers, 1952).

Hunter also wrote concerning the obsession of his two foreign clients: “My two clients behaved like children suddenly turned loose in a candy store. They shot until their rifles were too hot to hold” (Ibid.).

One fortunate Englishman had long before made it to the Ngorongoro wonderland before Hunter and his safari crew arrived. The Englishman, Captain Hurst, had established a ranch in the crater after having received a lease from the government to make the crater his home. Unfortunately, two weeks before Hunter arrived, Captain Hurst was killed by an elephant. Upon the death of Hurst, his workers immediately dispatched a runner to report the death of their master to the authorities in Arusha, Tanzania. A runner had returned from the authorities at the time Hunter arrived. The request from the authorities was that Hunter investigate the death of Hurst, collect all his remaining belongings, and then have them sent back to his brother in Nairobi, Kenya, which thing Hunter faithfully did.

When Hunter eventually returned to Nairobi after the three month safari, he was approached by the brother of Captain Hurst, to whom all the belongings of the Captain had been faithfully returned. The brother had gone through the belongings and discovered the lease document that validated that Hurst had been given a ninety-nine year lease of the entire Ngorongoro crater. Hurst's brother was a successful businessman in Nairobi, and thus had no desire to retain the lease. So he offered the lease to Hunter for next to nothing in annual rent.

After talking the matter over with his wife, and recalling the two-week struggle through the African bush to get from Nairobi to Ngorongoro, Hunter decided not to accept the offer. He decided that he and his wife could not give the rest of their lives to living in isolation from humanity, though in a paradise as Ngorongoro.

When Hunter wrote of this story in his memoirs that were published in 1952, he repentantly recalled that what was a two-week tortuous trek through the African bush to reach Ngorongoro in the 1920s, was at the time of writing less than a two-hour drive from Nairobi on smooth roads in a comfortable vehicle. At the time he wrote, the Ngorongoro crater had become the most famous tourist attraction of all Africa. If only ....

Sometimes, when we are given great opportunities, we often fail to realize their full potential. And the greatest opportunity of all was expressed by the apostle Paul: “For by grace you are saved through faith .... It is the gift of God” (Ep 2:8). Grace is free, paid for, and was handed out at the cross. Unfortunately, we will never fully understand what we have in Christ until we walk through the “pearly gates.” We often sadly wonder how many people throughout the world daily turn down the “Ngorongoro grace” that God offers to all with the minimal “rent” of only a few faithful years of service on earth. And, there is no end to the lease on grace. The payments will be eternally cancelled at the sound of a great trumpet, for which we all anxiously await.

When Felix said to Paul, “In a short time you almost persuade me to become a Christian,” he had no idea what he was turning down (At 26:28). He knows now, but we would urge everyone in all the world not to make the same mistake by turning down the gospel that is the door to enter into the Paradise of God.

LET IT ROT!

Harvest time on a central Kansas farm in America back in the 1950s was always miserably hot. Choking dust flew everywhere when our old P-Case combine was reaping through the dry Kansas wheat fields. The dust was inhaled into nostrils to the point that every handkerchief at the end of the day was caked with a dingy mucus dust from the farm lands of Middle America.

Nevertheless, in those days our father stirred us voluntary “child laborers” out of bed at 6:00<sup>am</sup> every morning, especially during harvest. During this time of the year, we three brothers knew that we were in for a 16-hour day until a year’s salary was securely in the storage bins. Those were the days when we laboriously struggled to harvest the wheat fields of our third generation farm in order to provide food for others. It was the way we were, and the purpose for which we labored.

Once when I had wiped the sweat from my 10-year old brow, our Uncle Minor came by for a visit to the farm. He had just returned from a North African country where he had gone to work in the oil fields. During his visit, he related a story to all of us that is still difficult to understand, even these sixty years later.

At the time, he revealed that our American government had decided to give away several ship loads of our precious wheat, over which we and a host of other Kansas farmers, had laboriously toiled. That was no problem. We had enough for our families.

One ship load of wheat was sent to a foreign country of which we had never heard. In order to ship out the wheat, our American government rented the ships and paid the shipping bills with American tax money in order to freight the wheat to the particular North African country from which our Uncle Minor had just returned from the oil fields. The entire offer to the North African country was totally free. It was “foreign aid” to a people who were in dire need of food at the time.

So our Uncle Minor sat there and told us farm boys an almost unbelievable story that made my father’s blood boil. Sure enough, Uncle Minor continued, the ship of wheat had arrived safely at the sea port of the country to which it was freely donated. But at the time our uncle left the country to return home, the ship load of wheat was still sitting there at the sea port. It had been docked there so long that the wheat in the hull of the ship was rotting away to uselessness.

So we asked our uncle, “Why could the captain of the ship not unload the wheat and give it to the people who were starving?” Our uncle responded with what was to us very young farm boys, who had labored in the heat of the day over that wheat, a horrifying answer.

“The government told the ship captain that he could not unload the free wheat unless America also paid the port fees and customs of their country.”

We were aghast. We could not understand. We cannot write the words that came out of our father’s mouth at the time. For years after we just could not understand why a government could do such a thing to their own people. That North African government was essentially saying to us Kansas farmers, “You will have to pay us to give us your free gift to our people.”

Even to this day we find it hard to comprehend the evil corruption to which men will sink for the love of money. The “rotting wheat” episode in our lives changed our thinking. We began to understand why money is truly the root of all evil. The North African government officials cared little for their starving citizenship. They just wanted money to enrich themselves at the cost of famished fathers, mothers and children who were starving to death during a famine.

But then we think about ourselves and the free gift of God’s grace. It was imported FREE on a cross outside Jerusalem. It was as if God, who so loved the world, said to humanity, “Here, take it and feed your starving soul!” But we behave as one who might walk into a restaurant, sit down, have a luscious meal set before us, and then say to the cook, “What will you pay me to eat your food?”

We dream of living forever. And because we do, God sent a “ship load” of grace our way as free “foreign aid.” Would we stand at the foot of the cross and audaciously cry out to God, “How much will You pay us to unload Your free gift in our lives so that we not spiritually starve?” For some, especially those who love the riches of this world, his free gift of grace is still docked at the cross. Nevertheless, we still remember an old song by M. S. Shaffer:

Gone is all my debt of sin,
A great change is brought within,
And to live I now begin,
Risen from the fall;
Yet the debt I did not pay,

Someone died for me one day,
Sweeping all the debt away,
Jesus paid it all.

ANTISEPTIC BLOOD

Science has now given us the knowledge that the alcohol and organic acids of wine have great antibacterial benefits. And in conjunction with its use, wine can help settle diarrhea. But from the beginning of time, the ancients knew nothing of how wine did its magic. They only knew that wine worked in reference to healing wounds and settling stomachs.

When the priest of the Most High God, Melchizedek, came to greet one of the forefathers of our faith and his fighting men, who were returning from an intense battle, he brought with him bread and wine (Gn 14:18). He presented his gifts to Abraham and his men after they had returned from a battle to rescue Lot, his family, and many others who had been taken captive by marauding kings. Melchizedek's gift of bread is understandable. The men had to eat. But what about the wine? If it was poured on their wounds, then the alcohol in the wine would cleanse the wounds.

We have always wondered about the use of wine throughout recorded history. We have usually concluded that it was only for consumption. But we were wrong. After Noah came forth from the ark, he "planted a vineyard" (Gn 9:20). There was a reason he did this. Of course there are those warnings about "strong drink," that is, wine that is consumed which has not been mixed with, or diluted by water (Pv 31:6).

But then there is a curious prophecy concerning the "scepter" that would not depart from Judah (Gn 49:10), an established prophecy in reference to the coming of the Christ. In describing what the Christ would do, a very unusual statement was made in the Genesis 49 prophecy: "He ties his foal to the vine, and his donkey's colt to the choice vine. He washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes" (Gn 49:11). There was a hint of "cleansing" in this prophecy.

We have found that most Bible interpreters pay little attention to verse 11 of this prophecy, for most Bible interpreters are very distant from how the fruit of the vine was used by the ancients for purposes other than drinking. Most confine their understanding of wine to something that was simply drunk. But why would the Christ "wash his garments in wine"?

A good Samaritan might enlighten our understanding. There was a traveller on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho who fell among thieves. The thieves roughed him up in their act of theft to the point that he needed "medical" help. Then came the good Samaritan, whom Jesus said "went to him and bound up his wounds, pouring on oil and wine" (Lk 10:34). The wounds were bound, and then oil and wine were poured on. The text does not say that the wounded traveller drank the oil. Neither does it say that he drank the wine. The wine was used as an antiseptic to clean his wounds.

And now we may have a window of understanding into the use of wine throughout the Old Testament era, and into the New Testament. It was certainly drunk as a product of the vine. However, after the grape juice is squeezed from the grapes, in the usual temperature of the day, the natural sugar of the juice ferments into alcohol within only three days. It is the alcohol and organic acids in the wine that disinfects that on which it is poured, or that with which it is mixed. When wine is mixed with polluted water, the alcohol and organic acids in the wine kills the germs in the water. The water is thus "cleansed" by the wine. When the wine was poured on wounds, the wounds were disinfected. The antibacterial agent of wine was the only disinfectant available in ancient times.

And now we know why Melchizedek brought wine to Abraham and his men. Some of his men were suffering from wounds they had incurred in their battle with the marauding kings. As the traveller the Samaritan treated, they needed the antiseptic qualities of the wine for their wounds. Add to this the possibility that they also needed to mix the wine with the water that was available in order that everyone have purified water to drink.

We remember that Timothy, in his travels, once suffered from stomach problems that possibly came from drinking polluted water. In order to solve the diarrhea, Paul instructed Timothy, "Drink no longer water exclusively, but use a little wine for your stomach's sake and your frequent infirmities" (1 Tm 5:23). Was Timothy instructed to stop drinking water? That would be impossible. What both Paul and Timothy knew, and what we usually do not, is that the wine was mixed with the water in order to “cleanse” (purify) the water.

The Greek word translated “use” in Paul’s instructions, is not the word for drink. Of course Timothy would drink the wine in his drinking of the purified water, but not to drink water that was not mixed with wine. Paul was instructing Timothy to use the wine with the water in order to purify the water. Timothy was suffering from drinking bad water. The disinfectant that had been used by the ancients since the beginning of time was God’s natural disinfectant that came from the fermentation of the fruit of the vine. Therefore, when Noah came forth from the ark, one of the first things he did was to plant a “pharmacy” (a vineyard).

The mixing of wine with water was practiced for centuries before the Christ came to “tie his foal to the vine,” and cleanse his clothes with wine. This helps us understand why Jesus attended a marriage feast where He would have the opportunity to work His first miracle, which miracle involved wine (See Jn 2:1-11). He wanted us to understand that the prophecy of Genesis 49:11 was fulfilled in Him. And He wanted to prepare the thinking of the people for the cleansing blood of the cross that would come in about three years from this time.

During the feast, the host explained that there was a difference between “inferior wine” and “good wine” (Jn 2:10). The only difference between the “inferior wine,” and the “good wine” that Jesus created, was that one was possibly mixed with water and the other was not. The advantage of the mixed water and wine was that it was difficult to drink enough of it in order to become drunk. One can drink only so much liquid, and thus, one can drink only so much “inferior wine.” But after one has drunk as much as he can of the “inferior wine” (mixed), then comes the “good wine,” of which Jesus provided in abundance. He would provide the same at the cross. He would provide new wine that would burst upon the old wineskins of Jewish religiosity (See Mt 9:17).

While we lived in Sao Paulo, Brazil many years ago, one would never, in any large populated Brazilian city, drink water directly from the tap. The water must first be filtered, and then, the filtered water was “cleansed” with a purifying agent. It was then safe to drink. It seems that Timothy had been drinking the water of the densely populated area of Ephesus, and as a result, he suffered some problems that came from drinking polluted water. Paul reminded him of the purifying agent of wine in order to clean up his water, and his diarrhea, and thus, be returned to health.

We say all the preceding in order to better understand what Jesus meant on the night when He poured forth His cleansing blood on a cross. Maybe there is more meaning to what Jesus said when He held up a cup of the fruit of the vine during His final supper with His disciples, and said, “For this is My blood of the covenant that is shed for many for the remission [cleansing] of sins” (Mt 26:28).

The disciples who were sitting there had been taught that for centuries wine was used to cleanse water and heal wounds. And now the fruit of the vine would take on a metaphorical meaning when it was drunk in remembrance of the new covenant. The fruit of the vine would symbolize the cleansing blood of the covenant. For us His disciples, who walk in the light of this new covenant, “the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanses us from all sin” (1 Jn 1:7).

When a soldier pierced the side of Jesus on the cross, we now believe that we have a better understanding of the statement that John wrote of what seemed to be an insignificant event: “blood and water came out” (Jn 19:34). When we drink the fruit of the vine during the Lord’s Supper, we remember how water is cleansed when it is “mingled” with wine. When His blood is mingled with our souls, we too are cleansed. The cleansing power of the contents of the cup was on the mind’s of the disciples when Jesus held up the cup. They knew that wine cleansed water and wounds. They would later understand that His blood would cleanse their souls of sin.

The next time you partake of the “blood of the covenant,” it would be good to remember that the Christ was wounded in order to anoint our wounds with His cleansing blood. And as each one of us drink the fruit of the vine, we will remember that it is the blood of Jesus that goes continually through our veins to keep our souls disinfected from sin. This is gospel thinking. It is the mind of Christ that we should have in our thinking as we draw near to the table and remember who we are because of what He did. Another way of saying this is that this is gospel thinking. We do not cheat ourselves, therefore, by infrequently remembering that why assemble together. We frequently remember because of what He did by offering His incarnate body on the cross for our sins.

Chapter 15

ALL THINGS IN COMMON

“Now all who believed were together and had all things in common.”

(At 2:44)

This is a statement of the culture of fellowship that existed in the early church. This was a historical statement of brotherhood ... fellowship ... camaraderie ... sharing ... unity ... and just human instinct that results from the movement of a people into a new paradigm of gospel behavior. The statement was made of those who obeyed the gospel on the day of Pentecost over two thousand years ago. What was recorded of the behavior of these gospel obedient believers reflects a social paradigm shift from individualism to collective responsibility. It was a shift from self-centered religiosity to the selfless gospel living of those who wanted to remain together as one body of Christ.

We live on a continent of post-colonialism. Colonialism meant that some European power took over and took care of their claimed territory, and the citizenship thereof. On this continent, we live also in a country of post-apartheid where cultures of people within the country were cared for by one culture of people, who had in the past, maintained the control of the country. In order to maintain their self-determination of the country as a whole, homelands of different cultures were established within the country. The dominant culture then wrote multimillion dollar checks every year in order to take care of the people of the homelands.

The negative cultural training of the people of post-colonialism and apartheid was the development of a people who often want to continue to be taken care of. The foreign colonial governments have long since gone. For almost a quarter century, apartheid was buried through democratic elections by all the people. But the legacy of “being taken care of” still lingers. As a result, leadership, whether in government or church, has been handicapped with the urge and behavior of “being taken care of.”

This is what makes the historical statement of Acts 2:44 concerning the early Christians very intriguing in its application to post colonial and apartheid cultures. There is something about the gospel that changes people from looking for someone to take care of them to looking for others for whom they can care for.

There is a uniqueness in a gospel culture to take ownership of one’s responsibility of himself and others in order that the community of slaves (the church), reach out to the lost. It is truly a paradigm shift from worldly thinking. It is a life-style principle of behavior that is often quite difficult for post colonial and apartheid citizens to grasp. It will take a few generations to weed out of these cultures the urge for someone to take care of them. However, those who adopt the spirit of the gospel can weed out such behavior in one day, as did those on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2:44. When one obeys the gospel, outstretched begging hands are immediately transformed into helping hands.

“Having all things in common” defines the social core of gospel living for all those who have obeyed the gospel. Jesus illustrated exactly what this meant when He met with the apostles at a breakfast on the beach of the Sea of Galilee. He had taken care of the apostles during His ministry, and now, it was time for them to learn how to take ownership of themselves as a group without someone taking care of them.

The occasion was that the apostles had fished all night (Jn 21:3). They had caught nothing. Then Jesus showed up on the beach, cooking a few fish and having some bread (Jn 21:9). After the apostles had a miraculous catch of fish, they brought their fish to the beach where Jesus was cooking the fish that He had provided. Now notice what Jesus said to them, “Bring some of the fish that you have now caught” (Jn 21:10). Jesus did not supply all the fish that was needed to feed the whole group. In other words, if they were going to eat in fellowship with Jesus, they had to pay with their own fish. Jesus was not going to pay their bill at the table.

Jesus could certainly have provided enough fish for everyone who was present, as He had on other occasions (Mt 14:13-21; 15:29-39). But the occasion was now different. A new paradigm of fellowship was being established. It was now time for them to live according to the gospel of mutual sharing.

The beach breakfast was after the resurrection, and prior to the ascension. It was now time to make a paradigm shift in the fellowship among the disciples. Jesus was no longer “taking care of them.” They were to “have all things in common,” and thus, to mutually take care of one another with what each member of the group could bring to the table. Therefore, He called on them to share in the breakfast by providing their share of the fish that was needed for the occasion. In Acts 2:44, this principle of gospel living permeated the fellowship of the early disciples.

When disciples “have all things in common,” everyone comes to the table with his or her share of the food. No one person has the responsibility of “taking care of” the physical needs of the entire group. In fact, if anyone would not “bring his share of fish to the table,” “neither let him eat” (2 Th 3:10). Paul was stringent about this principle, for it was a principle that defined the fellowship of the disciples from the very first day of the existence of the church. He reminded the Christians in Thessalonica about his gospel behavior when he, Timothy and Silas initially came to them: “... nor did we eat any man’s bread without paying for it” (2 Th 3:8). These evangelists did not sit at the table of fellowship without paying for their share. They allowed no one to pick up their tab.

“Having all things in common” means that every member of the group brings something to share with the group. When one becomes a Christian, he or she comes into a social paradigm in which every member of the group mutually shares with every member of the group. If one can work to provide for himself and others, but is not willing to work, then he cannot be a part of this community of those who “have all things in common.” In fact, such a one is walking disorderly because he refuses to work in order to mutually share with others. And thus, according to the instructions of the Holy Spirit, this member must be sent out of the group in order that he or she be ashamed of his or her selfish behavior and narcissistic self-centeredness (2 Th 3:6).

Remember when the poor widow gave her last two coins for the temple tax? Jesus said of her contribution,

“I say to you that this poor widow has put in more than all” (Lk 21:3). “She out of her poverty has put in all the livelihood that she had” (Lk 21:4). Why did she do this? Jesus was standing right there and He did not relieve her of her responsibilities because she was poor. She gave out of her poverty because she wanted to take ownership of her responsibilities to pay her share. She did not want someone else to “pay for her lunch.” She felt that if she could not pay her way, then she had no fellowship with the group. And for this reason, the disciples in Macedonia begged Paul to take their contribution for the famine victims of Judea in order that they enjoy “the fellowship of the ministering to the saints” (2 Co 8:4). This is sacrificial giving according to the spirit of the gospel.

The Macedonians sacrificially partnered in the fellowship of the saints after they obeyed the gospel. But the poor widow gave her last two coins before Jesus’ sacrifice of the cross. She did it before the resurrection and ascension. Now what would we think of anyone who has obeyed the gospel, but is not willing to take ownership of their responsibility to mutually share with the body?

Those who do not seek to “bring also their fish” to the table have not understood what it means to live after the principle of the gospel of Jesus. They do not understand the principle of the gospel giving.

TOGETHER

“Now all who believed were together.” (At 2:44)

We have close friends we encounter every few years. When we eventually meet, it is as if we had never parted. We pick up our conversation where we left off several years before. You know what we mean, and possibly this will give some insight into what the Holy Spirit meant when He spoke of the early disciples in Jerusalem being “together” in a spiritual bond that superseded their presence with one another.

Some have difficulty understanding what it means when Luke recorded in Acts 2 that those who “believed were together.” They misunderstand because they are reading into the text their present social/religious cultural behavior. Because some define Christianity as a system of assemblies, they assume that the word “together” refers to the regular Sunday assembly of those early Christians. Some even believe that “together” means that ALL the Christians in the city of Jerusalem assembled together in one place at the same time. But we think this is an understatement of the solidarity of the early body of Christ.

If we would understand “together” after the churchianity by which we consider one another “faithful” in attendance today, then we will run into some very perplexing difficulties in understanding the nature of the camaraderie of the early disciples. First, consider the fact that on that first day of the beginning of the church, about three thousand individuals obeyed the gospel (At 2:41). Does this mean that in order to be “together” all these disciples assembled in the same place at the same time the following Sunday after the Pentecost Sunday? Were they not “together” before they came together in assembly? Some say they assembled together on the first day of the week in the temple courtyard. But they misunderstand Acts 5:42 that defined the function of the saints a few years later. They were “daily in the temple and in every house” teaching and preaching Jesus as the Christ. Teaching and preaching Jesus as the Christ refers to an audience of unbelievers, not believers. The believers already believed that Jesus was the Christ. They were in the temple courtyard preaching the gospel to the yet unbelieving Jews who gathered there.

Second, if being “together” means that they were all together at the same time and in the same place, then we have a location problem. There were no purpose-built “church buildings” in Jerusalem. There were no church buildings in the entire Roman Empire for three centuries after the establishment of the church on that glorious day of Pentecost in A.D. 30 in Jerusalem. The early Christians met in the homes of the disciples throughout the city of Jerusalem, as well as homes throughout regions to which the gospel was preached and obeyed. When Peter was released from an imprisonment in Jerusalem, he went to one of those houses, the house of Mary (At 12:12). But then he told others to go and announce his release from prison to others who were praying in other homes (At 12:17). There is no historical or archaeological record of the existence of any purpose-built church buildings in Jerusalem for centuries later. At one time it is estimated that there were at least 30,000 Christians in Jerusalem not many years after the beginning in A.D. 30. All these Christians were “together,” but they were not all meeting together at the same place and time on Sunday.

Those thousands of Christians in Jerusalem in the early days of the church were meeting in hundreds of homes throughout the city. Nevertheless, they were still “together.” Even on the first Sunday after Pentecost, when there were about three thousand new disciples in the city, they “split up” and met in homes throughout the city. But they were still “together.” “Splitting up” to meet on Sunday in homes does not mean that they were not “together.”

“The number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly” (At 6:7). By the time of the events of Acts 4, “the number of the men was about five thousand” (At 4:4). If we add women and children to this number of individuals, we can conservatively estimate that there were possibly 10,000 individuals meeting in homes in Jerusalem by the time of the recorded events of Acts 4. If an estimated twenty-five people could meet in the ordinary house, then there would have been about 400 assemblies in 400 houses throughout Jerusalem every Sunday. But they were still “together.”

Being “together” as Christians in Acts 2:44 does not refer specifically to assemblies with one another. If we assume that the early Christians had to be in one another’s presence in order to be “together,” then we have a very shallow understanding of what the Holy Spirit meant when He said that they were “together” in Christ. Their being “together” refers to fellowship in spirit and ministry because of their common obedience to the gospel.

Words as “solidarity,” “camaraderie,” “bonded” and “fellowship” would be words that would define what “together” means in the context of Acts 2. Though there were several hundred assemblies of the disciples throughout Jerusalem, the members were still “together” as the body. They were “together” because they knew who they were as disciples of Jesus, and what they were to do as His disciples. “Together” refers to a spiritually bonded community of all those who commonly obeyed the one gospel, regardless of whether the obedient are in eye contact with one another. This is exactly what John meant when he wrote the following: “That which we have seen and heard we declare to you so that you also may have fellowship with us, and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ” (1 Jn 1:3).

When a new assembly started in another house in the city of Jerusalem, it was not a “church split.” By the time Paul wrote a letter to the disciples in Philippi, there were Christians meeting in homes throughout that city. In one statement of his letter to the Philippian disciples, Paul defined what it means to be “together”:

Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ, so that whether I come and see you or am absent, I may hear of your affairs, that you stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel (Ph 1:27; see 1 Co 1:10).

Those who are “together” are in solidarity with one another because of their gospel living, not because of some system of assembly by which they would offer an artificial appearance that they are unified as an autonomous “church.” Those early Christians in the entire city of Jerusalem were “together” because of their common spirit and united force to preach the gospel to all in Jerusalem. They were still “together” even when persecution scattered them from Jerusalem into all the world (See At 8:1-4).

Assemblies were only the serendipity of being “together.” The early disciples were “together” throughout the world before they even showed up at an assembly. Their assembly did not define them to be “together.” Their being “together” in the bond of the gospel resulted in whoever could come together in assembly. Their common obedience to the gospel assumed their camaraderie in both living and preaching the gospel. If we would think that being “together” referred exclusively to their coming together in assembly, then we would end up with the preposterous conclusion that they were not “together” after the “closing prayer.”

WORSHIP BEYOND THE POWER GRID

The beautiful serendipity of our common obedience to the gospel is our fellowship with one another in assembly. Though our assembly with one another as disciples of Christ does not define who we are as Christians, it does define our common bond that we have in our obedience to the one gospel. It is for this reason that we seek not to forsake any opportunity to be with those who have submitted to the gospel of the incarnate Son's death for our sins, and His resurrection for our hope (1 Co 15:1-4).

We have little information in the New Testament documents concerning what the early Christians did during their assemblies with one another. We know that they encouraged one another to love and do good works (Hb 10:24,25). Since the Holy Spirit encouraged them to exhort one another through spiritual songs, we can assume that this is what they did when two or more came into contact with one another (Ep 5:19; Cl 3:16). And since their meetings were always participatory as each disciple came with a song, a prayer or a teaching to offer, we can assume that no one person became the center of reference for the assembly (See 1 Co 14:26).

Their assembly around a common meal was a common practice from the very beginning (At 2:42,46). When at all possible, they maintained a love feast when they came together in assembly (See 2 Pt 2:13; Jd 12). The example of the Ephesians was that every first day of the week these disciples ate the love feast meal with the Lord's Supper (At 20:7). The point is that their assemblies were ordinary; they were opportunities for exhortation and encouragement. Their assemblies were simple and worshipful in an atmosphere of quiet solitude.

So much has changed since those days. Many assemblies for worship have changed from being opportunities to study the word of God, and being encouraged by a participatory fellowship with one another around a common meal, to assemblies that have morphed into theatrical events during which performances of a few are meant to seat the majority in silence. “Assembly events” are orchestrated as well choreographed theatrical performances that hold the attendees in awe as actors carry on with their parts in a staged play. All is conducted in hope of producing an emotional experience that will satisfy the “worshippers” until the next planned event the following Sunday. Before the next staged event the following Sunday, the actors practice their particular parts in the play in order that the “worship event” be conducted with the fine tuned precision of a New York theater. The Lord's Supper in remembrance of the gospel has long been forgotten in many assemblies of “Christian” churches. The Bible has been reduced to a book from which to read a few selected passages, and not a text to be explained and applied. In the religious world in which we live, emphasis on the message of the gospel has been exchanged for an energetic cheerleading performance by a dynamic speaker.

We struggle with theatrical worship events and speakers whose messages are void of gospel. Such events and sermons seem to be far removed from the simplicity of the early disciples. We think of the “boat worship” of the apostles who sat offshore in a boat on a calmed sea, realizing that in that same boat there was a Deity who controlled the seas (See Mt 14:33). We think of those 3,000 on the day of Pentecost who scurried about to find a home in which to meet on the following Sunday in order to bow down in thanksgiving to the One they had eight weeks before called on Roman soldiers to nail to a cross. Then there is David in a quiet meadow watching over his sheep, uttering, “The Lord is in His holy temple, let all the earth keep silence before Him.” Solitude seems to have left many assemblies wherein participants feel disappointed if their wondering minds are not held captive for a few moments by a stage of performers.

It seems that in the “modern assembly” today, if the electricity were to go out, the acting of theatrical performances would likewise go out. We wonder how many people would even show up at an assembly that was beyond a power grid that would tune up all the electrical appliances that we feel are so necessary for an “effective assembly event.” When in Brazil a person in the middle of the Amazon made contact with us through ham radio, asking for a keyboard he could connect to his generator. And then there was the person who said he wanted to start a church, but he first had to learn how to play the guitar. He learned to play, plugged the guitar into the power grid, and “church” began.

Is this that to which the modern assembly has cloned us? Can we not go to some far off village in the middle of Africa without a generator and guitar? Must our mission schools teach classes on how to play a guitar? Are our missions limited to the extent of the power grid?

What is it with us that we need noise in order to quietly come together to bring tears to our eyes by reading those Bible stories that changed so many hearts and the entire world. Can the old gospel story no longer produce a tear without a trumpet? Have we drowned out the “still small voice of God” with the power of our booming speakers? If you do not agree with our complaints, then disconnect your “worship” from the power grid for a couple Sundays, and see who shows up. We believe the true worshipers will continue to show up, but the spectators who come for the show, will wander away, looking for some other assembly that is still connected to the power grid.

It's All About Jesus

When Jesus was in His final day with His apostles, He made a very important promise that should alert us concerning one very important fact concerning the purpose of all revelation from God to man. He promised the apostles that when “the Spirit of truth has come ... He will glorify Me ...” (Jn 16:13,14). He drove His point home with the statement concerning the work of the Spirit of truth, “All things that the Father has are Mine” (Jn 16:15).

Some people are misled by their view of the work of the Holy Spirit, and the purpose for which we have the Bible in our hands today. The Bible is not primarily about the Holy Spirit. It is not about the nation of Israel. It was not given for misguided prognosticators to search through prophecies concerning the end of times. The Bible is about Jesus. The coming of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles was about Jesus. The word of the Holy Spirit to counsel the apostles was about declaring all things to the apostles that the Spirit had received from Jesus (Jn 16:13). The Bible is about Jesus.

We would assuredly conclude that the Bible is not about us. It is first about Jesus. We as the church of Christ are only the serendipity of the Spirit's glorification of Jesus through the truth that was revealed through the apostles. Therefore, what the writers of Scripture wrote in order to reveal the will of God, was to the glory of Jesus. From Genesis to Revelation, therefore, the entire sixty-six books of the Bible were inspired by the Holy Spirit in order to focus our minds on the incarnational Son of God who came into the world to take from this world those who have faith in Him.

Too many have marginalized Jesus by missing the focus of the Bible. If we would obsess over prophecy in reference to us, we will miss the purpose for which the Holy Spirit inspired Holy Scripture. If in our hard times, and dysfunctional behavior, would use the Bible as only a text book for better living, we will read past Jesus. If we would use the Bible as only a history book of civilization, we will reduce Jesus to a good historical religion leader who had a message only for His generation. If we use the Bible as a legal document of law in order to believe that which is right, and win debates over that which is error, then Jesus will become only a historical figure to deliver proof texts for our theological debates. If our objective in studying the Bible is not first to know Jesus the Son of God, we will have a limited understanding of the entire text of the Bible.

But if we get our priorities right by seeking first information about the incarnate Son of God, then our whole motivation for Bible study changes. We will start using Jesus as the standard by which we would discover and apply all Bible teaching. This is when we start allowing what Paul said to Titus: “For the grace [gospel] of God that brings salvation has appeared to all men, teaching us ...” (Ti 2:11,12). When we put the gospel of grace that appeared through Jesus Christ above all else, then we are ready to be taught to live the gospel. We begin to learn how to stand in the gospel as Paul wrote to the Corinthians: “I declare to you the gospel ... in which you stand” (1 Co 15:15). It is then that we understand what Paul wrote to the Philippians: “Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Ph 1:27). Gospel living can exist in our lives only when we put Jesus first in all things, including our understanding of the Bible.

Putting Jesus first, therefore, becomes the hermeneutic of our Bible study. He becomes the compass of our living, and destiny of our souls. The Holy Spirit would exhort us with the following words: “And whatever you do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through Him” (Cl 3:17).

JESUS IS IMMANUEL!

Knowing Jesus begins with knowing who He is and what He does for us. Once we know who He is, and what He is presently doing on our behalf, it is then that we are motivated in our hearts to conform to what He wills in our lives.

The Old Testament is our first “dictionary” to consult in order to understand who Jesus is. There are more than three hundred prophecies in the Old Testament in reference to the Messiah and the events that would surround His gospel invasion into the world and ascension to the throne of God. Of all the prophecies that are made in the Old Testament, there are some key prophecies that we must not only understand, but they must be the motivation for changing our lives to conform to who He is. One of these key prophecies is Isaiah 7:14. In this prophecy, Isaiah prophesied of the birth of One who would be a sign to Israel: “Therefore, the Lord Himself will give you a sign. Behold, a virgin will conceive and bear a son, and she will call his name Immanuel” (See Is 8:8-10).

Matthew quoted this prophecy in reference to the birth of Jesus (Mt 1:23). Though there may be some immediate historical applications of Isaiah’s prophecy in reference to times and events of his lifetime, Matthew’s quotation of the prophecy in reference to Jesus leaves no doubt that Isaiah had the Messiah in mind when the original prophecy was made.

This prophecy became one of the prophecies of the Old Testament upon which the Jews based their expectations concerning the One who would come to redeem Israel. Many Jews, unfortunately, thought that the Messiah would be a military leader who would redeem the nation of Israel out of the hands of their oppressors, as Moses did in his day. Even to the last hours of Jesus’ ministry, and prior to His ascension, some of His closest disciples maintained this expectation (At 1:6). However, when Jesus as the Messiah initially began His ministry, He sought to instruct the people out of these misunderstandings in order that He be the sign that God was with His people. Only when the Holy Spirit came upon the apostles on the day of Pentecost did the disciples fully understand that Jesus was the Immanuel of God (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). There would be no national restoration of Israel. There would be only times of spiritual refreshing from the presence of the Lord (At 3:19).

Isaiah went on in the prophecy of Isaiah 7:14 to describe the ministry of the Immanuel of God and what He would be in His relationship with the people of God:

For to us a child is born, to us a Son is given. And the government will be upon His shoulder. And His name will be called Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace (Is 9:6).

Though there are many names in the Bible that define the incarnate Son of God and His ministry, the reference “Immanuel” defines His unique relationship with the people. Other references to the Messiah emphasize the function of Jesus on earth, as well as in heaven at this time. But the Son of God as Immanuel was a sign that God was on earth with His people. If we are allowed to use the name “Immanuel” in the manner of an acrostic (using each letter to stand for a truth), then we would come up with the following suggested identity and function of Jesus as the sign, or ministry, of God with His people:

I mage
M an
M essiah
A dvocate
N ame
U nderstanding
E xample
L ight

A. Image:

Jesus as the Immanuel was the revelation of God in the spirit who revealed to us in the flesh the God from whom He came.

When Paul stood before idolaters in Athens, he explained that “we are the offspring of God” (At 17:29). However, being the offspring of God did not mean that “The Divine Nature is like unto gold or silver or stone, an image formed by the art and thought of man” (At 17:29). On the contrary, if we would imagine God to be as we are in the flesh, then we would be idolaters. If one would create an image in his mind that God is as the physical image of man, then Paul would say to this idolater, “And the times of this ignorance God has overlooked, but now He commands all men everywhere to repent” (At 17:30).

One must repent of his childish ignorance of imagining God to be in the physical image of man. Those who would change “the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man,” are doing what Paul later explained, “Professing to be wise, they became fools” (Rm 1:22,23). It is important to put away from our minds imaginations that materialize God the Father who is spirit (Jn 4:24). We must repent of this thinking, because the more we conceive in our minds that God in heaven is physical, the less we understand the incarnational revelation of God through Jesus in the flesh.

We must not reverse the incarnation of God by creating a god in our minds after our own physical image. It was God in the spirit (Jn 4:24) who incarnated into the flesh of man in order to reveal who He is (Jn 1:14). If the Son of God were already in the flesh before the incarnation, as some envision Him to have been, then there would have been no incarnation. Such imagery is a denial of the gospel. It is idolatry.

Isaiah explained that the Immanuel would be an indication of “God with us” (Is 8:10). In order for God in the spirit to be with man in the flesh, there had to be an incarnation. During His ministry, Jesus proclaimed, “He who has seen Me has seen the Father” (Jn 14:9). The meaning of this statement is as Jesus explained, “I and My Father are one” (Jn 10:30). Of course the Father was not in the physical image of Jesus after the incarnation, and at the time Jesus made these statements. Paul wrote later that Jesus “is the image of God” (2 Co 4:4). If the physical image of Jesus during His earthly ministry supposedly identified God the Father in the same physical image when Jesus walked on this earth, then the transformation of the Son of God through incarnation would be denied.

The core of God’s work to be with His people through the gospel began with the incarnation. John explained, “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God” (Jn 1:1,2). John then emphatically stated, “And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us” (Jn 1:14). Since the Word was with God in spirit in eternity, He was made through incarnation into the flesh of man while on earth. The Immanuel of God would be God with us in the flesh, and thus, Jesus as Immanuel, was the revelation of the spiritual image of God who indwelt Jesus in the flesh. Jesus, as the Immanuel of God was a spiritual expression of God in order that we, through Jesus, relate to God in the Spirit. The incarnation, therefore, was God reaching out to us through Jesus in order that we have a salvational relationship with Him. In this way, God was with us during the earthly ministry of Jesus.

B. Man:

Jesus as the Immanuel was the incarnation of God who seeks to have a relationship with man.

In order for God to relate with us, God the Son of necessity had to give up being in the spirit form of God in order to be made in the likeness of those with whom He would establish an eternal relationship (Ph 2:6,7). God the Son in the spirit (Jn 4:24), thus became God in the flesh in order to dwell among us (Jn 1:14). So in the beginning before all was created, the Word (Immanuel) was with God, “and the Word was God” (Jn 1:1). But after the incarnation, and when the early disciples were with Jesus, they experienced through Jesus the person of God.

It was in the spiritual image of God that God dwelt among men in the flesh of Jesus. The Son of God was “made in the likeness of men” (Ph 2:7). His body was the vehicle by which God moved among men. While incarnate in the flesh of a man, He could be tempted with the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life (See Mt 4:1-17; 1 Jn 2:16). He was moved with compassion (Mt 14:14). He felt the frustration of being rejected by the Jews to whom He had come with a message of redemption from law (Jn 1:11; see Is 53). He was one who could be exceedingly sorrowful for the condition of mankind (Mt 9:36; 23:37; Mk 8:2).

As the Immanuel, Jesus was not only made in the physical body of man, but also made after the emotional psychology of men. He could feel as we feel, and thus have sympathy for our predicament in the flesh. His response to life in the company of people revealed how God identified with humanity. In order that God truly be with His people, He had to come in the totality of who man is, but at the same time, and in some way, not give up His deity. He emptied Himself of the spirit form of God in order to be made in the physical form of man.

C. Messiah:

Jesus as the Immanuel was the fulfillment of all prophecies that were related to the coming of the One who would spiritually lead Israel as Moses led God’s people physically from Egyptian bondage.

The Messiah was the One many Jews anticipated to be the coming redeemer of Israel. The Greek word that is used in reference to the Messiah is the word “Christ.”

For centuries, the Jews were waiting for the fulfillment of the promised Deliverer who would be like unto Moses (See Dt 18:15-18). For many, the anticipation for His coming came to a peak during the events surrounding the birth of Jesus. At the time, Israel was under the oppression of the Roman Empire. But King Herod—Rome’s appointed King of the Jews—was fearful of this coming King. He knew the prophecies of the Messiah and believed that the Messianic King had been born in Bethlehem. He subsequently killed all the children two years of age and under in order to eliminate any assumed competition for the power of his sons who would succeed him (Mt 2:16-18).

Rumors concerning the events of the birth of Jesus spread throughout Palestine. And then about thirty years after the birth of Jesus, came the ministry of John the Baptist. At the time of John’s ministry, the anticipation for the Messiah was so great that some assumed that even John could be the Messiah. But John answered their confusion, “I am not the Christ [Messiah]” (Jn 1:20). John explained, “I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, ‘Make straight the way of the Lord,’ as the prophet Isaiah said” (Jn 1:23).

Then there were those disciples who were so anxious for the coming of the Messiah that upon the basis of the initial proclamations of Jesus as the Messiah, they willingly believed that Jesus was the One. Philip was one of those anxious individuals. After briefly encountering Jesus, Philip ran to his brother, Simon (Peter), and said, “We have found the Messiah” (Jn 1:41). The proclamation of Jesus as the Messiah touched the hearts of the initial disciples of Jesus. They believed on the basis of John’s simple proclamation that Jesus was the Messiah (See Jn 1:43-51).

And indeed Jesus was the Messiah who had come. When Jesus was with a Samaritan woman, even she revealed the expectation of the Samaritans concerning the coming of the Messiah. She said to Jesus, “I know that Messiah is coming (who is called Christ). When He comes, He will tell us all things” (Jn 4:25). Jesus answered, “I who speak to You am He” (Jn 4:26).

As the Jews looked for and expected the coming of the Messiah, with the same expectation we too look for His coming again at the end of time. Immediately after His ascension, two angels stood by the disciples and promised, “This same Jesus who was taken up from you into heaven will come in like manner as you have watched Him go into heaven” (At 1:11). Therefore, “we, according to His promise, look for new heavens and a new earth in which righteousness dwells” (2 Pt 3:13).

D. Advocate:

Jesus as the Immanuel was the revelation of God who seeks to work continually on our behalf in reference to our problem of sin.

It may be that we view lawyers with some distaste, but when we speak of Jesus as our lawyer, we want to give Him a hug. Jesus is the lawyer (advocate) who pleads for our case. He not only pled our case on the cross that we be justified of all our crimes (sins) against God, He also took those sins upon Himself that we be judged righteous before God (1 Pt 2:24). John reminds all Christians, “My little children, these things I write to you so that you do not sin. And if anyone sins, we have a Counselor [advocate] with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous” (1 Jn 2:1).

Jesus continually acts on the behalf of those who have given themselves to Him through obedience to the gospel. His function as our advocate was activated at the cross. “Therefore, He is able also to save those to the uttermost who come to God through Him, seeing He always lives to make intercession for them” (Hb 7:25). The Hebrew writer reminds us that our Advocate appears “in the presence of God for us” (Hb 9:24). The emphasis of this statement is not to make God seem distant from us. On the contrary, the Hebrew writer wanted to metaphorically associate the Father and our Advocate in close contact with one another on our behalf. In other words, “We have such a high priest who is seated at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens” (Hb 8:1).

We must never forget, therefore, what Paul reminded Timothy: “For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus” (1 Tm 2:5). It is this Christ (Messiah) “who is even at the right hand of God, who also makes intercession for us” (Rm 8:34).

E. Name:

Jesus as the Immanuel was the revelation of God with us who now has all authority in heaven and on earth.

The appeal of the gospel to all people was stated by Paul in Philippians 2: “Therefore, God also has highly exalted Him and given Him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow” (Ph 2:9,10).

The word “name” refers to authority. It is in this time of history that all authority has been given unto Jesus who reigns over all things (Mt 28:18; Ph 2:9-11). The Father raised up Jesus to be “*far above all principality and power and might and dominion and every name that is named” (Ep 1:21). Therefore, “there is salvation in no other, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved” (At 4:12). And for this reason, everyone in this dispensation of time who would be saved, must obey the gospel in the name of Jesus (At 2:38).

All baptized believers now live under the influence of the gospel because of their obedience to the word of Christ (Jn 12:48). Paul therefore exhorted, “*And whatever you do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus” (Cl 3:17). Paul also reminded the Philipians, “Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ [the Messiah]” (Ph 1:27). In living the gospel, Christians must strive “together for the faith of the gospel” (Ph 1:27). In doing this, they are living according to the name (authority) of Jesus.

F. Understanding:

Jesus as the Immanuel was the revelation of the heart of God in order to draw all men unto the gospel.

Following the third century, one of the great theological misunderstandings concerning the function of Jesus was that He ascended so far away from the Christian that another intermediary was necessary in order to make contact with Him. Misguided theologians subsequently made Mary, the mother of Jesus, the new intercessor on behalf of the saints. Some recent exaltations of Mary are “that the Virgin [Mary] intercedes for us in heaven and that her intercession is so universal that every grace passes through her hands” (Paul H. Hallet, What is a Catholic, p. 77). Since Mary is supposed to intercede on behalf of the saints, we “may also pray to the Blessed Virgin ...” (William J. Cogan, A Catechism for Adults, p 16).

But the preceding is not what is taught concerning the relationship that Jesus now has with His people. The preceding teaching was indirectly making its way into the thinking of the disciples even by the time the book of Hebrews was written. The substitute for Jesus was not Mary. Some Christians, however, were reverting to the intermediary function of the Levitical priesthood. For this reason, the Hebrew writer made the following reassuring statement concerning the relationship that Jesus, as “God with us,” was with all His disciples: “For we do not have a high priest who cannot sympathize with our weaknesses, but was in all things tempted as we are, yet without sin” (Hb 4:15).

Because we personally have a high priest who shows empathy toward us, the Hebrew writer wanted to embolden us to approach unto the throne of grace directly through Jesus: “Therefore, let us come boldly to the throne of grace, so that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need” (Hb 4:16). We have direct access to Jesus because He partook of the same environment of temptation in which we live. He was “tempted as we are,” and thus, He understands our predicament in this world. Add to this the encouragement of Paul, “For through Him [Jesus] we both have access by one Spirit to the Father” (Ep 2:18).

On earth, Jesus was personally with His disciples in order that God have a personal relationship with His people. Because He personally in the body ascended out of their presence (At 1:11), this does not mean that He discontinued His relationship with His disciples. He is not personally with us at this time in bodily form, but we are assured that He will be personally with us in bodily form when He comes again (At 1:11; 1 Jn 3:2). It is for the restoration of his personal relationship that we yearn.

The prophecy of Isaiah 7:14 was that the Immanuel (“God with us”) would be comforting to those who accepted Him as the Savior of the world. Any theology that would teach that Jesus is distant from us is an attack against the very purpose for which God intended the incarnational Son of God would be in His relationship with us. When Jesus ascended to the right hand of God, He went away bodily, but not in presence spiritually. He only assumed another function of being that would draw us closer to the Father by drawing us closer to Him. He understands our predicament of life because He continually relates to our suffering, though He is not personally with us at this time as He was with the early disciples.

G. Example:

Jesus as the Immanuel revealed to the people of God a relational behavior by which we can live in response to the gospel.

Though the Jews had a nationalistic concept concerning the coming of the Messiah, there was still the need for the incarnation. They erroneously believed that the Messiah would come in order to deliver them from their oppressors. But they had a limited concept concerning the origin and purpose of this Messiah. According to their beliefs, the Messiah would simply be a man born of a woman who would rise to prominence among the Jews just as Moses. Their understanding that this Messiah would actually be an incarnation of God was not in their thinking. It was a mystery that was kept from the minds of men until He was revealed and experience (Ep 3:3-5; 1 Pt 1:10-12).

When Jesus said, “He who has seen Me has seen the Father,” God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit knew that we needed a living example to usher us through this world. We needed more than a good religious leader who was born to a carpenter of Nazareth, and then would pronounce theological dictates to the people. We needed an incarnate God who would give us the purest form of discipleship that would be the model for all men. Therefore, Jesus’ statement of John 13:15 reveals the example of what gospel living demands: “For I have given you an example that you should do as I have done to you.”

When Jesus made this statement, He, as the incarnate Son of God, had just washed the feet of the disciples. These were the same disciples who considered Him to be their Lord and Teacher (Jn 13:13). So Jesus said to them, “If I then, the Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also ought to wash one another’s feet” (Jn 13:14). We are now at the table as invited guests, and it is Jesus the Messiah who led by giving us examples of service (See Mk 10:44,45; Lk 22:27). As His disciples, we must do likewise.

Jesus’ washing of the feet of the disciples in the John 13 context, therefore, is quite incomprehensible. He was the Creator of the dirty feet He washed (Cl 1:16). And yet, He as the Creator was on His knees washing the feet of man. This example of servanthood surpasses any example that man could possibly give for others to follow. If God can wash our dirty feet, then we have no excuse whatsoever not to serve others as He served us.

H. Light:

Jesus as the Immanuel revealed the way out of the darkness of this world into the light of the realm of God’s existence.

Jesus proclaimed to the multitudes, “I am the light of the world. He who follows Me will not walk in darkness, but will have the light of life” (Jn 8:12). These words were John’s quotation of what Jesus affirmed during His earthly ministry. But the Holy Spirit was not finished with this concept about who the Son of God was among us. Concerning His last revelation of Jesus as the light, the Holy Spirit inspired John to write, “But if we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship with one another” (1 Jn 1:7). “God is light and in Him is no darkness at all” (1 Jn 1:5). The light is where all of us want to be. We seek to escape from the darkness of this world in order to walk in the eternal light of God. It was for this reason that Jesus brought the eternal light of God into this world. We follow Him as the light, therefore, in order to be led out of darkness into the eternal realm of light in the presence of God.

For those Jews of faith in the first century, the Messiah was more than what they had hoped. Not long into Jesus’ ministry, many people of faith soon discovered that “in Him was life, and the life was the light of men” (Jn 1:4). Jesus had come into a world of darkness, but “the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not understand it” (Jn 1:5). Because God is light, anyone who would come from the presence of God must of necessity bring with Him light (1 Jn 1:5-7). And since Jesus came from God, He came as a bearer of light for all who live in the darkness of the world. He is the gospel light that makes each one of us His disciples a “little gospel light” among those we live.

JESUS IS THE CHRIST!

What the Jews did not expect was that the Messiah was destined to be crucified. For those who believed in Jesus as the Messiah, what to them would be the saddest day in their lives, would later become the greatest event of all history. It would change their lives and the world forever.

All Christians today are the product of the greatest historical event that has ever occurred in human history. We must recognize that we as Christians are part of a heritage that is based on the Christ of the cross, and not on a catechism of doctrine. Christians are Christ-called people, not law-called. This was the foundation of faith that Jesus had in mind when He made the statement, “And I, if I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all men to Me” (Jn 12:32). And this was the background of Paul’s statement in Romans 6:14: “You are not under law, but under grace.”

Jesus did not draw us unto Himself because His teachings were better than the other religious leaders—though they were. The religions of men draw people unto their faith through religious rites, principles of behavior, and catechisms of law. But Christians are drawn by faith to the person of Jesus Christ and His atonement for our sins. This same drawing power of grace continues today.

Many religious teachers have passed through history and established great followings of people. Many people have been drawn to these leaders because of their great teachings, and often dynamic charisma. But this was not the primary focus of Jesus in drawing people unto Himself. Jesus draws people to Himself through the atonement of the cross for their sins. We are drawn to Him because of our redemption from the bondage of sin. We desire through Him to establish a relationship with the Father. All men seek to be reconciled to the God of their faith, but they honestly know that they cannot get there on the basis of their own meritorious religious ceremonies, or isolation as monks from society. It is for this reason that when the early evangelists went forth into all the world, they did as Paul wrote, “For I determined not to know anything among you except Jesus Christ and Him crucified” (1 Co 2:2).

In a world that seeks to be successful, to be glamorous, and in possession of the most recent electronic device, the cross calls for that which is often contrary to what we consider most important of life. The cross represents sacrifice, discipline, commitment and humility. This is the nature of the discipleship unto which Jesus calls us: “If anyone will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow Me” (Lk 9:23). Discipleship of the One who was lifted up is contrary to that which the materialistic world calls on us to do in order to be successful. Instead of lifting ourselves up to be successful in a world of accomplishments, the Christ of the cross calls on us to humble ourselves before others. It is then that He will lift us up (See 1 Pt 5:6).

Since Jesus is the crucified Christ (Messiah), there are many salvational offerings of Jesus that call us to be drawn to Him. Again, we would form an acrostic of the term CHRIST in order to identify some of what Jesus offers:

Crucified
Humiliated
Redemption
Intercession
Savior
Teacher

The following points define what Jesus accomplished during His past and present ministries on our behalf, which ministries were validated at the cross. These are ministries that draw us unto Him:

A. Crucified:

The cross meant sacrifice for our sins, and thus this was the message that went forth from Calvary into all the world. It was as Paul wrote, “We preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling block and to the Gentiles foolishness” (1 Co 1:23). This was the central message of the Suffering Servant about whom Isaiah had prophesied over six hundred years before (See Is 53:5). The Suffering Servant was all of the following:

1. Sin offering: Since the blood of animals could not remit sins, it was necessary that an eternal offering be made of the incarnate body of an eternal Deity. Atonement for sin could only be accomplished through that which was eternal (Hb 10:1-4). No created animal could be sacrificed for a problem that had existed between God and man since the days of Adam and Eve. In order to solve the problem of separation from God through sin, an unblemished Lamb of God had to be made available through incarnation.

Only an eternal sacrifice on the part of God could deal with sin that had eternal consequences. “For He has made Him who knew no sin to be sin on behalf of us” (2 Co 5:21). The result of the offering of the Christ resulted in the promise that God makes to everyone who obeys the gospel of the Christ: “And their sins and iniquities I will remember no more” (Hb 10:17). “No more” was a statement that did not refer to the yearly day of atonement under the Sinai law wherein a sacrifice was made for the sins of the people of Israel. At and after the cross, “no more” referred to eternity. There would never again be the need for a sacrifice to be made for sins. The Hebrew writer reminds us:

Who [Jesus] does not need daily as those high priests [of the Sinai covenant], to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's, for this He [Jesus] did once for all when He offered up Himself (Hb 7:27).

2. The Passover Lamb: The metaphor of the “Passover lamb” finds its root meaning during the last plague that God brought upon the Egyptians when He was delivering Israel from Egyptian captivity. The Israelites were to sprinkle animal blood on their doorpost in order that the firstborn child of the family be spared from death (See Ex 12). In order that blood be provided, a lamb had to be sacrificed. This was the Passover lamb. The offering of the Passover lamb became a yearly offering in Israel for God's deliverance of the people from bondage.

When applied to Christ, Jesus became the sacrificial Passover lamb that was offered in order to spare us from death. Paul wrote, “For indeed, Christ our Passover was sacrificed” (1 Co 5:7). The prophesy of Isaiah 53:7 was fulfilled in Him: “He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He did not open His mouth.”

2. The blood of the covenant: Animals died and blood was offered in order to sanctify the covenant that God made with the nation of Israel (Ex 24). Again, animals died in order that the Sinai covenant be ratified with Israel. In the same way, the incarnational Son of God offered His blood in order to ratify a new covenant between the God of heaven with those who would obey the gospel on earth.

During His last Passover feast with His disciples, Jesus held up a cup of the fruit of the vine and proclaimed, “For this is My blood of the covenant that is shed for many for the remission of sins” (Mt 26:28). The Jewish disciples who were present when Jesus made this statement did not fully understand what He was saying at the time. Nevertheless, in a few weeks after the Passover they would fully understand the concept of the “blood of the covenant.” At the time, they did understand the “blood of the covenant” that existed between God and Israel that was instituted at Mount Sinai. But a new covenant was about to be established. It was with their forefathers that blood was used to ratify a covenant with the nation of Israel. But as the disciples sat there with Jesus during His last Passover, they were wondering what was about to be when blood again would be poured out to ratify the covenant about which He spoke.

In reference to the blood offering of the Christ, every word of Frances R. Havergal’s song, I Gave My Life for Thee,” is true:

I gave My life for thee,
My precious blood I shed,
That thou might’s ransomed be,
And quickened from dead.

The crucifixion of the Christ will be realized fully when the saints stand unblemished before the throne of God with blood-washed souls. It is then that we will realize the significance of Revelation 7:14 concerning ourselves: “These are those coming out of the great tribulation. And they have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.”

So if we lack some confidence in the cleansing power of the blood, it would be good to answer the following question that was posed by the Hebrew writer:

How much more will the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without blemish to God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God? (Hb 9:14).

B. Humiliated:

When reading of things concerning the venture of the Son of God into our realm of physical existence, we often read concepts about which we have little understanding. For example, what earthly being could ever fully understand the following statement? “He made Himself of no reputation, taking the form of a bondservant and being made in the likeness of men” (Ph 2:7). How could we ever, as earthbound finite beings, possibly understand that “in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God ... and the Word was made flesh” (Jn 1:1,14)?

These are incomprehensible concepts for humans to understand fully. We read the words, but the words speak of God becoming flesh. This is a case in biblical interpretation when we must accept the words by faith that it actually happened. By trusting in the testimony of those who personally experienced the incarnate God, we approached the written record of their testimony in order to grow in faith.

By faith, we accept their testimony as true, for we believe the witness of those who first encountered the incarnate Son of God. We believe the personal witness of one as John who encountered the incarnate God about whom he wrote, “For the life was manifested and we have seen and bear witness and show to you that eternal life that was with the Father and was manifested to us” (1 Jn 1:2). John said that it was this Word of life “that we have heard, that we have seen with our eyes, that we have looked upon and our hands have handled” (1 Jn 1:1).

So to what extreme in humiliation would God go in order to come for us? The first extreme was incarnation. But what was so important that God would incarnate in the flesh for us? We incomprehensibly struggle through revelations of this divine journey as recorded in Philippians 2:5-8. As we read, our minds are overwhelmed with the humbling reality that this incarnate God would become “obedient unto death, even the death of the cross” in order that we be with Him forever (Ph 2:8). His ultimate extreme beyond incarnation was to suffer our physical death.

It was only hours before the humiliation of the cross that the Son of God who created us (Cl 1:16) prayed to the Father who remained in spirit, “Father, if You are willing, remove this cup from Me” (Lk 22:42). The cup was the humiliation and suffering of the Christ on the cross. But the cup could not be removed. It could not because of us. Our sins sent Him there. And so, from the time of the preceding agonizing prayer request, began the humiliating journey of the incarnate Son of God to the cross of death.

When we think of the humiliation of the incarnate Son of God on the cross, we must never forget that we put Him there because of our rebellion against God. Every sin that we commit caused the humiliation of the Son of God to our physical death which we fear so much (See Hb 2:14,15).

And unless we forget, it would be good to remind ourselves of the humiliation that the incarnate Son of God went through for our sins. The men who arrested the Christ “began mocking and beating Him” (Lk 22:63). “They spit on Him, and took the reed and struck Him on the head again and again” (Mt 27:30). “And they stripped Him [naked] and put on Him a scarlet robe” (Mt 27:28). They “twisted a crown of thorns,” and then “they put it on His head, and a reed in His right hand. And they bowed the knee before Him and mocked Him, saying, ‘Hail, King of the Jews!’” (Mt 27:29). And then they led Him away to be crucified as, and with, common criminals. And truly, the prophecy of Isaiah was fulfilled at Calvary outside Jerusalem:

He has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows. Yet we esteemed Him stricken, smitten by God and afflicted. But He was wounded for our transgressions. He was bruised for our iniquities. The chastisement of our peace was upon Him. And with His stripes we are healed. (Is 53:4,5).

Once the humiliation of the physical body of the Son of God was ended, the world would turn to humiliating His spiritual body. “Yes and all who desire to live godly in Christ Jesus will suffer persecution” (2 Tm 3:12). This should come as no surprise in our discipleship of the One who was humiliated on the cross on our behalf. When the Christ was lifted up, we were drawn to Him because He was lifted up for our sins. Peter explained, “For to this you were called, because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example that you should follow His steps” (1 Pt 2:21). Those who are drawn to the cross must also be willing to be drawn to His suffering.

But in the heat of humiliation, the drawn body of believers must always remember the encouraging words of Peter: “If you are reproached for the name of Christ, blessed are you, for the spirit of glory and of God rests on you” (1 Pt 4:14). Therefore, “If anyone suffers as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God in this name” (1 Pt 4:16). Therefore, “blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness’ sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven” (Mt 5:10).

C. Ransomed:

We do not forget what all the suffering and humiliation was about in reference to our salvation. Our salvation involved being bought out of the captivity of sin. Our redemption with the price of His sacrifice finds its definition in what God did for the nation of Israel. The people of Israel were redeemed literally out of the captivity of Egypt (Ex 6:6). They could not escape from their own bondage. Someone other than themselves had to redeem them.

In the slavery of the day of the cross, a slave of the Roman Empire could be bought out of his bondage by another. Both the children of Israel and slaves were in the same predicament in reference to bondage. Redemption had to come from somewhere outside themselves. In deliverance from the physical bondage of Israel and slaves, the metaphor “redemption” finds its earthly meaning in the bondage in which we find ourselves in sin. We could not redeem ourselves through law-keeping, for the lack thereof was what brought us into bondage. We could not keep law perfectly, and thus, we were all condemned as lawbreakers (Rm 3:9,10,23). We could not atone for our sins through good works. We were thus doomed because of our own wrong doing. We were hopeless in sin, and thus, needed Someone outside ourselves to redeem us from bondage.

Paul reminded the Ephesian disciples, “In Him [Christ] we have redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of His grace” (Ep 1:7). “Through His blood” refers to the cross. With the sacrificial offering of the incarnate Son of God, there would have been no purchase made for those in bondage. For this reason, “the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give His life a ransom for many” (Mt 20:28). Jesus ransomed Himself in order to redeem us from that from which we could not redeem ourselves. Therefore, we “have been bought with a price” (1 Co 6:20). And that price was the eternal sacrifice of the Son of God. As the Christ, Jesus paid the ransom price for our freedom from the bondage of our own sin.

D. Intercession:

Not only did the Christ pay the ransom price for our deliverance from the bondage of sin, He also continues to intervene for us at the right hand of God. “For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus” (1 Tm 2:5). Christ “is even at the right hand of God, who also makes intercession for us" (Rm 8:34). The Christ was resurrected, and subsequently, was "seated at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens" (Hb 8:1). At the right hand of God "*He is able also to save those to the uttermost who come to God through Him, seeing He always lives to make intercession for them" (Hb 7:25). In reference to the intercession ministry of the Christ, the Hebrew writer concluded with the following words of comfort:

*For Christ has not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us (Hb 9:24).

E. Savior:

As the Christ who intercedes for us, Jesus saves "His people from their sins" (Mt 1:21). The Greek word for "savior" means "to deliver" or "to preserve." Jesus as the Christ delivered us from the bondage of sin, and through His continual cleansing blood, preserves us unto His final coming (1 Jn 1:7).

Through His ministry of sacrifice and redemption, Jesus was proclaimed to be the Savior of the world. The Samaritans believed that Jesus was "indeed the Savior of the world" (Jn 4:42). From the seed of David "God raised up for Israel a Savior, Jesus" (At 13:23). "He is the Savior of the body" (Ep 5:23). Jesus Christ has appeared as the only Savior of the world (2 Tm 1:10). He is the "Lord Christ Jesus our Savior" (Ti 1:4). Therefore, we are all "looking for the blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Savior Christ Jesus" (Ti 2:13). Therefore, only through Jesus is there salvation, for He is the only Savior who has been sent into the world to redeem us from our sins (At 4:12).

F. Teacher:

But until our Savior Christ Jesus appears, He continues to teach us through His word in order that we continue to walk in the light (1 Jn 1:7). Based on what Jesus revealed during His ministry, it is imperative that we be instructed by His word.

He who rejects Me and does not receive My words, has one who judges him. The word that I have spoken, the same will judge him in the last day (Jn 12:48).

At the beginning of Jesus' ministry, a certain scribe made the correct conclusion in reference to Jesus: "Teacher, I will follow you wherever you go" (Mt 8:19).

And this should be the determination of everyone who would prepare himself until the Christ comes again. We should be willing to ask Jesus, "Teacher, what good thing must I do so that I may have eternal life?" (Mt 19:16). And when the Teacher replies with instructions, we must not respond as the rich young ruler who asked the preceding question. He went away sad because he could fulfill the commitment unto which Jesus called him (Mt 19:22).

The word "teacher" in reference to Jesus is used about seventy times in the New Testament. And indeed, He was a master teacher. Though the word "teacher" was used in the New Testament times to refer primarily to one who was a leader by what he taught, Jesus was identified as a leading teacher. He was identified as such, not only because of His function as a teacher in society, but also because of what He taught. As an effective communicator of His teachings, the methods of good teaching that He employed have been used throughout the world unto this day.

In order to lead the people to His desired goal, Jesus resorted to a great deal of teaching. "And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues ..." (Mt 4:23). "And seeing the multitudes ... He opened His mouth and taught them" (Mt 5:1,2). At the end of His ministry, Jesus said to the multitudes, "I sat daily with you, teaching in the temple ..." (Mt 26:55).

In order to change the course of the faith of the Jews, Jesus taught a great deal in reference to where He was taking them. What the people were taught would determine the direction of their behavior and their acceptance of Him as the Messiah. In this way, the following are some of the teaching principles that Jesus used to lead the people to His kingship and the new world order that would fall under His kingship:

1. Jesus was prepared to teach. From childhood, Jesus "grew and became strong, filled with wisdom" (Lk 2:40). He associated Himself at an early age with the teachers of Israel (Lk 2:46). And even at a young age "all who heard Him were astonished at His understanding and answers" (Lk 2:47). So during His growing years, "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man" (Lk 2:52).

When it came time to begin His teaching ministry, Jesus was prepared (See Lk 3:23). He taught both publicly and from house to house. On many occasions the following happened: "It came to pass on another Sabbath that He entered into the synagogue and taught" (Lk 6:6). It would be correct to conclude that Jesus continually taught the people throughout His three and a half year ministry. We have recorded in the New Testament all the truth of His teachings, which truth was taught in different ways during His teaching ministry.

2. Jesus taught a specific direction to which He was leading the people. He knew that the people needed to be taught to move in the direction that He was taking them. Generally speaking, He taught the fundamental scope of why He came into the world and where He was taking the people in order that they be able to go out of the world with Him: “And you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free” (Jn 8:32). And more specifically, He directed, “I have come that they may have life, and that they may have it more abundantly” (Jn 10:10). Therefore, we would conclude that the scope of His teaching was made in His final prayer to the Father:

And this is life eternal, that they might know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent. I have glorified You on the earth. I have finished the work that You gave Me to do (Jn 17:3,4).

Jesus finished His teaching work, for the preceding statement was made before the cross. Therefore, throughout His teaching ministry Jesus brought the people to a knowledge of the “only true God.”

Jesus came from the Father, and thus, only He could teach fully concerning who the Father was. Some people who desire to be teachers are always learning, but they are “never able to come to the knowledge of the truth” (2 Tm 3:7). If one teaches something about which he knows little, it is like speaking of a place one has never visited. In order to lead people in the direction of faith in Jesus, it is imperative to lead according to the word of God. If we would have a faith that is built on Jesus, then certainly we must know the word of Jesus (See Rm 10:17).

3. Jesus was committed to His students: Jesus' commitment to His students could be summed up in one statement: “I am the good shepherd. The good shepherd gives His life for the sheep” (Jn 10:11). Those who have committed themselves to the word of God, of necessity must also commit themselves to the ones they teach. It is the gospel that is preached to unbelievers (Mk 16:15). But it is the word of truth that is taught to believers (2 Tm 2:2). Paul was “appointed ... a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth” (1 Tm 2:7). He instructed that those who would desire to shepherd the flock of God, however, must be “able to teach” the flock (1 Tm 3:2). Those, therefore, who would be faithful leaders are exhorted with the following statement by the Holy Spirit:

If you instruct the brethren in these things, you will be a good servant of Christ Jesus, nourished by the words of faith and of good teaching that you have followed (1 Tm 4:6).

4. Jesus used many methods of teaching. He taught by using parables (Mk 12:12). He taught by asking questions that demanded a response from a questioning audience (Mt 16:13,15). He taught by being redundant in order to emphasize truths (Jn 21). He used visual aids on one occasion when He cursed a fig tree (Mk 11:20-24). He used all methods of teaching that would communicate His message to the people.

The Palestine pathways were His classroom. As He walked with His disciples, He engaged them in conversation (Mt 16). His environment of teaching was much different than that which is commonly used today. Jesus' students never sat in a classroom, nor took a final example. The general principle of His teaching was through discipleship, that is, the students watched and listened, and then enacted His teachings in their lives when He sent them out on different preaching tours (Lk 10).

Henry Adams once said, “A teacher affects eternity; he can never know where his influence stops.” We have no idea who wrote the following poem, but it was published in the Christian Bible Teacher over fifty years ago and offers an appropriate conclusion to this point:

I dreamed the pearly gates were opened wide,
And I had entered in, for I had died;
And now must give account of all my acts,
I saw a book there opened with these facts.

I thought, “My role upon the earth was small,
Just teaching a Bible school my call.”
For I saw all the saints of God up there,
And mine was, at most, a meager share.

I heard the Master call for my report,
I stood afraid, for mine ... was short;
I trembled and felt I would not pass,
Then whispered, “I just taught a Bible class.”

And from the throne I heard His voice, “Well done,
Come in and share eternal life, my son;
Although your place was humble and obscure,
You led the thirsty to the waters pure.”

And then it seems that from eternal plains,
There came the sound of voices in refrain,
That rolled across the mighty sea of glass,
There are the great ... the teachers of a class.

When I awoke I thought of those I taught,
And in their lives, what glory God had wrought,
I prayed to God, and all that I could say,
“Make me a better teacher day by day.”

And you who teach this Christian way to live,
May feel sometimes you're asked too much to give;
But someday you will reap eternal joys,
Because you led to Christ these girls and boys.

JESUS IS CRUCIFIED!

Around thirty years after the initial proclamation that millennia of prophecy had been fulfilled in the coming of the Redeemer of mankind, a most disheartening thing began to occur with some of the first generation of believers. As national Israel neared its end in A.D. 70, the “signs of the times” began to appear over the western horizon as Rome was determined to silence forever the rebellious Jews of Palestine. In fulfillment of Jesus’ prophecy of the doom of Jerusalem (Mt 24), the rumbling march of Roman soldiers was heard who were on their way to the heart of Jewish patriotism, Jerusalem. The city would soon be doomed to fulfill the prophecy of Daniel that national Israel would come to a close (See Dn 12).

In Palestine, Jewish patriotism was reaching its climax. Judaism, the national religion, was revitalized in the early and mid 60s. Intimidation to the nationalism of all Jews who lived in Palestine became intense. Jews were recruited to maintain their faith in national Israel by joining in the rebellion against the foreign occupation of Rome.

On his final trip to the “mother city” of Jerusalem, Paul wanted to give a last chance to his “brethren in the flesh,” his fellow Jews (See Rm 9:1-3; 10:1). He arrived in Palestine first at the coastal city of Caesarea. Understanding the fearlessness of Paul, and the imminent danger in Jerusalem, the Jewish disciples in Caesarea “pleaded with him not to go up to Jerusalem” (At 21:12). Nevertheless, Paul persisted in his determination to give the Jews his last efforts to believe in Jesus. He comforted the disciples in Caesarea with these words: “What do you mean by weeping and breaking my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus” (At 21:13). These were the words of a brave-hearted disciple for Jesus who had weathered the storm of persecution for two decades. However, not all the Jewish disciples at the time could make this statement. This was the problem in Judea.

When the apostle Paul eventually arrived in Jerusalem around A.D. 59, the Jewish elders of the church urged him not to do anything that would further inflame the irrational nationalism of overzealous Jews who were prevalent in the city. The elders advised Paul that he purify himself according to Jewish law, pay the temple expenses of four other men, and then enter the temple in order to make a show that he was not against Jewish customs (See At 21:17-25). But this was to no avail because God had plans to get Paul to Rome in order to testify before Caesar concerning Christ. God wanted the world to know that Christianity was not a sect of Judaism, but was the result of His sending of the Christ for the salvation of the world (At 23:11).

Regardless of all efforts of Rome to pacify the Jewish nationalists in their insurrection against Roman occupation of Palestine, the decade of the 60s eventually culminated with the destruction of Jerusalem and national Israel in A.D. 70. Leading up to this date, the decade of the 60s was a time of intimidation for formerly converted Jews. Their fellow unbelieving Jews sought to intimidate believing Jesus away from Jesus in order that they return to the religion of their forefathers. As a result, some Jewish Christians in Palestine were forsaking Christ in order to return to the Sinai law. The letter of Hebrews was written in order to combat this apostasy. Hebrews 6:4-6 is one of the most disheartening passages that ever came forth from the pen of an inspired writer:

For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and have become partakes of the Holy Spirit, and have tasted the good word of God and the powers of the age to come, if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance, since they crucify to themselves the Son of God and put Him to open shame.

The apostasy that was taking place at the time this statement was made occurred because there were those who were not willing, as Paul, “to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus” (At 21:13). Regardless of any individual reasons for forsaking Jesus in order to conform to a dead law, and particularly to a religion that was based on the traditions of the fathers (Mk 7:1-9), one can still crucify Jesus today. Modern-day crucifixion of Jesus continues when individuals “crucify to themselves the Son of God” with those sins that originally led to the crucifixion of Jesus in the first century.

A. Ignorance crucified Christ.

Jesus suffered on the cross as a result of the ignorance of the people. It was as said by Goethe: “There is no more terrible sight than ignorance in action.” Those who crucified Jesus really did not believe that He was the incarnation of God. It is the same problem that exists throughout the world today. In His final moments on the cross, Jesus requested of the Father on behalf of those who crucified Him, “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Lk 23:34).

When antagonistic persecutors were picking up stones to martyr Stephen, Stephen said almost the same words: “Lord, do not lay this sin to their charge” (At 7:60). It was a time again when, because of ignorance, people were opposing the way of righteousness. If those who drove the nails into the hands of Jesus, or lifted stones to hurl against Stephen, actually knew that Jesus was the Son of God, things would have been different. They would have been different, but not for our benefit. And thus, God used the ignorance of religiously misguided people to bring about the redemption of those who would later understand.

Not long after the cross and resurrection, Peter was apologetic for the people who crucified Jesus. “And now, brethren, I know that through ignorance you did it, as did also your rulers” (At 3:17). In his former years, Paul (Saul) was one of those rulers who reacted out of ignorance to persecute all those who believed that Jesus was the Son of God. However, this changed when Jesus finally slapped him off his horse on his way to Damascus to imprison Christians. Paul wrote many years later of his former behavior, “I was formerly a blasphemer and a persecutor and injurious. But I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly in unbelief” (1 Tm 1:13).

Under the Sinai law there was a provision for those who sinned “unintentionally” (Nm 15:27-29). But those who nailed Jesus to the cross intentionally crucified Him because of their willful ignorance. They were as their forefathers against whom God pronounced destruction because they willfully forgot the word of God (Hs 4:6). By the time Jesus arrived, all the prophecies concerning the Messiah had already been made. They had been fulfilled by the time of His ascension (See Lk 24:44). But because of the hardness of the hearts of many of the religious leaders of the day, most could not connect all the dots of prophecy with fulfillment in order to conclude that Jesus was the One for whom the Jews had hoped for centuries.

And then we consider those today who willfully remain in ignorance of Jesus as the Son of God. They are without excuse, for they not only have all the Old Testament prophecies concerning Jesus as the Redeemer, but they also have the New Testament that is a record of the fulfillment of the prophecies. John’s record of the gospel alone is enough to produce the belief that is necessary to accept Jesus as the Christ. John wrote,

And Jesus did many other signs in the presence of His disciples that are not written in this book. But these are written so that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, and Son of God, and that believing you might have life through His name (Jn 20:30,31).

The Holy Spirit has given all the proof necessary that is required to move one unto obedience of the gospel. It is today similar to the situation about which the Hebrew writer wrote concerning some in the first century: “For if we sin willfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins” (Hb 10:26). There are some who willfully forget (2 Pt 3:5). There are others who have no love for the truth of the gospel (2 Th 2:10-12). But it is now as Paul said to his audience in Athens, “And the times of this ignorance God has overlooked, but now He commands all men everywhere to repent” (At 17:30).

We must not allow ignorance to lure us into complacency. If we do, then Peter’s exhortation of 2 Peter 3:5,7 is a warning of coming things that will come upon us as a thief in the night:

For this they willfully forget .... But the heavens and the earth that are now, are reserved by the same word, reserved for the fire until the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men.

B. Envy crucified Christ.

When it came to the final hours of Jesus’ ministry, and prior to His crucifixion, Matthew recorded the true motives of the religious leaders. Even the unbelieving Pilate to whom the religious leaders delivered Jesus, knew their motives: “For he knew that the chief priests had delivered Him because of envy” (Mk 15:10; see Mt 27:18). The situation at the time of the crucifixion was as it was when Paul stood before resistant Jews in Antioch of Pisidia: “But when the Jews saw the multitudes, they were filled with envy. And contradicting and blaspheming, they opposed those things that were spoken by Paul” (At 13:45). The religious leaders of the day behaved as was stated by Aeschylus: “No man is a complete failure until he begins disliking men who succeed.”

If the multitudes believed that Jesus was truly the Messiah, then the bank accounts of the religious leadership would be emptied. The Sinai law would be nailed to the cross, and thus the obligation of the people to contribute to the priests would be nullified (Cl 2:14). In order not to send their “stock market” into a crash, the priests and Pharisees knew that Jesus had to go.

Paul identified envy as a work of the flesh (Gl 5:21; see 1 Tm 6:4; Ti 3:3). It was because of this work of the flesh that Joseph’s brothers sold him into captivity (Gn 37:11). These brothers allowed envy to destroy their love for their own brother, for their envy overpowered their love (See 1 Co 13:4). Even out of envy some preached Christ in Rome in order to stir up animosity against Paul (Ph 1:15). Envy is the motivation for doing all sorts of evil things in order to accomplish one’s own selfish goals (Js 3:14). Because the religious leaders of Jesus’ day envied Him, they were moved with evil motives to have Him removed from their midst.

We can be sure of one thing in reference to the attitude of envy. Where there is envy, there is always confusion and the implementation of evil works. James concluded, “For where envy and strife exist, there is confusion and every evil work” (Js 3:16). Envy produced an evil work by sending Jesus to the cross. It will do the same today.

C. Greed crucified Christ.

Greed is covetousness, or the love of having money. It is true what Paul wrote to a preacher, “For the love of money is the root of all evils, by which some coveting after have strayed from the faith and pierced themselves with many sorrows” (1 Tm 6:10). Would that more preachers in the religious world heeded those words.

It was the religious leaders of Jesus’ day who put Him on the cross. The historian Luke recorded of them, “And the Pharisees who were lovers of money ... scoffed at Him” (Lk 16:14). When Jesus overturned the tables of the money-changers, He overturned more than tables (Mt 21:12,13). He overturned the very foundation upon which the religious leaders based their financial security.

The Pharisees even used greed to accomplish their mission to dispose of Jesus. Judas, too, loved money (See Jn 12:1-6). So the religious leaders “weighed out to him thirty pieces of silver” (Mt 26:15). It was greed that moved the religious leaders to remove Jesus from their economy, and it was greed they used to implement their plan through Judas to have Him betrayed, and eventually crucified.

Greed (covetousness) is the idolization of money (Cl 3:5). But we must remember that the one who is covetous cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven (1 Co 6:10). Nevertheless, we are often as Esau who was willing to sacrifice his birthright for a pot of food to satisfy the lusts of the flesh (See Gn 25). We are sometimes more concerned over the things of this world that will perish in the great bomb fire to come, than we are about those things that will permeate the end of all things (See 2 Pt 3:10-13).

The problem with greed is that it focuses our minds on things of this world. But when we are living the gospel of Jesus, we do as what Paul instructed the Colossians who were struggling with covetousness: “If you then were raised with Christ, seek those things that are above .... Set your mind on things above, not on things on the earth” (Cl 3:1,2).

D. Cowardice crucified Christ.

John 12:42 is a record of many rulers who could have stopped the crucifixion of Jesus if they had enough courage to stand up for what they believed. But they were cowards, and thus allowed themselves to be intimidated by the “preachers” of the day who promoted the established religion of Judaism. John recorded, “Among the chief rulers also many believed in Him [Jesus]. But because of the Pharisees they did not confess Him lest they should be put out of the synagogue.”

The problem was—as is common among religious leaders—that “they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God” (Jn 12:43). Their cowardice, therefore, was based on selfish ambition and the preservation of their positions among the people. This is a very real scenario in which many religious leaders find themselves today. They would sacrifice the truth of Jesus for the sake of their positions and purse.

In fear for our physical well-being, cowardice may arise in our own hearts in order to preserve ourselves from harm. At the time of the arrest of Jesus, it was stated, “Then all the disciples forsook Him and fled” (Mt 26:56). Even Peter “followed Him at a distance” (Mt 26:58). However, we must understand this fear of the disciples in the historical context of what they believed at the time. To them, their leader who was supposed to establish a physical kingdom of Israel, was being arrested (See At 1:6). It was a time when they were still focusing on the physical restoration of national Israel (See At 1:16). However, after the resurrection of Jesus they would be convinced that Jesus was a king of a spiritual kingdom (See Jn 18:36; Rm 1:4).

After the resurrection of Jesus, and with the threat of beating and imprisonment, the same Peter who followed from afar off during the trial of Jesus, later stood boldly before the religious rulers and said, “Whether it is right in the sight of God to give heed to you more than to God, you judge. For we cannot but speak the things that we have seen and heard” (At 4:19,20).

Nevertheless, we must not take lightly the intimidation that can come from the established religious leadership of religion. For example, consider the situation during Peter’s ministry in the city of Antioch. “Before certain men came from James [in Jerusalem], he ate with the Gentiles. But when they came, he withdrew and separated himself, fearing those who were of the circumcision” (Gl 2:12).

It seems that Peter could stand bravely before unbelieving Jews in Jerusalem, but he found it difficult to stand bravely before believing Christian Jews who came up to Antioch from Jerusalem. Because he openly denied living by the gospel in fellowship with Gentile brethren, Paul approached him with the statement that “he stood condemned” (Gl 2:11). If we are ever in a situation where we deny the gospel because we are fearful of standing for Jesus, then we too stand condemned. If we are ever ashamed of the gospel, we are in trouble (Rm 1:16).

For those who would allow their cowardice to deny the opportunity to believe in and obey the gospel, John has a message: “But the cowardly ... will have their part in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone, which is the second death” (Rv 21:8). We must, therefore, take courage in the following words of Jesus: “And do not fear those who kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul. But rather fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell” (Mt 10:28).

It takes courage to stand up for Jesus. It takes courage to stand for that which is truth. If we are afraid to let our light shine for Jesus, then we have succumbed to fear. But we must remember that “there is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear” (1 Jn 4:18). Therefore, we must “be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might” (Ep 6:10). It is through His power that we stand. If we trust in ourselves, we will fall. But if we firmly believe that God works mightily in us through His power, then He can through us “do exceedingly abundantly above all that we ask or think according to the power that works in us” (Ep 3:20). The Canadian novelist, Charles William Gordon, put this strength into the following words:

Be sure you are right, and then stand. At first you will be denounced, then you will be deified. At first you will be rejected, then you will be accepted. First men will sneer at you, then if you wear well, they will swear by you. First the sneer, and then the cheer. First the lash, then the laurel. First the curse, then the caress. First the trial, then the triumph. First the cross, then the crown. For every scar upon thy brow, thou shalt have a star in thy diadem. Stand somewhere, and let humanity know where you stand. Stand for something, and let humanity know what you stand for. Be sure you are right, and then stand.

JESUS IS POWER!

In Romans 1, Paul wrote of all those who had lived since the beginning of time and before the cross. He made a very profound argument that John also used when he inscribed his historical record of Jesus. Paul’s argument was that God will be just in final judgment when His wrath “is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness” (Rm 1:18). God will be proved just “because that which is known about God is manifest within them” (Rm 1:19). God is the Father of our spirits, and thus being the Father of that part of us that is created after His image, “they [the ungodly] should seek the Lord, if perhaps they might grope after Him and find Him, though He is not far from every one of us” (At 17:27).

From the beginning of time, God revealed “the invisible things of Him since the creation of the world,” which things, “are clearly seen” in that which has been created (Rm 1:20). But because the ungodly refused to follow their instinctive inclinations to reach out for a moral guide that is above man, they will be “without excuse” when condemned in final judgment (Rm 1:20). The evidence of God that was revealed through the physical world was sufficient to relieve God from any accountability for judging fairly those who refused to have Him in their minds.

This brings us to the time when God in eternity revealed Himself through the incarnate Son of God in the first century. The God who revealed Himself, both in nature and through the natural instinct of the human being to seek for a Higher Power, was manifested in the likeness of men (Jn 1:1,14; see Ph 2:5-9). This brings us to the purpose for which John wrote the gospel of John. At the conclusion of John’s document on Deity, he identified both the audience to whom he wrote, and the reason for recording the advent of the incarnational God the Son into the material world He created (Cl 1:16).

And Jesus did many other signs in the presence of His disciples that are not written in this book. But these are written so that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you might have life through His name (Jn 20:30,31).

We would assume that John wrote an apologetical document concerning who the man Jesus was in order to give all information necessary for all who hear of Jesus to respond to Him. We would not assume that John's audience was composed of all those who already believed. He wrote "that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." His defense document was written, not for the purpose of keeping believers faithful, but to bring unbelievers into the family of believers.

We thus have an inspired platform of signs upon which to interpret the nature of the content of John. It is a platform of evidence upon which we would conclude that this Jesus of Nazareth was the incarnate Word who was formerly with the Father, but then came into flesh of man (Jn 1:1,14). We would thus view the book of John as a book of Christian evidences that are presented for the purpose of creating belief in the minds of those who do not know who Jesus is. It is for this reason that this book has been commonly referred to as the "Gospel of Belief."

In the preceding statement of John 20:30,31, John said that "Jesus did many other signs in the presence of His disciples." We thus deduct two conclusions concerning his purpose for writing. First, his purpose was not as Matthew, Mark and Luke. John had a concise purpose. He sought to write an apologetic that Jesus was the incarnate Son of God.

Second, John used only seven of the signs of Jesus to lead us to the conclusion that Jesus was the Son of God. We thus come to a marvelous conclusion: It does not take a multitude of miracles to prove that Jesus is the Son of God. And possibly, and more important, it does not take a continuation of miracles throughout history in order to maintain one's faith that Jesus is the Son of God. In fact, the very nature of John's recording only seven miracles (signs) of Jesus assumes that if one has the document of John, he would never again need any confirming miracles to prove that Jesus was the Son of God. If by chance a particular religious group did seek to depend on a supposed continual miraculous confirmation that Jesus was the Son of God, then this would be a denial of the purpose for which John wrote. It would marginalize the very book of John, and witness to the fact that those who continue to need miracles for faith have a difficult time with their faith.

If John recorded signs that Jesus worked in order to produce faith in Jesus, then we must assume that the Holy Spirit presents the book of John to us as sufficient to produce faith. If we need more miracles to believe, then we are saying that the book of John is insufficient to produce the faith that is pleasing to God.

We conclude that the seven miraculous signs that were recorded by John are sufficient to produce a faith that is adequate for salvation. We will not, therefore, call on God for more confirming miracles, though God continues to work in our lives. But working in our lives within the natural order of things was not the confirming signs that John provided in his document. John focused on those miraculous events that were already perceived by the people to be God working outside the natural order of the physical world.

The fact that the seven signs of Jesus that John recorded were out of the ordinary occurrence of natural laws is what classifies them as "signs." They were signals of Someone who was beyond this world. We would not, therefore, nullify the seven signs of John by saying that such signs were only the natural occurrence of the physical laws of nature. The fact that John records these particular signs as evidence that Jesus was the Son of God validates the fact that what Jesus did through these signs was out of the ordinary, and thus, He was no ordinary man.

God expects of us, as He did of those before the coming of Jesus, to accept these seven miracles as sufficient proof to conclude "that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God" (Jn 20:31). We conclude as Nicodemus when he came to Jesus in the night: "Rabbi, we know that You are a teacher come from God, for no one can do these signs that You do unless God is with him" (Jn 3:2).

A. Evidence of changing water into wine (Jn 2:1-22):

This miracle was the first of Jesus' signs in Cana of Galilee (Jn 2:11). The occasion was a marriage feast to which He and the disciples had been invited. Having accepted the invitation of those who were to be married, Jesus, and His mother, were present with His disciples. The occasion for the miracle was when Jesus' mother said to Him, "They have no wine" (Jn 2:3). Since Jesus responded to His mother with the statement, "My hour has not yet come," it may be that this was a preemptive sign that His mother expected Him to do. At least Jesus answered His mother in a manner that she expected something from Him in order to solve the problem. So after His kind correction of her misunderstanding concerning His ministry, and without any showmanship, Jesus proceeded to provide the wine.

Regardless of the occasion, or the reasons for revealing His power, John used this sign to encourage the people to start thinking about who He was. In order to begin their wonder concerning who He was, they had to be initiated into the supernatural realm from where He originated.

There were six water pots available, the contents of which were used by the guests for cleansing for a feast (Jn 2:6; see Mk 7:1-9). Since the water had already been used by the guests for washing, Jesus asked that they again be filled with water. Once they were filled, Jesus instructed, “Now draw some out ...” (Jn 2:8). When the master of the feast tasted the contents, he excitedly proclaimed that the wine was superior to that which was commonly served at the beginning of a feast.

The master of the feast was unaware of the circumstances and origin of the wine that he classified as superior. He did not realize that the turning of the water into wine was accomplished by Jesus, and that the change was instantaneous. There were no dramatic performances on the part of Jesus in order to call attention to what He had just done. There was no ecstatic behavior on the part of those who witnessed the miracle. The sign was simply done, and the result reaped the desired response: “This beginning of signs Jesus did in Cana of Galilee, and manifested His glory. And His disciples believed in Him” (Jn 2:11).

If the disciples believed with only the one sign of turning water into wine, then we would conclude that it takes only one valid confirming miracle to produce faith. John wants us to understand that a valid miracle is enough to confirm the presence of the supernatural. One valid miracle is more evidential than a host of fake miracles.

For the disciples, this was only the beginning of an adventure of amazement that would continue for over three years. They would learn that this Jesus they followed was the Master over the elements of the world that He had created (See Cl 1:16). In the future, they would see greater things. They would eventually arrive at the conclusion that the Son of God was truly in their presence. By the time John takes his readers to the resurrection of Lazarus, he has prepared our minds to accept the fact that the Father was working powerfully through the incarnate Son in order to glorify both Himself and the Son.

B. Evidence of a nobleman's son (Jn 4:46-54):

The occasion for this miraculous “outreach” of Jesus reached over a distance of about twenty kilometers (about sixteen miles). At the time, Jesus was in Cana, but the nobleman's son was in Capernaum (Jn 4:46). When the desperate father “heard that Jesus had come out of Judea into Galilee, he went to Him and implored Him” (Jn 4:47).

Only the father of a son who is near death could understand the desperation of this father. The son “was at the point of death.” He thus pleaded with Jesus, “Sir, come down before my child dies.” It is interesting to note that Jesus gave only a simple reply to the desperate plea of the father: “Go your way. Your son lives.” It was an emphatic declaration. No explanation was needed. This statement was made about the seventh hour of the day, and immediately, the father set out for home, believing that Jesus had answered his plea.

The response of the father manifested his faith in what Jesus could do. He was a pleading father in the presence of Jesus, but with a faith that would be increased by the healing of his son. We would expect that he would urge Jesus to personally come to where his son was about to die. But his faith moved him to leave immediately to return to his son. “And the man believed the word that Jesus had spoken to him and he went his way” (Jn 4:50).

He traveled throughout the night in order to return to his son. We wonder what was going through his mind as he made his way back home to the bedside of his dying son. While he was yet some distance from home, but still on his way, his excited servants met him on the road in the morning hours, and proclaimed to him, “Your son lives!” (Jn 4:51). It was there that men probably fell to their knees in thanksgiving to God.

When the father regained his composure, he obviously asked his servants when the child was healed. He wanted to connect the dots between pronouncement and healing. The servants replied, “Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him” (Jn 4:52). When the father connected the dots, the healing had its immediate effect on the hearts of both father and servants, and the entire household: “And he himself believed, and his whole house” (Jn 4:53).

And herein is defined John's use of the word “sign” in reference to the supernatural work of Jesus during His ministry. This healing was a sign of something greater than this world, and thus, greater than the man Jesus Himself. Belief on the part of the father and his household was evidence that Jesus had control of that which was beyond this world. The result, therefore, was more than gratitude. It was belief that Jesus was the Son of God who had control of the supernatural world of God.

We must compare this miracle that took place over a great distance with the theatrical performances of those today who claim to be working confirming miracles. In this case, there was no fanfare. There was no gathered audience. There was no smoke from a stage, or screaming from a microphone. There was only a simple statement from Jesus, and the deed from a distance was done.

When we read what Jesus promised His disciples when He gave them the great commission, we must remember what transpired in the circumstances that surrounded this sign. After saying to the disciples, “Going, therefore, disciple all the nations,” Jesus promised, “And, lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the age” (Mt 28:19,20). Jesus did not have to be in their presence in order to be with them. Our relationship with Jesus does not mean He has to be right here with us in order to be with us.

Jesus had earlier promised the disciples, “For where two or three are gathered together in My name, there I am in the midst of them” (Mt 18:20). As the omnipresent God was with David, so He is today wherever there is a child of God: “Yes,” David wrote, “though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for You are with me” (Ps 23:4).

The power of Jesus is in our presence in every situation, and under all circumstances. In prison, Paul confidently affirmed, “I can do all things through Him who strengthens me” (Ph 4:13). The strengthening of Jesus is not confined by location, as the power of Jesus to heal the nobleman’s son was not confined to Cana where Jesus was at the time. As one with God, Jesus is now omnipresent, and thus, His power encompasses the world. Therefore, “The Lord is my light and my salvation. Whom will I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life. Of whom will I be afraid” (Ps 27:1).

We must not think that because Jesus ascended out of the presence of His disciples that He ascended out of reach with His power. The preposterous teaching that we now need another mediator between God and man because Jesus is so distant, attacks the very nature of the omnipresence of God. There is one mediator between God and man simply because Jesus will always be close in order to mediate on our behalf (See 1 Tm 2:5).

C. Evidence of the disabled man (Jn 5:1-9):

This is a case of a surprised healing. The myth of the day was that an angel on occasion supposedly came down and stirred the waters of the pool of Bethesda. The one to be first in the water after it was stirred by a visiting angel, would be healed.

(Many manuscripts do not include verse 4. It is not included because it is supposed that it was added later by some scribe in order to explain to John’s readers, who were primarily Gentiles outside the region of Palestine, why there was this belief in reference to the waters of Bethesda.)

Nevertheless, the disabled man was there with others, and the common belief, which we suppose was psychosomatic, was that he would be made well of a thirty-eight-year affliction if he could only be the first in the water after its stirring.

So Jesus asked a question that had an obvious answer: “Do you want to be made whole?” (Jn 5:6). We suppose that the question was asked simply to gain the attention of the man, for there were others there also who desired to be healed. This particular man did not know who Jesus was (Jn 5:13). He may have known of Jesus, but he did not know him by facial recognition.

After Jesus had asked the question concerning his willingness to be healed, Jesus simply stated, “Rise, take up your bed and walk” (Jn 5:8). There were no theatrical performances on the part of Jesus. There were no crowd-gathering speeches, and call for attention. There was not even a statement to be healed. Jesus simply made the statement that he take up his bed and walk. The deed was done, and realized only when the man stood up. This is something far different from those today who conduct fake healings in order to spread fake news of their deceptive works. We must never underestimate the desire for notoriety among those who presume to fake true confirming signs.

John’s account of the event reads, “And immediately the man was made whole” (Jn 5:9). When a true confirming miracle took place, the result was immediate and perceived real by the beholders. Thirty-eight years of infirmity came to an end in a moment. The disabled man was healed with only a statement to take up his bed and walk. There was no command to be healed.

Because of the length of the infirmity, the man was well-known throughout the region. Many had passed by and given him either food or money. Because of the immediate nature of the healing, the impact of the healing was made known to everyone who knew him. The man was not told to go home, and that he would eventually get better. The result was instantaneous, and the impact on the people who knew him was also instantaneous.

Because the man did not know who it was who healed him, we assume from John’s listing of this miracle that Jesus wanted us to know that there was no psychosomatic nature about His healing of this man and others. In other words, the healed were not hypnotically convinced in their minds that they were healed, and then three days later they recovered from some hypnotic trance of being healed. They were not healed during a hysterical meeting, and then “unhealed” days later when they were at home and recovered from the emotional hysteria of the moment.

John records this healing in order to convince us that Jesus did not heal because He was an accepted “healer” of the day, or one who generated emotional hysteria in the minds of those He healed. He wanted us to understand that the personality of Jesus was not used to convince people that they were healed. For the one who was healed, especially on this occasion, was surprised. The man did not request to be healed. Upon the pronouncement of Jesus, therefore, he discovered that thirty-eight years of being crippled had immediately gone away. It was a surprise. The healing was not only of the bones of his legs, but also the strengthening of his muscles, for he took up his bed and walked away (Jn 5:9).

After the healing, Jesus slipped away from the startled crowd (Jn 5:13). However, when He knew He could have a more private conversation with the man, He sought him out in the temple courtyard (Jn 5:14). It was during this personal encounter with the healed man that Jesus encouraged him to live contrary to a sinful way of life (Jn 5:14). And then what happened was what Jesus evidently intended to happen: “The man departed and told the Jews that it was Jesus who had made him whole” (Jn 5:15). And now, this news provoked the Jewish religious leaders to come searching for Jesus, which thing Jesus wanted. For this was a “feast of the Jews” when Jews of those times made a journey to Jerusalem, possibly on this occasion for the Passover/Pentecost feast (Jn 5:1). It was during this feast that Jesus wanted His name to be taken back home to nations throughout the Roman Empire. He wanted everyone who heard what He had done in reference to the healing of the impotent man to be broadcast throughout the nations.

D. Evidence of creation (Jn 6:1-14; see Mt 14:13-21):

At the time of this miraculous production of fish and loaves, we are given an indication by John that this was not the fourth miracle of Jesus, but the listing of the fourth miracle that he used to substantiate his proposition that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (See Jn 20:30,31). In this text it states that the great multitude “followed Him because they saw His signs” (Jn 6:2). The word “signs” is plural, and thus we assume that many more signs had been worked by Jesus before this sign.

The signs that John has recorded to this point continues to build on his apologetic proposition.

On this occasion, it is very important to notice one interesting request that Jesus made after the feeding of the multitudes: “Gather up the fragments that remain so that nothing is lost” (Jn 6:12). In the phrase, “so that nothing is lost,” Jesus had more in mind than simply gathering up the fragments that there be no waste. He wanted the disciples, after gathering every fragment of food, to deduct something from the quantity of the leftovers. “They gathered them together and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves that remained over” (Jn 6:13). This amount came from an initial five fish and two loaves of bread (Mt 14:17). Now it was time for the disciples to start making deductions.

Five thousand men, plus the women and children, were gathered in the multitude (Jn 6:10; see Mt 14:21). There could have easily been over ten thousand people. But when the fragments were gathered up, they filled twelve baskets. From five loaves and two fish, they ended up with twelve baskets of leftovers. Jesus wanted His disciples to do the math, and then come to the conclusion of who was standing in their midst.

Jesus was more than a good Rabbi, more than a good teacher, and more than a prophet. Since only God can create, He wanted the disciples to gather up the fragments in order to come to the conclusion that it was the Creator of all things who stood in their midst (See Cl 1:16). If only God can create, then Jesus wanted them to understand that in some way God was there.

Of all the supernatural wonders that Jesus did in His incarnate state of being on earth, this miracle, and the feeding of the 4,000 on another occasion, brings us to the conclusion that Jesus had command of the supernatural. In the flesh, He could call on the power of God in order to bring about the confirmation of who He was before He came into the flesh of man (Jn 1:14). He was in the beginning with God, and was God (Jn 1:1,2). But we must not think for a moment that while He was on earth that He forsook His command of the power of the supernatural. The twelve baskets full of fragments will always be a profound testimony to the fact that Jesus on earth was far above any prophet among men. It is superfluous, therefore, to compare Jesus as a prophet to self-declared prophets as Muhammad.

Those who witnessed what happened on the occasion of feeding the multitudes, declared, “This is truly the Prophet who is to come into the world” (Jn 6:14). This was the Prophet about whom Moses prophesied who would come after him (Dt 18:15-22). The miracle of the loaves and fishes at least took the minds of the people back to Moses’ prophecy of the Prophet who would come after his likeness. But Jesus was more.

For the disciples, Jesus wanted the event to take their minds far beyond Moses, and Jesus being only the Prophet. When Jesus later gathered the twelve together and asked them the question, “Who do men say that I, the Son of Man, am?” (Mt 16:13), He was seeking a response that He was more than the Prophet. In order to take their thinking to where John is taking our thinking in recording this particular sign, Jesus called the disciples’ attention to two miracles. These were the miracles of creation in the feeding of the multitude of the 4,000 and 5,000. He was thus demanding the answer that Peter gave: “You are the Christ, the Son of the living God” (Mt 16:16). The miracle of creating twelve baskets full of fragments moved Jesus beyond being the One about whom Moses prophesied. The fragments moved Jesus into being the creating Son of God.

E. Evidence of water walking (Jn 6:16-21):

This miracle was for the disciples, for the people saw the disciples enter the boat, but not Jesus (Jn 6:22). Everything happened at sea in the darkness of the night, just as Jesus had planned. The situation was set up by Jesus, for He commanded the disciples to get into the boat and make their way to the other side of the sea (Mt 14:22). He then sent the multitudes away from the scene (Mt 14:23). It was then that He went up a mountain in order to pray and wait for the opportune time to come to the disciples in the night. Jesus waited until the storm at sea had prepared them emotionally for what He was about to do. So when the storm at sea had battered both occupants and boat for some time, Jesus “went to them, walking on the sea” (Mt 14:25).

Of course such a happening would terrify the disciples, which thing it did (Jn 6:19). John does not, as did Matthew, go into great detail concerning what transpired. John’s purpose for recording this incident was to generate faith in the minds of his readers by bringing his readers to the point of confession that Jesus is the Son of God. So the conclusion to which John drew his readers was the control over the natural world that was within the power of Jesus as the Son of God.

When this miracle first occurred, the apostles were the only witnesses. The multitudes were left to question how Jesus made His way to where the boat eventually landed (Jn 6:22-24). Only when John recorded this event, or when the apostles spoke of it after the Pentecost of A.D. 30, did the people, and ourselves, conclude that Jesus in the flesh had power over the elements of this world (See At 27:21-26). As Jonah perceived that the storm at sea was the work of God to turn his way back to Nineveh, so this storm at sea was for the purpose of revealing to the apostles that if they followed Jesus, they would not be cast into the depths of the sea. They must remember that the One they followed had command of the laws of nature.

John left out the incident when Jesus called Peter to come to Him while He was standing above the waters in a raging storm. Matthew included the conclusion to which John sought to bring us to confess after reading such a testimony. When the storm was quieted, and the sea as smooth as glass that reflected the heavenly bodies, the disciples worshiped Him right there in the boat. They correctly concluded, “Truly, You are the Son of God” (Mt 14:33).

Jesus was finally getting through to them. Mark recorded the reaction of the disciples at the moment, “And they were greatly astonished, for they had not understood the miracle of the loaves because their heart was hardened” (Mk 6:51,52). After the feeding of the multitudes, the twelve disciples had just experienced something that was surreal. They were still trying to comprehend the twelve baskets of fragments. What had happened had not yet “sunk in.” The walking on the water that followed immediately after the feeding of the 5,000 intensified the impact of what Jesus wanted to do in transforming their thinking concerning who He was. It was not that their hearts were hardened against Him, but that the awesome result of the feeding of the 5,000, and the walking on the water, was almost too much for the human mind to comprehend in such a short time.

Therefore, when Jesus came up into the boat, they fell to their knees and worshiped Him, which worship is to be given only to God.

It would have been blasphemy for these Jews to worship any man on earth. It would have been a violation of the first of the ten commandants: “You will have no other gods before Me. You will not bow down yourself to them ...” (Ex 20:3-5). But here in this boat in the calm of a sea, twelve Jewish men are bowing down to Jesus. What they came to realize on those calm waters in the middle of the night, was what John wants us to conclude and do in reference to this Jesus of Nazareth. He is truly the Son of the living God. He is One before whom we must bow down and worship.

F. Evidence of the blind who see (Jn 9:1-12):

The event of this miracle was incidental. Jesus was going somewhere and “passed by” a man whom He saw was blind (Jn 9:1). As with the disabled man at the pool of Bethesda, this healing was only incidental to what Jesus was doing or to where He was going. He did not call a great crowd of people together, and then select out of them those who volunteered to be healed. He called no one up on a stage in order to do a theatrical performance before the people.

We must “read between the lines” in order to better understand what transpired on this occasion. As Jesus walked by, He noticed this blind man who had been blind since birth (Jn 9:1). In order to heal the man, Jesus made mud by spitting on dirt. He then put the mud on the man’s eyes. He then instructed the man, “Go wash in the pool of Siloam” (Jn 9:7).

It seems that Jesus did not want the blind man to be healed in His presence, or the presence of the disciples. And probably most important of all, he wanted the man to know that it was Jesus who healed him. Therefore, it would be a healing that would be known first only by the blind man himself. So obediently, the man “went his way and washed. And he came back seeing” (Jn 9:7). He was led away, and then probably came back by himself. There were no crowds to be amazed, and no cheers of praise from an overenthusiastic audience.

It was only later when the neighbors who knew the man, began to question as to how he gained his sight. The questioning by the neighbors as to how he was able to see affirms the fact that the man was actually blind. They had walked by the man for years and given him alms as he begged on the street. But now he could see. They knew that while he was blind, he was not deceiving them for contributions. Their testimony is that he was truly blind.

“Where is He?” the neighbors questioned. “I do not know,” was the reply (Jn 9:12). John wants us to know that Jesus did not unveil the supernatural on this occasion in order to draw attention to Himself at the time and on this occasion. All the healed man knew was that it was Jesus who did the deed.

Since this was probably the Passover/Pentecost feast that Jesus attended during His ministry, He was building inquiry, or curiosity, in the minds of the people that Someone was in town who was the Prophet about whom Moses had prophesied. The name “Jesus” would become renowned as time went by, and by the time Jesus visited two more Passover/Pentecost feast after this occasion. It would be throughout this time that Jesus would build a case file of miracles that would demand the conclusion that John later affirmed from the record of only seven of His miracles: “... that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God” (Jn 20:31).

G. Evidence of the resurrected (Jn 11:1-46):

The raising of Lazarus from the dead was to prove something greater than Jesus “practicing what He preached.” At the beginning of His ministry, He proclaimed, “He who hears My word and believes in Him who sent Me, has everlasting life” (Jn 5:24). “The hour is coming in which all who are in the graves will hear His voice and will come forth” (Jn 5:28,29). By the time Jesus came to Bethany where His three friends, Mary, Martha and Lazarus, lived, it was time for a demonstration of what He had been teaching in reference to eternal life.

When the death of Lazarus was initially reported to Jesus, it was time in the ministry of Jesus to reveal the power that was within His control. And when this power was released, He would accomplish the following: “This sickness is not to death, but for the glory of God, so that the Son of God might be glorified by it” (Jn 11:4).

At the time, the disciples seem to still be in a state of “unbelief” concerning the totality of who Jesus was. They had difficulty in bringing together all that He was. They had by this time in His ministry experienced a great deal. But raising the dead would certainly shock their thinking just before the conclusion of His earthly ministry. So Jesus said to them, “Our friend Lazarus sleeps, but I go so that I may awake him out of sleep” (Jn 11:11). The disciples did not understand what He was saying. “Lord, if he sleeps,” they replied, “he will recover” (Jn 11:12). However, “Jesus spoke of his death. But they thought that He was speaking of taking rest in sleep” (Jn 11:13).

In order to increase their still inadequate faith, Jesus said to them, “I am glad for your sakes that I was not there [when Lazarus died], so that you may believe” (Jn 11:15). Now Jesus has revealed the purpose for His raising of Lazarus from the dead. The resurrection was not only for the disciples to believe, but for us also, that we might believe that Jesus is the Son of God (Jn 20:31). Since only God can raise the dead, then they, as we, need to conclude that Jesus was and is Deity.

Upon His arrival to Bethany, Jesus said to Martha, “Your brother will rise again” (Jn 11:23). He continued, “I am the resurrection and the life. He who believes in Me, though he were dead, yet he will live” (Jn 11:25). This claim needed proof. It needed a demonstration. It was something about which Jesus had spoken throughout His ministry, and now it was the time to make good on His claim.

In the emotional build up to the main event, there was discussion, if not blame that if Jesus had been present, He could have healed Lazarus. But this would have been no grand finale of proof that He was the Son of God with all the supernatural power that is characteristic with Deity. His healing power had been substantiated by this time, for the people standing around said, “Could not this Man who opened the eyes of the blind have also kept this man from dying?” (Jn 11:37). The answer to the question would be YES! But the purpose for Jesus’ delay in coming to Bethany was to make sure that Lazarus was dead and buried, and thus, there would have been no temptation for Him to heal His friend from a sickness. It was time for a resurrection.

Therefore, with the commanding statement, “Lazarus, come forth,” the world was changed forever, and the power of the resurrection after the crucifixion of Jesus was made possible and real (Jn 11:43). All that Jesus had taught throughout His ministry concerning “words of life” found validation in these three words. Our hope in the Son of God finds meaning in the fact that Jesus had the power to be raised, and by the same power that raised Lazarus, we too would be raised.

By the resurrection of Lazarus, Jesus laid the foundation to give His disciples hope when He himself was laid in a tomb of death. Lazarus would be the proof that His own death would not be the end. Though after the cross the disciples may have momentarily forgotten the resurrection of Lazarus, they needed to know that the power that raised Lazarus did not come from the man Jesus, but from Him who remained in heaven. In His incarnate state in ministry, Jesus had control of the supernatural through the power of the Holy Spirit (See Lk 4:14).

Mary had complained, “Lord, if You had been here, my brother would not have died” (Jn 11:32). Physical presence in order that supernatural power be released still plagued the thinking of the disciples. Thus before Jesus cried out for the resurrection of Lazarus, He cried out to the Father, that the Father resurrect Lazarus in order “that they may believe that You have sent Me” (Jn 11:42). The power of the resurrection came from above, but only at the command of Jesus. We must not miss this point.

With the same power from heaven, Jesus was raised from the dead. Paul explained in writing,

I pray that the eyes of your heart be enlightened so that you may know ... what is the exceeding greatness of His power toward us who believe ... that He worked in Christ when He raised Him from the dead ... (Ep 1:18-21).

The same power that raised Lazarus from the dead, was the same power that raised Jesus from the dead. It will be this same power that will raise us from the dead when Jesus comes again. All that Paul said in conclusion to this reality were the words of the Spirit, “Comfort one another with these words” (1 Th 4:18).

Therefore, we remember that “Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His righteous saints” (Ps 116:15). We have thus been delivered by Him from the fear of death (Hb 2:14,15). Thank you, Jesus!

JESUS’ LAST WORDS!

In a TV show a scenario of destiny was established by a supposedly dying man. The man was lying in a hospital bed with his immediate family and church family gathered around. The preacher was holding the dying man’s hand. The preacher asked if the dying man had any last words for his family and friends. The man uttered, “Yes, I did not get all my business done!” And then he expired.

Jesus gave some last words from the cross, which words communicate a great deal. However, He did get His business done, and so, it was time to relinquish His spirit into the hands of the Father. He could confidently give up His spirit on the cross because He had finished His business for which He came into the world.

The last words of a passing loved one are always precious. They are words that the living remember throughout their lives. And so it was with the last words of Jesus from the cross. These are words the Holy Spirit wanted us to remember, and thus, He guided inspired writers to make sure that we remembered the last words of Jesus, for the meaning of the words carry with them some very profound thoughts.

A. Last words of forgiveness:

From the cross, Jesus said, “Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Lk 23:34). These are words that we would expect to hear from the One whose business it was to come for us in our sin. In our ignorance, we did not know how far away from God we had strayed. The cross will always be a reality check of our ignorance while we were steeped in our own self-righteous religiosity. Even in the actual act of crucifixion, those who drove nails through the hands of Jesus were doing so in the ignorance of their own sin to crucify the Son of God.

The self-righteous religious leaders who called for the crucifixion of Jesus were so caught up in their own religion that they called for the condemnation of Jesus because they thought they were preserving the “Jews’ religion” from the influence of a rebel. But the execution of their deed was based on the fact that they did not believe that Jesus was who He said He was. Almost everything that Jesus was and taught was contrary to their self-righteous religiosity (See Rm 10:1-3).

To the Roman soldiers who did the actual deed of crucifixion, Jesus was just another malefactor who had to be executed. Every blow of the hammer was an indication of their ignorance of the incarnate hands through which they drove sharp nails. Nevertheless, while the incarnate flesh of Jesus strained against the nails of the cross, Jesus was still thinking of the business for which He came into the world. Forgiveness was His business, and thus in His last moments on the cross, He was still doing His business.

The preceding words of Jesus concerning forgiveness, reveal that He understood why they wanted Him on the cross. They truly did not know what they were doing. They were as one of their leaders who launched a vehement persecution against those who later gave their allegiance to Jesus as His disciples. This leader (Paul) later wrote after finally relinquishing to the power of the testimony of Jesus’ disciples, “I was formerly a blasphemer and a persecutor and injurious. But I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly in unbelief” (1 Tm 1:13). Jesus knew that many of those who cried out that He be crucified, would later, as Paul, believe that He was the Christ and Son of the living God.

Those who nailed Jesus to the cross did so, because at the time, they had no interest in who Jesus really was. The Jewish religious leaders were caught up in their own religiosity. The Roman world of idolatry was fascinated with the gods they had created after their own imaginations. It was of this religious world that Paul later wrote: “This wisdom [about the Son of God] none of the princes of this age has known, for had they known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory” (1 Co 2:8).

Nevertheless, the disciples who truly followed Jesus after the resurrection emulated the spirit of the last words of forgiveness that Jesus uttered from the cross. When Peter later stood before some of the people in Jerusalem who had aided in the crucifixion, this spirit of forgiveness was revealed. “And now, brethren, I know that through ignorance you did it, as did also your rulers” (At 3:17). On his mission journey to the city of Antioch of Pisidia, Paul also reminded the people of the ignorance of those in Jerusalem who crucified Jesus:

For those who dwell in Jerusalem, and their rulers, because they did not know Him, nor the voices of the prophets who are read every Sabbath, they have fulfilled them in condemning Him (At 13:27).

Jesus, who was executed out of ignorance was actually God working through the ignorance men to accomplish the salvation of all those who would eventually confess Jesus as Lord and Christ. We must not misunderstand what was happening behind the scenes at the time of the crucifixion. During the trial and execution of Jesus, Satan thought he was having his best day. He had used well the ignorance of men. But in his deed of deception, God was actually revealing the mystery of salvation that had been held in secret since the garden of Eden (See Ep 3:3-5; 1 Pt 1:10-12). Therefore, we must not forget what Jesus said in His plan to lead Himself to the cross:

My Father loves Me because I lay down My life so that I may take it up again. No one takes it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down and I have power to take it up again (Jn 10:17,18).

Jesus gave His life voluntarily for us. The cross was no accident. It was planned and executed by Jesus. He willed that the nails be driven through His incarnate flesh. While on the cross, Jesus could have called on ten thousand angels to deliver Himself from the fate that He had set for Himself. In the garden of Gethsemane at the time of His arrest, He reminded the disciples, “Or do you think that I cannot now pray to My Father, and He will provide Me more than twelve legions of angels” (Mt 26:53). We must never come to any conclusion that would bring us into doubt concerning the predestined purpose of the cross. We can sorrow for His suffering while there, but we must rejoice that He was there. Any theology that would presume that the cross as an accident, afterthought, or miscalculation on the part of God in His eternal plan of redemption, must immediately be discarded as false.

Regardless of the torment of pain on the cross, Jesus was practicing that which He had preached throughout His ministry. “And whoever does not bear his own cross and come after Me, cannot be My disciple” (Lk 14:27). And when we take up our crosses, we too must be willing to make the same statement from our crosses that Jesus made. Jesus would remind us, “Bless those who curse you and pray for those who mistreat you” (Lk 6:28). It was as if Jesus were practicing what He preached when He prayed that those who crucified Him be forgiven. At the time, they did not know who He really was, or what they were doing.

The prayer of Jesus from the cross was answered fifty-three days later by about three thousand people. When the apostle Peter stood up on the day of Pentecost, he announced to those who had crucified Jesus, “Therefore, let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ” (At 2:36). The message cut the people to the heart (At 2:37). That day, “those who received his word were baptized ... about three thousand souls” (At 2:41). They were cut to the heart, because in their own ignorance, they had crucified the Messiah (Christ) of Israel who was now Lord of all (At 2:36).

From that day of Pentecost, those who were informed of the incarnate God who was crucified in ignorance, became obedient to the gospel that was set in motion. “So the word of God increased. And the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. And a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith” (At 6:7). There is always forgiveness waiting for those who respond to the gospel of Jesus. The following words of Joy Tidwell express well our thinking:

An angry mob milled round the town,
There was violence in the air;
A man was tried and guilty found,
A cross he had to bear.

Up the hill and down the road,
So heavy it became;
People scoffed, and laughed, and joked,
And revelled at his pain.

He faltered, and a helping hand,
Relieved part of the load;
But no one there could help remove,
What waited down the road.

A crown of thorns upon his head,
Was mockery to the king;
They nailed him high upon the cross,
Their voices they did ring,

“If you be who you say you are,
Come down and prove it true.”
“Forgive them Father,” was all he said,
“They know no what they do.”

The mob that still lives on this earth,
Is just as bad as then;

His cross is just as heavy now,
We load it down with sin.

Up the hill and down the road,
Until his back is sore;
We laugh and joke and gaily live,
And forget the pain he bore.

Oh, we might help him for awhile,
To carry his heavy load;
But we get weary and get tired,
And take off down the road.

We leave him there alone to face,
Again the crown of thorns;
We mock him as the others did,
When his flesh was ripped and torn.

As he did then, he looks down now,
In compassion tried and true;
“Father, forgive them,” he still says,
“For they know not what they do!”

B. Last words of hope:

With forgiveness still on His mind in His last moments on the cross, Jesus turned to the repentant thief and said, “Truly I say to you, today you will be with Me in Paradise” (Lk 23:43). In this life, we will never know this man to whom Jesus spoke these comforting words. All we know is what the repentant thief said to the other criminal who was crucified along with him, “Do you not fear God, seeing you are under the same condemnation?” (Lk 23:40).

We could say that the one to whom Jesus promised Paradise was a God-fearing man who was caught by the authorities while in the wilderness of criminality. He knew that he was receiving just punishment for his sins of a wayward life. But on the cross, his mind was turned toward meeting the God against whom he had sinned in leading a wayward life on earth. He then turned to Jesus in remorse of repentance, and asked for a last possibility of hope against the One whom he had sinned. In remorse, he asked Jesus, “Jesus, remember me when You come into Your kingdom” (Lk 23:42).

We do not know how long he had known Jesus, for he called Jesus by name. But we do know that he understood that Jesus was coming into His kingdom, though he did not know all that this kingdom entailed. He was not a nonreligious person. So Jesus, that we might be reminded of the authority He had even in His last hours on earth, expressed to us through His words to the thief what He had previously said, “But that you may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins ...” (Mt 9:6).

The announcement of the angel at the time of the birth of Jesus was correct: “For to you a Savior is born this day in the city of David, who is Christ the Lord” (Lk 2:11). Jesus was “the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world” (Jn 1:29). And in His final moments on the cross, Jesus was doing His business for which He came into the world, that is, bringing forgiveness of sins to the world.

While on earth, Jesus had the divine authority to forgive sins between man and God. He was on the cross in order to seal the deal between God and man. “He Himself bore our sins in His own body on the tree, so that we, having died to sins, might live to righteousness; by whose wounds you were healed” (1 Pt 2:24). So just as a last reminder while on earth, Jesus wanted us to remember why He was there that day nailed to a “tree.” He was there on our behalf.

What the repentant thief realized the moment he drew his last breath, is what all those who believe in Jesus will realize when they, too, do the same. They will in that same day be with Jesus in Paradise. It is for this Paradise of God that we all hope. “He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches. To him who overcomes I will give to eat of the tree of life that is in the paradise of God” (Rv 2:7).

C. Last words of maternal responsibility:

While hanging in torture on the cross, Jesus was still thinking of others. It would be only natural for Him to make sure his aged mother was in the capable hands of another. So to the young son of Zebedee, who at the time was probably still a teenager, or in his early twenties, John inscribed the following words of Jesus from the cross:

Therefore, when Jesus saw His mother and the disciple whom He loved [John] standing by, He said to His mother, “Woman, behold your son!” Then He said to the disciple, “Behold, your mother!” And from that hour that disciple [John] took her into his own household (Jn 19:26).

This statement implies that the husband of Mary, Joseph, had already passed on by this time. The Holy Spirit deemed it unnecessary that we have a record of the passing of Joseph, for there is no statement in Scripture concerning the death of Jesus’ earthly father. The death may have occurred before the beginning of the ministry of Jesus, which thing we might assume happened because only Jesus’ mother was at the marriage feast early in the ministry of Jesus (See Jn 2:1-11). At least by the beginning of His ministry, Joseph is not mentioned with the mother, brothers and sisters when He came into “His own country” in the early part of His ministry (See Mk 6:1).

So in His last hours on the cross, Jesus wanted to assign the custody of His mother over to a specific person. If He had not done this, then the disciples themselves would have had to assume this responsibility, for the brothers and sisters were not believers at the time. We would assume that Jesus was thinking that throughout the burden of their duties as Christ-sent apostles, His mother may have been neglected.

We might wonder why the care for the mother of Jesus was not assumed by the children of Mary, specifically James, Judas (Jude), Joses or Simon, and the sisters (Mt 12:46-50; Mk 6:3; Jn 2:12; 7:3-5). In the Jewish culture, it was the responsibility of the firstborn to make sure the mother was cared for in society. As the firstborn, therefore, Jesus was assuming His responsibility to make sure that His mother was never neglected, which thing would be true of a believer who had accepted Him as the Son of God.

At the time these words were spoken by Jesus, the earthly brothers and sisters apparently still did not believe in Jesus as the Messiah of Israel and Savior of the world. Many would later become disciples, particularly James and Jude. But at this time, Jesus wanted everyone to know that He was entrusting His mother specifically into the hands of a believer. He was thinking spiritual, and not in reference to earthly family responsibilities.

D. Last words of despair:

It was the ninth hour according to Jewish time (3:00<sup>pm</sup> in the afternoon Roman time) when “Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, ‘Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?’ that is to say, ‘My God, My God, why have You forsaken Me?’” (Mt 27:46; Mk 14:34).

These last words were a quotation from a prophetic statement made in Psalm 22:1. It may have been that Jesus wanted everyone present to recall in their minds the prophecy of Psalm 22, which prophecy was a prophetic plea for the help of God in times of trouble. It was one of those times in the last moments of Jesus’ ministry to the world when He approached God from the standpoint of a truly incarnate human being.

Throughout the ministry of Jesus, every time He addressed His Father in prayer, He used the word “Father.” But at this moment on the cross, He refers to the Father as “God.” At the moment of death, His relationship with the Father had now changed. It had changed from Father to God. The father/son relationship during the ministry had now moved to the human/God relationship, for it was now time for the Father, as God, to take over in the death and resurrection of the Son (See Ep 1:20).

Jesus was not on the cross at this time in reference to a father/son relationship, but to turn the wrath of God from man. He was there as Moses stood before God on behalf of the people who were at the brink of being totally destroyed by God for their rebellion. God said to Moses, “Let Me alone so that My wrath may wax hot against them and that I may consume them” (Ex 32:10; see Dt 9:13,14).

The annihilation of all humanity was nigh unto happening when Jesus was on the cross. In the fullness of His own humanity, Jesus in His incarnate state was an eternal offering for sinful humanity who would be doomed without the cross. He was there to appease the wrath of God in order that God not wipe all humanity from the face of the earth as He did in the days of Noah (Gn 6:7; 7:21). So in these last words, Jesus was not only making the plea of Psalm 22 for Himself, but also for humanity in order that the wrath of God be turned away from those who had a spirit of rebellion, which included all humanity. Paul enlightened us concerning this burden of sin that Jesus took with Him to the cross:

... whom [Jesus] God has set forth to be an atoning sacrifice by His blood through faith in order to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins in the past because of the forbearance of God (Rm 3:25; see Hb 9:15).

The psalmist was in a time of despair when the words of Psalm 22 spilled forth from his heart. And so in this last moment of darkness on the cross, Jesus too wanted to call to those who heard these last words, and later read them in Holy Scripture, that the finality of redemption was being paid by Him with an extreme price. Jesus' cry was a statement of eternal sacrifice which revealed that after the incarnation, it would never again be as it was when the Word was in eternity with God, and as God, before the incarnation. There was a permanency in the incarnation that He would continue throughout eternity in order that He truly be in a personal relationship with His brethren.

It was sin that necessitated such a sacrifice of the One who became sin for us. Through an incarnational sacrifice, God did eternally separate Himself from the form God. For the cause of the cross, the Son gave up being equal with God (See Ph 2:5-11). If we could realize the full impact and extent of His sacrifice, we too should cry out, “Our God, Our God, why have You forsaken Him?” Then we are brought to our knees with overwhelming gratitude because He was forsaken for us.

Paul later wrote, “For He [God] has made Him [Jesus] who knew no sin to be sin on behalf of us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him” (2 Co 5:21). Peter concurred, “He Himself bore our sins in His own body on the tree” (1 Pt 2:24). We have difficulty understanding the metaphor of the moment. Jesus' atoning sacrifice was an eternal assumption of our sin upon Himself who knew no sin. He assumed our punishment for our sins. He was executed on our behalf. It was a time on the cross to let the world know that there would have been a certain eternal separation from God for every individual of humanity if it were not for Jesus who took upon Himself our punishment.

In order that we be reconciled to God, the cross was a moment when Jesus had to be separated from God through His assimilation of our sins in Himself. Only when we stand in the presence of God ourselves will we fully understand the implications of what Jesus meant in being “forsaken by God.” But until that time, we will understand what the Holy Spirit revealed through both Paul and Peter that Jesus assumed the sins of mankind in order that all those who believe might have life in the name of Jesus (Jn 1:12).

E. Last words of humanity:

“After this, Jesus, knowing that all things had now been accomplished, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, said, ‘I thirst’” (Jn 19:28). We reflect on John 1:14 when John revealed that the eternal Word became flesh and dwelt among us as a man. “I thirst” are words that reveal the incarnation of God the Son who became in all ways as a man in order to deliver us from our destiny of doom.

In His suffering as a man, it would only be natural that He would thirst. But there was more in the preceding statement than the natural thirst of one who was in great suffering, and nigh unto death. The statement is a fulfillment of the words of Psalm 69:21. In these last words, Jesus wanted to remind us again that He fulfilled all the prophecies concerning Himself and His kingdom reign. Every detail of prophecy was fulfilled, and thus, in the miracle of fulfilled prophecy all honest people, who would be seeking the true God beyond this world, would indeed conclude as the guard who was standing at the foot of the cross, “Truly this was the Son of God” (Mt 27:54).

F. Last words of finality:

“When Jesus had received the sour wine, He said, ‘It is finished’” (Jn 19:30). What was finished was the plan of redemption. He completed His business. The One who was crucified in prospect before the creation of the world had accomplished His destiny. After Jesus had created the world (Cl 1:16), He rested from His creating work (Gn 2:1,2). And now He had finished His redemption work for those whom He had created. All the prophecies from Genesis 3:15 to the cross had been fulfilled in reference to the eternal plan of redeeming those of His creation who believed.

After the resurrection, and before His ascension, Jesus walked and talked with His disciples in order to remind them of the finality of His eternal plan of redeeming those who believed. Before His ascension, He said to the disciples,

These are the words that I spoke to you while I was still with you, that all things must be fulfilled that were written in the law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms, concerning Me” (Lk 24:44).

At the very beginning of His ministry, Jesus revealed His purpose in reference to the fulfillment of all prophecies concerning His destiny. “Do not think,” He reminded His audience, “that I came to destroy the law or the prophets. I did not come to destroy, but to fulfill” (Mt 5:17).

Once all the prophecies were fulfilled, He brought to finality the Sinai law. It was set aside when the purpose for which it was given was accomplished. So at the time He was on the cross, the Sinai law, as well as all presumptuous and meritorious religious ordinances of men, were terminated. In being nailed to the cross, “He has made [us] alive together with Him, having forgiven us all trespasses” (Cl 2:13). In order to do this on the cross, He wiped “out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us. And He took it out of the way, having nailed it to the cross” (Cl 2:14). He took away all meritorious religious laws that resulted in sin, for no man could keep law perfectly in order to save himself (Rm 3:20; Gl 2:16). And so, the words of Paul are true:

Therefore, my brethren, you also became dead to the [Sinai] law through the body of Christ, so that you should be married to another, even to Him who is raised from the dead, so that we should bring forth fruit to God (Rm 7:4).

In the last words of Jesus from the cross, He had accomplished what He had said only a few hours earlier when He was in prayer to the Father in the garden of Gethsemane: “I have glorified You [Father] on the earth. I have finished the work that You gave Me to do” (Jn 17:4).

G. Last words of trust:

“And crying out with a loud voice, Jesus said, ‘Father, into Your hands I commend My spirit!’” (Lk 23:46). Jesus again quoted from the Psalms in order to remind the people that He had fulfilled prophecy (See Ps 31:5). He not only fulfilled prophecy in reference to what He did in His ministry, but He also fulfilled prophecy in reference to statements that were said in prophecy.

This statement infers that Jesus lived in compliance with the will of the Father throughout His ministry. He was confident in His obedience. He could thus confidently relinquish His spirit into the hands of the Father, whom He trusted could take it from there. We read the same sentiment in the words of Stephen when he was stoned to death by an angry mob: “Lord Jesus, receive my spirit” (At 7:59). After Stephen said these words, “he fell asleep” (At 7:60). And Jesus, after He had uttered His last words, “breathed His last” (Lk 23:46). Both trusted that the Father and Son could assume responsibility of their destiny in eternity.

We see in the final words of Jesus and Stephen their confidence in their final destiny. Such assurance should be characteristic of every disciple who nears his final breath. In our final hours, we seek to have the same confidence as Paul after he had endured tremendous hardships in order to finish his business:

*I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course [business]. I have kept the faith. Finally, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, will give me at that day, and not only to me, but also to all those who have loved His appearing (2 Tm 4:7,8).

When James wrote, “Count it all joy when you fall into various trials,” he was speaking in view of the coming termination of national Israel that would transpire in about five years after he wrote (Js 1:2). Jewish Christians would go through great trials during Rome’s destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Nevertheless, Christians must look beyond their trials. They must understand that all Christians will suffer trials (1 Tm 4:10; 2 Tm 3:12).

JESUS LIVES!

The totality of Christianity depends on the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. If Jesus were not raised from the dead, then we, as Christians, are no better in our faith than those world religions that make no mention of Jesus in their religious documents. And those religions that do consider Jesus to be just another good prophet in a line of prophets, are just as valid as Christianity. It is then true, as Paul wrote, “We are of all men most to be pitied” (1 Co 15:19). We should be pitied because we believe that our Founder was raised from the dead.

It is imperative that the resurrection of Jesus continues to be the validation of Christianity. It is the resurrection that confirms our faith to be the only faith that is accepted by God because its founder is alive and not dead. The fact that He lives is important because our faith would be null and void if Jesus’ body still remained in some hidden tomb in Palestine.

It is this faith that is the unchanging foundation for moral societies. “For the grace of God ... has appeared to all men, teaching us, that ... we should live sensibly, righteously and godly” (Ti 2:11,12). If Jesus is still dead somewhere in a tomb outside Jerusalem, then any moral behavior that society would so choose is justified according to the dictates of society. If He is still in the tomb, then any other teacher or philosopher in the world has a right to offer his own code of morals for social behavior. After WW II when Adolf Eichmann was on trial for genocide, he said at the Nuremburg trials in 1945/46 that Hitler’s genocide of the Jews was right for the times in Europe. If Jesus were not raised from the dead, then there can be no moral argument against the moral code of Nazi Germany at that time in history. If one would seek to live in adultery, then there is no reason to argue against such on the basis of morals. If Jesus was not raised from the dead, it is every society for itself, and every citizen within society for himself.

But if He is alive from the dead, then everything changes. The destiny of each citizen of this world changes. Humanity is on earth for a purpose beyond the thinking, “Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die” (1 Co 15:32). If Jesus were raised from the dead, then eventually “we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that everyone may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad*” (2 Co 5:10).

A. Early documents of the resurrection:

Luke 24:1-9 is significant. At the tomb of Jesus early on Sunday morning, two men in shining clothes made a profound statement to the women who had come to finalize the burial preparations of the crucified Jesus. The two men said, “Why do you seek the living among the dead?” (Lk 24:5). Jesus was “among the dead.” But that was no longer so. And since He was resurrected early on Sunday, He did not hang around the tomb. He was raised and gone. The history of the world changed from that moment on. When that grave stone rolled away from a borrowed tomb, the world rolled into a new paradigm of history.

Throughout the documents of Matthew, Mark, and John, we are privileged to have written testimonies of men who personally walked with Jesus in preparation for the empty tomb. When the writers of these historical documents recorded the final days of Jesus, they made certain that there was more written information about the final days of Jesus than any other man who has lived on earth. But we must keep in mind that the documents of the ministry of Jesus, and particularly His final days, do not explain the resurrection. They lead us to the resurrection. It is the resurrection itself that explains the ministry of Jesus and the final days. Without the resurrection, the witnesses of the ministry of Jesus would be worthless in reference to faith. There would be no reason to believe that Jesus was any more than a clever deceiver if it were not for the resurrection.

B. Prophecy of the resurrection:

Jesus prepared His disciples for the surreal event of His resurrection. His preparation began first with His own statements, and then with a real life illustration through the resurrection of Lazarus (Jn 11).

A little after midway through His ministry, and after He had called on the twelve disciples to agree with the confession of Peter, “You are the Christ, the Son of the living God” (Mt 16:16), Jesus changed in His ministry in reference to His disciples. Matthew explained:

From that time—[the time of the confession of Peter]—Jesus began to show His disciples that He must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things from the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised the third day (Mt 16:21).

Brief revelational lights were being turned on in the disciples' minds even before this paradigm shift in His relational ministry with the twelve. A little more than a year earlier, and upon His first visit to Jerusalem for the Passover, He said to the Jewish religious leaders in Jerusalem, "Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up" (Jn 2:19).

Neither the Jews, nor the disciples, understood what Jesus meant in this statement. In fact, it was many years later when John, who was there at the time Jesus made the statement, explained what Jesus meant. Note what John wrote: "Therefore, when He was risen from the dead, His disciples remembered that He had said this. And they believed the Scripture and the word that Jesus had said" (Jn 2:22).

And then there was Jesus' reference to Jonah. "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the great fish, so will the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth" (Mt 12:40). To the scribes and Pharisees to whom Jesus made this prophecy, the statement was certainly to them senseless talk on the part of Jesus. Nevertheless, as with the disciples, Jesus was also preparing the religious community in Judea for His resurrection that was coming.

It would be from five to six years after the resurrection, and Peter's declaration on Pentecost that Jesus was raised, that "a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith" (At 6:7). For these priests of the religious establishment of Jerusalem, it took some time for the fact of the resurrection to sink in. Nevertheless, it finally did, and the result was that many priests in Jerusalem gave up their salaries as priests of Judaism in order to become disciples of Jesus. The extent of their sacrifice indicated that they truly believed that Jesus was raised from the dead.

The crucifixion of Jesus was no accident as some have claimed. Jesus came with the intention of laying down His life, regardless of whether most of the Jews would accept Him as the Messiah (Jn 1:11). He once said to an inquiring audience, "Therefore, My Father loves Me because I lay down My life so that I may take it up again" (Jn 10:17). And just in case this was not clear, He continued: "No one takes it [My life] from Me, but I lay it down of Myself. I have power to lay it down and I have power to take it up again" (Jn 10:18). And because He took it up again, millions have believed who He said He was. Because of this belief, millions have obeyed the gospel.

C. Centrality of the resurrection:

God would not raise an imposter. Therefore, if Jesus were raised, then we must conclude that He was not an imposter. And if He is not an imposter, then He demands the totality of our lives, for He was the One He said He was, that is, the Son of God.

Jesus, the Son of God, was "declared to be the Son of God with power ... by the resurrection from the dead" (Rm 1:4). The power of the resurrection empowered Jesus to be who He said He was. For this reason, John S. Whale was right: "Belief in the resurrection is not an appendage to the Christian faith; it is the Christian faith." There is no sense in claiming to be a Christian if one does not believe that Jesus was raised from the dead. In fact, there is no reason to claim to be a Christian if Jesus never stepped one foot outside that tomb.

Because the early disciples believed that Jesus was no longer among the dead, their lives were radically changed. The resurrection became the foundation upon which they were moved into all the world. The centrality of their gospel message depended on the resurrection of Jesus, and thus, because Jesus lived, they had a living message of good news.

Though Paul did not personally experience the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, He was convicted by a living Jesus on a road to Damascus. After three days of repentance in the city of Damascus, and finally washing away his sins in baptism, he headed out for Arabia, and then back home to his family in Cilicia. He wrote to the Corinthians,

For I delivered to you first of all that which I also received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that He was buried, and that He rose again on the third day according to the Scriptures (1 Co 15:3,4).

The gospel of the death of Jesus for our sins and His resurrection, was the central message of the early disciples. This gospel validation of the new faith began with Peter on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30. "This Jesus," Peter proclaimed to the thousands on Pentecost, "God has raised up" (At 2:32). Paul later wrote that God "worked in Christ when He raised Him from the dead and seated Him at His own right hand in the heavenly places" (Ep 1:20).

After the crucifixion of Jesus, the disciples were disillusioned. They were disheartened and felt as Peter when he said, "I am going fishing" (Jn 21:3). But after the resurrection, they were going into all the world (Mt 28:19). The gospel of Jesus' death for our sins and His resurrection was their motivation to go into all the world. We are Christians today because those early witnesses to the living Jesus went forth and explained to the world what one of them wrote of the resurrected Jesus in 1 John 1:1:

That which was from the beginning, that we have heard, that we have seen with our eyes, that we have looked upon and our hands have handled, we proclaim concerning the Word of Life.

D. Validation of the resurrection:

Theories to explain away the resurrection actually work to validate the resurrection. There have been some very imaginative theories presented throughout history to explain away the resurrection. All these theories have certainly made us research every angle of possibility that Jesus was not actually raised from the dead. The advantage of all these theories, therefore, is that they have forced us to answer every question that someone might present in order to deny the resurrection.

1. The stolen body theory: This was the first objection to the resurrection immediately after the tomb guards discovered that Jesus had escaped their custody (Mt 28:11-15). The cover-up scheme was invented by the religious leaders in Jerusalem who had actually called for the crucifixion of Jesus.

When the comatose guards at Jesus' tomb reported all that had transpired at the tomb, the Jewish elders "consulted together," and then they gave a large sum of money to the guards (Mt 28:12). They then said that the guards were to lie. "You are to say, 'His disciples came by night and stole Him away while we slept'" (Mt 28:13).

If these were Roman guards, then sleeping on duty incurred the penalty of death. If the disciples did indeed try to steal the body of Jesus, then there would have been a great deal of noise as they rolled back the large stone at the face of the tomb. And then, if the guards were asleep, how would they have known that it was the disciples who stole the body of Jesus?

The cover-up scheme of the Jewish elders is actually proof that something transpired at the tomb. Jesus' body was indeed gone, but they had no answer as to why it disappeared. If the disciples had indeed stolen the body, we would certainly assume correctly that when the heat of persecution later came upon the disciples, someone would have confessed that they had actually stolen the body. But James was willing to die for his belief that Jesus was actually raised (At 12:1,2). Stephen was willing to be stoned to death (At 7:59,60). And the early disciples as a whole were scattered out of Jerusalem because of persecution for their belief in the gospel of the resurrection (At 8:4). If the disciples had actually conspired to steal away the body of Jesus, then we would certainly conclude that such a theory was unlikely.

2. The swoon theory: This may be going to extremes in order to generate a possible reason for the disappearance of the body of Jesus. Nevertheless, it is a theory that has been set forth by some in the past concerning the absence of the body in the tomb. It has been argued that Jesus never really died on the cross. He only lapsed into a coma, or fainted, and then revived later in the coolness of the tomb.

This fanciful theory does not take into consideration the presence of the guards on the outside of the tomb. Neither does it give us an answer as to how a person who was so weakened by crucifixion could roll away a possibly two-ton stone from the entrance of the tomb. And then after moving the stone, sneaking past the guards, He somehow had the strength to walk a great distance to be with the disciples in the city. But we know He did not go to the disciples as a wounded man, for the women came early on first day of the week in order to dress His body properly for final rest. If Jesus had regained consciousness in the tomb and gone to the disciples, then there would have been no reason for the women to go to the tomb early on Sunday morning.

The soldiers who crucified Jesus wanted to make sure that Jesus was indeed dead. There was first the breaking of the legs of the two who were crucified with Jesus in order to hasten their death. But they did not break the legs of Jesus, testifying to the fact that they determined that He was already dead. And then to make sure He was dead, a soldier pierced the side of Jesus with a sword (Jn 19:33,34).

3. The vision theory: This is the supposition that the disciples were so anxious for His resurrection that they hallucinated, or saw a vision of Him being alive. Sometimes theories that deny the resurrection become so ridiculous that they need no consideration. But let us suppose that such were possibly true.

If the theory is true, then there are some real problems. The first obvious problem is that the disciples did not expect the resurrection. They did not understand what Jesus meant when He spoke of His resurrection during His ministry (Jn 2:22). Though Jesus had previously discussed the matter with them, they were despondent after the crucifixion. And despondent people do not conjure up images of Jesus being alive. There is then the testimony of John who wrote many years later of "doubting Thomas" who would not believe unless he had actually put his fingers in the nail holes of Jesus' hands and his hand in His side (See Jn 20:24-29). In conjunction with the testimony of the immediate disciples, Paul added that Jesus appeared at one time to over five hundred people (1 Co 15:6). Did all those people see a vision simultaneously?

Then we must question why the visions ended after the ascension. And if the disciples had actually seen a vision of Jesus, why did not someone in Jerusalem produce the body of Jesus when Peter stood up and proclaimed to several thousand people, “This Jesus God has raised up” (At 2:32). If the body of Jesus was produced, this would certainly have been embarrassing and the end of the apostles’ claim that Jesus had been raised from the dead. It would have been the end of Christianity before it was started. But no body could be produced. There could be no valid denial of the resurrection if no body could be produced.

Thomas Jefferson was the third president of the United States. He was a complete skeptic in reference to anything ever having happened in history that was supernatural. But he honored the moral teachings of Jesus in the Bible. So what does a true naturalist do in order to separate the moral teachings of Jesus from the supernatural events that surrounded His life on earth?

Jefferson eliminated all references to the supernatural in his Bible. He cut these passages out of the Bible, and then published his own Bible, which Bible was called the “Jefferson Bible.” At the close of his Bible, and in reference to the end of the life of Jesus, the Jefferson Bible simply reads, “There they laid Jesus, and rolled a great stone to the mouth of the sepulchre and departed.”

We are sure that Jefferson has since changed his mind on this matter. To Jefferson, that was the end of the story about Jesus, but the story did not end there. The fact that thousands believed immediately after the resurrection is the greatest evidence for the resurrection.

Man-made religions that are based on fables are developed over decades. But Christianity came to life in only one day when thousands believed immediately that Jesus was truly raised from the dead. These thousands were willing to go to their death because they believed that He was alive from the dead (See Rv 2:10).

JESUS’ DISCIPLE!

The Greek word that is translated “disciple” in Matthew 28:19 is a verb. It is thus a word of function with the expectation of results. The word “going” in the same text is a participle. After the disciples of Jesus experienced the gospel of Jesus’ resurrection and ascension, He knew that they were going somewhere to tell everyone they encountered that Jesus was alive, and thus the Savior of the world. They needed no command to go. So in their motivated going because they finally believed (Mk 16:14), their task was to disciple people to Jesus. They were to disciple those to whom they preached the incarnational offering of the Son of God for our sins, His death, and the proof the He continues to live by His resurrection and ascension. The text of Matthew 28:19,20 is all about motivation. They were going forth with the resurrectional power of the gospel in order to motivate people unto being disciples of Jesus.

If the gospel were only facts to be believed, then it would lose its power to change lives. There would be no power in the gospel if it were only about facts and events to be believed. There were indeed facts and events, but the facts and events were the revelation of the heart of God that was crucified on the cross. It was thus this crucifixion for the sins of the world that was the motivation that would persuade people to be disciples of Jesus.

The gospel is first the power of God in reference to our salvational needs (Rm 1:16). However, because it is so powerful in reference to salvational matters, it cuts right to the heart (motives) of the individual (At 2:37). Everyone who believes the gospel, therefore, should respond with action if they truly believe. True belief in the gospel demands a positive response, and that response is discipleship. What Jesus was saying in the text of Matthew 28:19,20 was the same thing He said in Mark 16:15,16. There is no reason to talk about being baptized if there is no belief. Likewise, there can be no baptism into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit if there is no commitment to being a disciple of Jesus. True belief always inspires discipleship.

And then we should add the text of 2 Thessalonians 1:6-9. Paul explained that Jesus is coming again “in flaming fire, taking vengeance on those who do not know God, and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Th 1:8). If one does not believe, he will never respond to the heart of God through obedience to the gospel. Those who do not know God, therefore, will not obey the gospel by being baptized into the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus (Rm 6:3-6). This is exactly what Jesus meant in Mark 16:15. In fact, when we add the commission of Matthew 28:19,20, those who do not know God will not be baptized into an eternal relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. One will not be baptized in the name of God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit whom they do not know. Discipleship, therefore, is knowing the one true and living God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

A. Initial responses to the gospel:

Those on the A.D. 30 Pentecost in Acts 2 first believed the message of the gospel that Peter presented. But because of their belief in the gospel, they were cut to the heart (At 2:37). They were cut to the heart because they discovered the heart of God that they had crucified seven weeks before.

Because they were cut to the very motives of what determined their relationship with God, they responded: “Men and brethren, what will we do?” (At 2:37). The word “do” revealed that they knew that something beyond belief had to take place in their lives. Something drastic had to be done because they had done a drastic deed in crucifying the heart of God. Since they were cut to the heart because of their belief in the message of the gospel, response was demanded. They had to become repentant disciples. Subsequently, an answer to their response of belief was given: “Repent and be baptized every one of you ...” (At 2:38).

Peter informed them that water (baptism) was involved. Being cut to the heart by the gospel meant that their belief must move them to obedience of the gospel, which indeed happened on that memorial day. About 3,000 were discipled to Jesus through faith, and then they received the remission of sins in the waters of baptism (At 2:41). Matthew 28:19,20 and Mark 16:15,16 were enacted on that day for the first time in history in order that repentant believers might escape the coming vengeance of the One whom God raised up to sit at His right hand (2 Th 1:6-9).

B. Discipleship in response to the gospel:

Before we come to the A.D. 30 Pentecost of Acts 2, we must go back to statements that Jesus made during His ministry and before the 3,000 headed for the water. Throughout His ministry of teaching, Jesus was preparing the apostles to give a right answer to those who believed and would respond to the power of the gospel. It is significant to see in the response of those on Pentecost the very things that Jesus previously taught in reference to a response to the gospel. The order of response is important. So we go back about two months before Peter gave the instructions of Acts 2.

Before His ascension, Jesus gave a very significant explanation of what transpired on the day of Pentecost. He gave the following important instructions to a group of apostles who could not wait to go forth and tell everyone that the One in whom they had believed had been raised from the dead:

Going, therefore, disciple all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all things that I have commanded you (Mt 28:19,20).

Their “work order” was important as they went into all the world to preach the gospel. They were first to disciple, then baptize, and then continue teaching. We must not miss the significance of this order. Discipling came before the baptizing. No one’s foot was to step into the water until a commitment had been made to follow Jesus. And no one could truly follow Jesus until they knew the God who would sacrifice His only begotten Son (Jn 3:16).

As stated before, in Matthew 28:19 the Greek word “disciple” is used in its verb form. It is an action word that refers to becoming a follower of Jesus in response to believing the gospel of God’s heart. The apostles in this context were instructed to disciple. Discipling infers that someone is being discipled to follow Jesus in response to their being cut to the heart by the gospel.

An individual is first discipled, and then he does what those on the day of Pentecost were instructed to do (At 2:38,41). In response to the gospel message, one naturally asks what to do. Discipling involves being cut to the heart by the gospel, but it also involves doing something in response to being cut to the heart. In other words, the only outward evidence that we would have of one being cut to the heart would be his or her follow-up of doing what Peter instructed in Acts 2:38. True belief is always signalled to others with a splash in water. Therefore, because of belief one must first make a commitment to be a disciple, and then he or she can put his or her feet in the water. The water must always signal discipleship.

Discipleship does not happen in the water. Before the water, a personal commitment to be a disciple must first be made, and then by immersion in the water God does His part in cleaning up those who are disciples to Jesus (At 22:16). It is not the water first, and then commitment to discipleship. It is not first God's work (remission of sins - At 2:38), and then our commitment. This would change the order of what Jesus instructed. Disciples are baptized into Christ for the remission of sins, and then they are taught. It is not that people are baptized, and then taught to be disciples of Jesus.

C. The motive for discipleship:

So we stay close to the ascension of Jesus and His last instructions to the apostles. On another occasion than that of Matthew 28:19,20, Jesus made a direct statement in reference to the disciples' going forth. "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. He who believes and is baptized will be saved. But he who does not believe will be condemned" (Mk 16:15,16).

Jesus' meaning in this statement is the same as the Matthew 28 commission, but another motive on the road to discipleship is added. Belief is the motivation. The emphasis of the Mark 16 commission indicates that these instructions were made before the Matthew 28 commission. In other words, Jesus first emphasized belief, and then He spoke of that which belief must motivate, that is, discipleship.

In the Matthew 28 account, the "going" was assumed since the Greek word is a participle. In the Mark 16 commission, "going" is also a participle. Both accounts assume that the disciples had been motivated to go into all the world with the message of the gospel in order to generate belief and discipleship.

What is significant in the Mark 16 commission is that the disciples are specifically commanded to "preach the gospel." In the Matthew 28 record, it is assumed that they would, for the gospel was the motivation for their "going." It is thus the gospel that is the motive for discipleship, and thus, the continuation of the instructions that Jesus gave personally to the eleven at the time of both the Matthew 28 and Mark 16 commission. It is the gospel that cuts people to the heart.

And thus it was the gospel that Peter preached on the A.D. 30 Pentecost that motivated the people to act on what they had heard. Add to this the realization that those Jews on Pentecost finally began to know the true God of heaven who had a heart for all people, not just the Jews (At 10:34,35; 2 Pt 3:9). This God did not want anyone to perish, including the Gentiles. Being cocooned in their own Judaism, this was the God of love they did not fully understand. He was the God who so loved the entire world that He gave His only begotten Son, the very Son for whom they had called to be crucified (Jn 3:16).

Discipleship to Jesus assumes that people believe the gospel that is preached. It assumes that one discovers the true heart of God, and in doing so, discovers the one true and living God. As in the Matthew 28 instructions, belief and discipleship all take place before one can come into an eternal relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

In the Mark 16 instructions, Jesus added a greater explanation in reference to one's response to the preached gospel. If one does not believe the message of the gospel, then certainly he will not be discipled to Jesus. And if he is not discipled to Jesus, then certainly he will keep his feet out of the water. He will not obey the gospel (See 2 Th 1:8).

If there is no belief, then there will be no request as those on Pentecost: "Men and brethren, what will we do?" Or in the words of the Ethiopian eunuch, "See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized" (At 8:36). There is no cutting to the heart if there is no understanding of the God who gave His incarnate Son for the sins of the world. Without this belief that cuts to the heart, there is no need for water, for one is not committed to being a disciple of Jesus if his belief is not strong enough to move him to respond to the God who gave of Himself for us.

In one statement Jesus prepared everyone for Him to be the medium through whom all who hear the gospel will know God: "And this is life eternal, that they might know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent" (Jn 17:3). One can have eternal life only by knowing, and responding to the only true God. One can know this God only through Jesus Christ who was sent into the world. Therefore, only if one believes on Jesus Christ can he or she know God, and thus respond to the gospel. Only through obedience to this gospel can one come into the eternal life that is offered through Jesus. It was for this reason that the Holy Spirit proclaimed through Peter, "And there is salvation in no other, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved" (At 4:12).

D. Responses to the gospel:

This brings us to how quickly the gospel can impact the heart of an individual. The religious condition of the heart of the one to whom the gospel is preached often determines how soon he or she will respond to the gospel. For some in the first century, the response was the "same hour of the night." But for others, as many priests in Jerusalem, it took three or four years before they came to terms with the reality of the resurrection of Jesus and what such would mean in their lives. They had to transition their thinking concerning who God was.

He was not a God of law and condemnation. He was a God of love who was extending His heart to all men through the grace of the cross.

1. The Pentecost response to the gospel: It was early in the morning on the A.D. 30 Pentecost when eleven of the apostles stood up to lay the groundwork for what Peter would conclude (At 2:13,14). We are not told how long the eleven preached before Peter stood up. But with the privilege of the “keys” to unlock entrance into the kingdom reign of Jesus (Mt 16:18,19), Peter stood up and affirmed the gospel message that Jesus was the Messiah (Christ) who fulfilled all prophecy in reference to the Messiah (See Lk 24:44). He was now reigning from heaven on David’s throne (At 2:14-35). Peter reminded the stunned Jewish audience that the One for whom they had been waiting for centuries was the One they had seven weeks before crucified on a cross (At 2:36). This Jesus was now Lord over all things (Mt 28:18; Ep 1:20-23).

In this case, the response to discipleship of about 3,000 was immediate. That very day those who believed, obediently went to the water to wash away their sins (At 2:41). If Peter’s announcement came at midday, then by the end of the day about 3,000 disciples had obeyed the gospel. Those who responded “were devout men out of every nation under heaven” (At 2:5). They were Jews who had traveled from many distant nations in order to be in Jerusalem for the annual Passover/Pentecost feast. When they heard the liberating message of the gospel, therefore, their response was immediate.

Because of their long journey to Jerusalem, they had proved their discipleship of the Father. In only a few hours, and with one message of the gospel, they transferred their discipleship to the One who was at that time seated in heaven on the throne of David. So by the close of the day, about 3,000 had made this paradigm shift from the kingship of the Father to the kingship of the Son (See Cl 1:13).

2. A jailor’s response to the gospel: Paul and Silas ended up in jail in Philippi. They sat in cold jail cells singing gospel songs, with an audience that was intently listening to the message of the songs and their prayers (At 16:25). An earthquake occurred, and the doors of the jail cells were thrown open (At 16:26). The jailor, who was trembling with fear, “fell down before Paul and Silas” (At 16:29). He, as well as the prisoners, had heard the gospel message of the songs, and the prayers of both Paul and Silas. So he asked, “Sirs, what must I do to be saved?” (At 16:30). Paul gave an answer that one would naturally give to a religious idolater. It was an answer that was given after the instructions of Jesus’

Mark 16:15 commission. It was the first step to discipleship: “Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you and your household will be saved” (At 16:31). So that same hour of the night, “he was baptized, he and all his household” (At 16:33).

It took the jailor only a short time to hear and respond to the gospel. In the same hour of the night when Paul and Silas were released from their jail cells, he and his household obeyed the gospel. He first believed, as Jesus had before stated (Mk 16:15,16). He was then baptized because he had chosen to be a disciple of Jesus that very night. His commitment to discipleship assumed that he was previously a very religious person, as well as all his household.

3. The eunuch’s response to the gospel: As the Ethiopian eunuch returned from worshiping in Jerusalem, he was reading the gospel message of Isaiah 53. He had surely encountered some Christians in Jerusalem who were teaching the gospel daily in the temple courtyard (At 2:46; 5:42). He was thus confused concerning the One about whom Isaiah had prophesied (At 8:34). When a gospel preacher walked up from the desert, the opportunity to hear about Jesus presented itself to a very religious person (At 8:35). Philip “preached Jesus to him” (At 8:35).

We do not know how long the teaching carried on as the two continued to travel down the road in the chariot. But in reference to the religious nature of the eunuch, we must remember that he had traveled all the way from Ethiopia in order to worship in Jerusalem. He was as those devoted Jews who had traveled hundreds of kilometers to be in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost. He was a very dedicated person, and thus his discipleship to the Father was likewise transferred to the Son after his encounter with Philip. Once this transfer was made in his mind, it was then that he was ready for the water. “Now as they went along the road they came to some water. And the eunuch said ‘See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized?’” (At 8:36).

It did not take the eunuch long to decide to respond to the gospel. He evidently knew all the prophecies. Philip only connected all the dots between the prophecies and Jesus. In Jerusalem, when the Christians taught that Jesus was the Messiah, the eunuch began his process of becoming a disciple. Philip only concluded what the eunuch needed to have reconfirmed, that Isaiah’s prophecy was about Jesus. It was then “that they both went down into the water, both Philip and the eunuch, and he baptized him” (At 8:38).

4. Saul’s response to the gospel: For a few years after the A.D. 30 Pentecost, Saul led a vehement attack against the disciples. All the time he was leading disciples to prison, he was listening to their testimonies that Jesus was the Messiah. But Saul fought against this belief. Though he knew what the Christians taught, he refused to accept the testimony of those whom he persecuted.

However, on a Damascus road it was time for the light to come on in the mind of Saul. A great light appeared from heaven and he fell to the ground. After regaining his senses, he asked, “Who are you, Lord?” (At 9:5). The answer was the beginning of his transformation to becoming a disciple of Jesus. “I am Jesus whom you are persecuting,” the voice answered (At 9:5). He was instructed by Jesus to go on to Damascus and wait. So he went and waited. He waited for three days (At 9:9). It was only after three days that the Lord sent Ananias, who came and said to Saul, “And now why are you waiting? Arise and be baptized and wash away your sins” (At 22:16).

Jesus gave Saul three days to make a mental paradigm shift from persecuting Jesus to preaching Jesus. It was only after Saul/Paul had made the commitment to be a disciple of Jesus that he submitted to the water in order to wash away his sins. Before he even came close to the water, Jesus wanted Saul, in blindness, to rethink all his past life and to consider all the persecution that was before him (At 9:15,16). He needed to commit to being a disciple before being baptized into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

5. The priests’ response to the gospel: About five to six years after the A.D. 30 Pentecost, a very significant historical response to the gospel happened in Jerusalem that was recorded by Luke in Acts 6:7: “So the word of God increased. And the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. And a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith.”

Throughout the years that followed the A.D. 30 Pentecost, there were many priests, as Nicodemus, who were contemplating the fact that Jesus was the Christ, and thus the Savior of the world. They simply could not explain away the resurrection of Jesus. However, because of the social pressures of the Jewish establishment, it took them a great deal of time to decide to become disciples of Jesus.

We must not underestimate the commitment of these many priests who became disciples of Jesus. Being Levitical priests under the Sinai law, they would have been supported by the religious establishment at the time. But when they made the decision to become disciples of Jesus, they became disciples of the One who nailed the Sinai law to the cross (See Cl 2:14). Jesus nailed their financial source of income to the cross. In other words, the cost of their discipleship cost them their jobs. When Jesus said, “Whoever of you who does not forsake all that he has, cannot be My disciple,” these priests took a long time to consider this point (Lk 14:33). We would suppose that they had some lengthy discussions with their wives before they made their way to the water. It may have taken them a great deal of time to secure other work in order to support their families before they made the final commitment to be disciples of Jesus. Regardless of their financial struggles, they made the commitment, and then headed to the water.

The cost of discipleship can be great. For this reason, anyone who would seek to be a disciple of Jesus must seriously count the cost. Jesus’ lengthy discussion on counting the cost of discipleship in Luke 14:25-35 infers that one not make a hasty decision to step in the water. Discipleship involves a tremendous commitment on the part of some, depending on one’s existing circumstances at the time he or she initially hears the gospel. But regardless of the cost, no price is too high in comparison to that which one will eventually receive in eternal glory (See Rm 8:18).

JESUS GOES VIRAL!

Jesus encouraged His disciples to live the gospel of His incarnational offering before a world that was in the throes of spiritual death (Mt 5:16; Ph 2:5-9). While living in a world without hope, He encouraged them to give hope through His resurrection, ascension, and the fact that He was coming again for all those who had in His name believed and were baptized into a relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. This was gospel living according to His glorious gospel that He had brought into the world. Their lives were thus the gospel message that would turn the world upside down (See At 17:6).

The same is continuing today. In 1979, C. Peter Wagner and Edward R. Dayton published a book entitled Unreached Peoples, ‘79. At the time when the book was published (1979), the authors said of the four billion people living on earth, “One billion people name Jesus as Lord. One billion people may have heard of Him. Two billion people have never heard His name.”

Since that time the world population has grown to over seven billion people. The good news is that today almost the entire world of over seven billion people have heard the name of Jesus.

It is true that the ingenuity of men will lead to the invention of all sorts of things that will make a profit for man. But we must not forget that in the area of news media and information flow, the inventions of men have accelerated the Christian's opportunity to preach the name of Jesus throughout the world. The printing press was invented, and subsequently newspapers were printed and distributed locally to propagate information. But newspapers were also used by Christians to get the gospel message to the people. Then came the radio. The preaching of the gospel through radio messages moved gospel preachers beyond local regions and into states and nations. National radio broadcasts allowed the preachers of the gospel to broadcast the message of the gospel to millions. Then came television. The gospel through this news media was also used to proclaim the gospel to the masses. But none of these previous mediums of mass media have matched the opportunity of the Internet to take the gospel to billions of people.

The Internet has become the media vehicle through which a single disciple of Jesus can reach millions. Not only is the gospel preached to millions, and disciples made, but the Internet is a unique and inexpensive medium by which baptized disciples can be taught "all things that I have commanded you" (Mt 28:20). Through this media alone, the name of Jesus is being held high before an unbelieving world. We can truly say today that we are living in the ideal world for evangelism by which the company of God's saints can reach the entire world.

At the time of this writing there are over two billion people who are registered on Facebook alone. Facebook was originally "invented" by those who wanted to bring friends and family together in communication with one another. But for the disciple of Jesus, "posts" to friends and family on Facebook timelines are being used by thousands to preach Jesus and His word.

God made it possible for the "invention" of electronic media as smartphones, computers, websites, Facebook, Snapchat, blogging, etc. so that we as Christians might be able to influence our friends, families, and the whole world for Jesus. These electronic means of communication allow us the opportunity to be moved into all the world to every creature by bringing all the world into our own homes. World evangelism is now possible by the click of a mouse.

The following are some reasons why Christians, in following Jesus as His disciples, should be using every means to go into all the world:

A. Jesus moved the gospel beyond the limitations of the first recipients.

When Jesus was personally with His disciples, He sent them out on many "limited commissions." Their audience was limited to those to whom Jesus first came into the world with the gospel message. "But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6).

Those days are long gone. The billions of the world today exemplify how limited that commission was and how vast ours is. However, at that time Jesus knew what He was doing. When God wants to do big things, He always starts small. In the beginning, He started with only two people to populate an entire world. He started with only eleven disciples—one of them dropped out—in order to accomplish the global commissions of Matthew 28:19,20 and Mark 16:15,16. These two texts of commission moved the disciples beyond Israel and far into all the world. Though during His early ministry Jesus limited the disciples to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel," by the time of His ascension, He had given them a worldwide mission.

Immediately after His resurrection, the disciples made the long journey back to Galilee (Mt 28:16). They went there "to the mountain which Jesus had designated" (Mt 28:16). At the time when Jesus came to them, some immediately fell down and worshiped Him even as He approached them from a distance. But some did not recognize (believe) that it was Jesus Himself coming to them. The Greek word in Matthew 28:18 that is simply translated "came" in some versions, actually means to "come near." Jesus came near to them in order to erase all doubt that it was truly Him who lived. It was then that He turned a limited commission into a worldwide endeavor to preach the gospel to the entire world. Once the surreal experience of His resurrection had finally sunk in, they were motivated to go tell others that He was alive.

B. Jesus moved the world under His authority through the gospel.

Daniel had prophesied the foundation upon which Jesus had the right to commission His saints to disciple the entire world unto His kingdom reign. In a vision, Daniel saw "One like the Son of Man" (Dn 7:13). This Son of Man ascended to the Father in heaven. "And there was given Him dominion and glory and sovereignty, so that all peoples, nations and languages should serve Him" (Dn 7:14).

Those on the day of Pentecost in A.D. 30 recalled Daniel's prophecy when Peter reminded them: "This Jesus God has raised up” (At 2:32). “Therefore, let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ” (At 2:36). When this statement was made by Peter, Jesus had been raised and was seated at the right hand of God in heavenly places (Hb 8:1). He was at the time of Peter’s proclamation, reigning with all authority over all things (Ep 1:20-23). He went to be crowned as King of kings and was seated on the throne of David. He was there waiting for the official announcement on earth by the apostle Peter, which announcement was made on that A.D. 30 Pentecost.

During His early ministry, Jesus was a king in prospect for His coronation. He knew that He was headed for the throne of David at the right hand of God (See Mt 11:27; Jn 3:35; 13:3; 17:2). Because He knew that all things had been given into His hand, He spoke to the people with the authority of a king (Mt 7:29; 9:6). When He ascended to the Father in fulfillment of the Daniel 7:13,14 prophecy, He assumed the ministry of exercising the authority of a reigning king (See Jn 12:48). He is now Lord of lords, and King of all kings (1 Tm 6:15). All who would be obedient subjects of His kingdom reign over all things must obey the gospel.

While yet on earth at the end of His ministry, Jesus came to the disciples on the occasion of Matthew 28:18 with an announcement of His kingdom reign. He came with the authority to mandate a worldwide commission. It was after this encounter with the disciples that He ascended to the Ancient of Days in fulfillment of the Daniel 7 prophecy. Paul later reminded the saints in Colosse of the galactic authority that Jesus assumed and began to exercise when He was seated at the right hand of the Father: “And He is above all things and by Him all things hold together” (Cl 1:17).

The French philosopher Rousseau wrote in Emilius and Sophia, “Yes, if the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God.” In all the skepticism of Rousseau against the religion of his day, at least he was right on this point.

While on earth, Jesus led men to confess, “You are the Christ, the Son of the living God” (Mt 16:16). As the Son of God, He lived without sin, for sin could be committed only against God (Hb 4:15). As God on earth, therefore, He personally forgave sin in order that we “may know that the Son of Man has authority on earth to forgive sins” (Mt 9:6).

While on earth, He had the authority to unleash at will the power of the supernatural, knowing that only God has such power. Our conclusion of His earthly ministry is the same as that which Nicodemus confessed: “Rabbi, we know that You are a teacher come from God, for no one can do these signs that You do unless God is with him” (Jn 3:2; See Jn 10:38; At 2:22).

During His ministry on earth, Jesus taught with the authority of God’s word, for only God could speak with such authority (See Mt 7:28,29; 13:54; 22:33). In considering the life and ministry of Jesus, we too, conclude as C. S. Lewis concluded his bestselling book entitled Mere Christianity:

A man who was merely a man and said the sort of things Jesus said would not be a great moral teacher. He would either be a lunatic on a level with the man who says he is a poached egg, or else he would be the Devil of Hell. You must make your choice. Either this man was, and is, the Son of God; or else a madman or something worse. You can shut Him up for a fool, you can spit at Him and kill Him as a demon; or you can fall at His feet and call Him Lord and God.

C. Jesus moved the world into Christ by moving the gospel into all the world.

The word “going” in Matthew 28:19 is not only a participle, it is an aorist participle. It could thus be translated “having gone.” The instructions of Jesus in the context in reference to discipling those of the world is based on the fact that the disciples of Jesus were taking the initiative to go into all the world. Since the participle of the verse is contingent on the main verb, “make disciples,” which is aorist, the mood of the verb can be nothing but imperative. And so the Holy Spirit wanted us to understand the imperative of the mission that Jesus had for His disciples. Since the disciples were moving into all the world with the good news of the gospel, it was imperative that they speak the gospel that they had experienced. They must do this in order to produce disciples who would commit to living the gospel in their relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Since the gospel of Jesus had transformed their lives, Jesus commissioned them to preach the same gospel to change the lives of millions.

We must understand Matthew 28:19,20 on the foundation of conversion to a gospel life-style. By limiting our understanding to being “legally baptized,” we often miss the point that in the context Jesus was emphasizing relationships. He stated that before one could be baptized into (Gr., eis) a relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, he or she had to first be discipled into a relationship with Jesus through the gospel. The Greek word “into” (eis) in the passage is not the word “in” (en), as in baptized in the name of Jesus (At 2:38). Eis emphasizes being brought into a connective relation- ship with the one to whom one is discipled. When people are discipled into a relationship with Jesus through the gospel, it is only natural that through obedience to the gospel in baptism they connect in a relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

The urgency of the disciples' mission was that they had the gospel message of a Savior unto whom they were to disciple people. And thus, their message was a saving message of bringing people into an eternal relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. The message was that Jesus was born to be the Savior of the world (Lk 2:10,11). He ministered the gospel message of Himself throughout Palestine that He was the Savior of all those who would believe on Him (Mt 4:23; Lk 19:10; Jn 10:20). As the Savior, He taught the people about living the gospel (Jn 6:68). As a redeeming Savior, He offered Himself on the cross in order to bring His people into eternal dwelling with Himself (Jn 4:42; 1 Pt 2:24; 1 Jn 4:14). We would conclude that He lived without sin in order to have the purity to take upon Himself as the Savior, the sins of all those who would be born again into the realm of His redemption (Jn 3:3-5).

All that Jesus was in His incarnational revelation from heaven was that He be the redeeming Savior of the world. Through His fulfillment of all prophecy in reference to God being with us, He was proved to be the Savior of the world (Lk 24:44). He was proved to be a humble Savior by His lowly birth. Worn and torn sandals from trudging the pathways of Palestine revealed that He was a sincere Savior. Overcoming those who were resistant to His gospel message proved that He was a determined Savior. But it was through an open and empty tomb that He was proven to be a living Savior. When Frank Morison concluded the book, Who Moved the Stone, he made a profound conclusion:

There may be, as the writer thinks, then certainly is, a deep and profoundly historical basis for the much disputed sentence in the Apostles' Creed: "The third day he rose again from the dead."

The tomb, therefore, was not the end of Jesus' story. It was only a stopover for the Savior of the world on His way back to the place from where He came in order to mediate as our great high priest (Rm 8:26; 1 Tm 2:5; Hb 7:25).

D. Jesus moved the world into a new hope through the preaching of the gospel.

It was as Paul wrote to a gospel preacher: "Paul, an apostle of Christ Jesus by the commandment of God our Savior and the Lord Christ Jesus who is our hope" (1 Tm 1:1). The Lord Christ Jesus is the One unto whom we "have fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us" (Hb 6:18). We have all fled to this hope because "this hope we have as an anchor of the soul" (Hb 6:19). Therefore, we walk "in hope of eternal life which God, who cannot lie, promised before time began" (Ti 1:2). Jesus is the only valid hope for a hopeless world.

Nevertheless, it is too often as an old religious woman told a newly arrived missionary to her village,

How long is it since Jesus died for sinful people? Look at me; I am old; I have prayed, given alms, gone to the holy shrines, become as dust from fasting and all this is useless. Where have you been all this time?

The old woman was as the proverb says, "Hope deferred makes the heart sick" (Pv 13:12). Too many times we have "deferred" hope from being preached to all the world because of our own indifference, or possibly because of our own lack of hope.

Because of the news of the gospel, however, those who have a hopeless end have the opportunity to enjoy an endless hope. Since hope is the bread that brings life to spiritually poor people, then the Bread of Life is the only hope for a spiritually famished world. The hope that Jesus had given to the disciples motivated them to go into all the world. It was a hope that was beyond this world. Paul reminded the Christians in Rome, "Now may the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, so that you may abound in hope in the power of the Holy Spirit" (Rm 15:13). Christians must be reminded that there is hope "laid up for you in heaven" (Cl 1:5). They must not forget "the hope of the gospel" that they have obeyed (Cl 1:23). When we live the gospel, we are moved into all the world in order to share our hope with others. (The next time you are on your Facebook page, you must remember that you have an opportunity to share your hope of eternal life with your family and friends.)

The hope of the gospel is that Jesus is alive from the dead. Notice how Peter explained how the disciples first had their hopes dashed because of the crucifixion, but later revived again through the resurrection of Jesus: "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who ... has begotten us again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1 Pt 1:3).

Theirs, as well as our hope, is living because He is living. It is this hope of eternal life that creates within us the motivation to share the gospel of hope with others. Since there is hope of eternal life only in Jesus, the disciples of Jesus were moved into all the world (See At 4:12). The same happens today when the disciples of Jesus revive their living hope. When our hope is revived, then comes the inquiries from the world that has no hope. Peter explains:

But sanctify Christ as Lord God in your hearts and be ready always to give a defense to everyone who asks you a reason for the hope that is in you, yet with meekness and fear (1 Pt 3:15).

E. Jesus moved the disciples to preach the gospel of hope to every ethnic group.

When Jesus commissioned His disciples to disciple “all the nations,” He actually used the Greek term that referred to ethnic groups. Ethnic groups are at least defined by different languages and cultures. There are over 32,000 such groups throughout the world today. The urgency of the commission, therefore, was that the disciples disciple, not simply nations with government borders, but all the ethnic groups that may be encompassed within those borders.

For example, there are over 140 languages and dialects in the country of Angola. Therefore, according to the commission of Jesus there are over 140 ethnic groups within Angola that must hear the hope of the gospel. In His commission of Mark 16:15, Jesus was even more specific. Every creature within every ethnic group must have the opportunity to hear the gospel of hope.

We have sometimes emphasized the mandate of the commissions of Matthew 28:19,20 and Mark 16:15,16 to the point of ignoring the strategic importance of those to whom the saints of God must go. As stated before in the grammatical construction of the words, Jesus assumed that the disciples were going forth with the great news of the gospel that they had personally heard and experienced. But in the context of the two recorded commissions, Jesus wanted to direct the disciples’ attention to those to whom they were to go. He wanted to make sure that they did as Paul reminded the Corinthians in his going to Achaia: “For Christ did not send me to baptize, but to preach the gospel” (1 Co 1:17). Baptizing on the part of the one being sent is easy. Baptizing results from preaching the gospel. But discipling every creature of every ethnic group in all the world before baptizing them is very challenging.

We must not lose our focus in our joy over baptizing people into Christ. Our priority is the gospel. Our message is the gospel. Our outreach is to disciple to Jesus those to whom we preach the gospel. The motivation by which people obey the gospel in baptism is the gospel. We are thus gospel preachers who disciple people to Jesus because they have believed the gospel. Those who believe the gospel are disciplined to Jesus, and then obey the gospel in baptism.

J. B. Phillips, in his book, New Testament Christianity, wrote a chapter of fiction in the book that was entitled, “The Visited Planet.” Phillips presented the situation where an older and younger angel were traveling at light speed throughout the galaxies. The older angel was introducing the younger angel to all the galaxies that were created by the Creator, but particularly he referred to one unique planet.

The younger angel questioned, “What is that little speck of dust circling that little star?”

The older angel replied, “Don’t speak despairingly of that planet. It’s the visited planet.”

The younger angel was taken aback and questioned, “You mean that’s where He went .... That’s where the light went out but came back stronger.”

As the two angels sped beyond that galaxy to another, the younger angel looked back and said, “Think of it, the visited planet.”

And that is our message that moves us into all the world. Jesus was not just a good teacher. He was Deity who visited this planet for the purpose of opening a door for every creature to find his or her way into eternity. And now, we know how to answer the Holy Spirit’s penetrating questions that He wrote to all who have obeyed the gospel:

How then will they call on Him in whom they have not believed? And how will they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? And how will they hear without a preacher? And how will they preach unless they are sent? (Rm 10:14,15).

The aged gospel preacher, H. Leo Boles, of the early part of the last century, wrote and published a commentary in 1911 on the book of Matthew. When he came to his comments of Jesus’ commission of Matthew 28, he wrote,

He [Jesus] has all authority, all power, all wisdom, and he now gives to his disciples an aggressiveness in evangelizing the world for him. They are to “make disciples of all the nations,” that is, they are to “disciple” “all the nations”; that is, they are to preach the gospel and teach the people. To disciple a person to Christ is to lead that one to become a follower of Christ, to be a learner in his school, to be obedient to his commands, to become a Christian. To “make disciples” means to give all kinds of instruction for entrance into the church of our Lord (H. Leo Boles, Commentary on Matthew, 1911).

JESUS IS KING!

When the king controls all things through the power of his word, then the subjects throughout the kingdom have peace of mind, regardless of the activities of the rebellious subjects of the kingdom. Faithful subjects have peace of mind as that which was described by David:

God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore we will not fear, though the earth is removed and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea, though its waters roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with its swelling (Ps 46:1-3; see Ph 4:7).

Jesus made a final encouraging statement to His disciples who were going into the midst of great persecution. His statement of Matthew 28:18 would reassure them that He had everything under control: “All authority has been given to Me in heaven and earth.”

There is no authority that is outside the control of the authority that Jesus now has, for He is “far above all principality and power and might and dominion and every name that is named, not only in this age, but also in that which is to come” (Ep 1:21). It is a tremendous relief to know this!

We often think too much about earthly kings and kingdoms when we consider the statements concerning the kingship of Jesus and His reign over His galactic empire. We have a difficult time thinking beyond the metaphor of earthly kingdoms. We are sure that Mary, the mother of Jesus, had a very limited, if not earthly understanding of what Gabriel announced to her concerning the coming birth of Jesus:

And behold, you will conceive in your womb and bring forth a Son. And you will call His name JESUS. He will be great and will be called the Son of the Most High. And the Lord God will give to Him the throne of His father David. And He will reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of His kingdom there will be no end (Lk 1:31-33).

At least Pilate had no understanding of the extent of the kingship of Jesus when he asked Jesus, “Are you the King of the Jews?” (Jn 18:33). In answer to Pilate’s question, Jesus made a statement that neither Pilate, nor most of his generation, ever understood: “My kingdom is not of this world” (Jn 18:36).

A metaphor is the use of an earthly word to refer to something greater than that which is of this earth. In Jesus’ answer to Pilate that His kingdom was not of this world, He could not have been more definitive of the spiritual and heavenly nature of His kingdom.

There are those today who are in hope that Jesus will come to this world again for the purpose of establishing some earthly kingdom. But they ignore what Jesus said to Pilate. If Jesus were to come to this speck of galactic dust to reign as a king, then we would certainly conclude that He would give up His present vast kingdom reign with all authority over all galaxies. (Sometimes the carnality of our hopes is revealed through carnally oriented dreams that we will join Jesus in some reign over our enemies.)

When Jesus informed Pilate that His kingdom was not of this world, then we must conclude that Jesus’ kingship would never be earthly. Pilate, as well as all earthly kings, could continue to reign and govern with the sword over physical kingdoms. Jesus would take control only of the hearts of those He would encourage to honor the powers that existed with earthly kings (See Rm 13:1-7). The nature, glory and extent of Jesus’ kingdom, however, reaches far beyond any kingdom of this world.

Our encouragement comes from understanding the nature of Jesus’ present kingdom reign, and influence His reign has in our hearts. When we understand the totality of Jesus’ present reign in the hearts of the obedient, then we understand that the coming King is coming again for obedient subjects who have labored faithfully to the glory of the King. He is not coming to initiate another earthly kingdom. He is coming to deliver His subjects from all earthly kingdoms in order that they enjoy the eternal peace of God in a heavenly kingdom.

A. The nature of Jesus’ present kingdom reign:

David’s prophecy of Psalm 110:1 was a bright light, yet not clearly understood by many Jews in the first century, that the coming kingdom that God would establish would be based on heavenly authority. It would have heavenly origins, and thus be heavenly in nature: “The Lord said to my Lord, ‘Sit at my right hand until I make Your enemies Your footstool.’”

In Daniel 7, Daniel was also privileged with kingdom information in order to prepare the Israelites for a heavenly understanding of something that was coming. The Son of Man would ascend unto the Ancient of Days (God) where He would be given kingdom reign (Dn 7:13,14). According to all prophecies in the Old Testament, kingdom reign would be in heaven and not on this earth.

While Jesus was on earth, He was an uncrowned King who was yet to receive His coronation at the right hand of the Father. But when He ascended to the right hand of the Father according to the prophecies of both David and Daniel, He was the crowned King who now reigns over all things. He is now the Lord of the lords of this world, and the King of all kings of this world (1 Tm 6:15; Rv 17:14).

On the day of Pentecost in Acts 2, Peter proclaimed that Jesus revealed the right of Jesus to be Lord and Christ when the Father raised Him up to seat Him on the throne of David. Gabriel’s promise to Mary was fulfilled. God the Father had sworn to David “with an oath that of the fruit of his body, He would seat one on his throne” (At 2:30). Peter continued to remind the Jews on Pentecost of this oath to David. “This Jesus,” Peter affirmed, “God has raised up” (At 2:32). Jesus was exalted to “the right hand of God” (At 2:33).

What those with carnal hopes fail to understand is that the kingdom of Jesus was never meant to be of this world. The authority of David’s throne was always with God in heaven. In other words, David had no authority on earth that was outside the authority of God from heaven. And when Jesus ascended to the right hand of God in heaven, He ascended to the authority of the throne of David that was always in heaven. The kingdom of Jesus, therefore, has always been spiritual. Some Christians in Rome may have forgotten this fact about the true nature of the kingdom of Jesus. Paul wrote to them, “For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit” (Rm 14:17).

A spiritual kingdom is maintained by spiritual means. Carnal swords have no place in a spiritual kingdom. On the contrary, it is as Jesus explained in John 18:36. Love is the “power” that reigns among those who are subjects of Jesus’ spiritual kingdom: “A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another; as I have loved you, that you also love one another” (Jn 13:34). Love would be the identity of those who would be obedient subjects of the kingdom reign of Jesus. Jesus continued, “By this [love of one another] will all men know that you are My disciples” (Jn 13:35). The power of the kingdom reign of Jesus is unleashed through the power of the subjects’ love for one another.

The spiritual nature of the subjects of the kingdom of Jesus is defined by love. And for this reason, there are no geographical borders, no carnal identities, and no limitations of how obedient subjects of the kingdom of Jesus influence the world in which they live. The power of the kingdom is through love.

When Jesus reigns in the hearts of men on earth as He reigns in heaven, then the kingdom reign of Jesus manifests itself on earth (See Mt 6:9,10). This is a spiritual manifestation that is not revealed through carnal means. This is what Jesus meant in the following statement: “The kingdom of God does not come with observation” (Lk 17:20). He was preparing His disciples during His ministry not to expect the arrival of His kingdom to be as the establishment of earthly kingdoms. For this reason, Jesus continued to explain to some inquiring Pharisees, “Nor will they say, ‘Look here!’ Or, ‘Look there!’ For behold, the kingdom of God is within you” (Lk 17:21).

Christians now reign in life with Jesus because of His love that reigns in their hearts (Rm 5:17). As Christians live the gospel of love in their hearts, the only manifestation of the presence of Jesus’ kingdom reign on earth is the loving light that shines forth from those who are motivated to do that which is good to all men (Gl 6:10). As they were loved by Jesus through the cross, obedient subjects are moved by love to serve others. It is in their service of others that others know that Jesus is their King.

B. The glory of Jesus’ kingdom reign in our hearts:

Not only was kingdom reign to be given to the One who ascended to the Ancient of Days in Daniel’s prophecy, but He would also be given glory (Dn 7:14). The Son of God “is the brightness of His glory” (Hb 1:3). The Father “crowned Him with glory and honor” (Hb 2:7). Jesus was “crowned with glory and honor, so that He by the grace of God might taste death for everyone” (Hb 2:9). Therefore, He “was counted worthy of more glory than Moses” because He built the house of God on earth with His incarnational offering of Himself for the sins of the world (Hb 3:3; see 1 Tm 3:15).

In the second century, a Greek philosopher and antagonist of Christianity named Celsus said to Christians of his era, “What new thing has Christ given to the world?” The Christians of his time replied, “He gave Himself.”

Jesus came into the world with great teachings that uplifted humanity. However, if He were not raised from the dead, His teachings mean no more than those teachings of others who would offer their suggestions for good moral living as Confucius, Buddha or Muhammad. Jesus’ teachings through the hand of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John would only be dead letters if it were not for one historical fact. That fact is that Jesus is not in a grave as all other religious teachers. He is alive and reigning at the right hand of God. Because He was glorified through His conquest over the grave, His teachings rise to the highest standard by which men should direct their lives. Since He was raised, His teachings supercede all the teachings of philosophers and religious leaders of all history. In fact, Jesus authorized His own teachings as the authority by which one will be eternally judged: “The word that I have spoken, the same will judge him in the last day” (Jn 12:48).

Jesus was indeed the “Lord of glory” (1 Co 2:8). He was “the image and glory of God” among men on earth (1 Co 11:7). Through our obedience to the gospel, God has called us “unto His kingdom and glory” (1 Th 2:12). We were called by the gospel “to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Th 2:14). His glory mandates the obedience of the entire world to the word of Jesus. His glory must find a response in the lives of those who believe on Him

C. The requirements of the subjects of the kingdom reign of Jesus:

Inherent in a prosperous kingdom are subjects who assume their responsibilities and duties as subjects. The successful reign of the king is determined by the relationship the subjects have with their king. The prosperity of the kingdom is dependent on the obedient relationship the subjects maintain with the ruling king. Therefore, for the prosperity of the kingdom reign of Jesus, the subjects must assume the following responsibilities since they have voluntarily submitted themselves to the reign of King Jesus in their hearts:

1. The requirement of faith (trust): Jesus’ first requirement of His subjects was revealed when He said to His immediate subjects, “Believe in God, believe also in Me” (Jn 14:1). What He was saying was, “You trusted God, trust Me.” Belief, or trust, is the foundation upon which faithfulness of all subjects of the kingdom are identified. The subjects must trust that their king is qualified to lead and protect them. If there is no trust in the king, then the subjects of the kingdom live in apprehension and fear concerning their safety.

The Hebrew writer further explained, “But without faith [trust] it is impossible to please Him” (Hb 11:6). The subjects of the kingdom must trust that their king is in control. This is what James meant when he wrote the following statement:

My brethren, count it all joy when you fall into various trials, knowing that the trying of your faith produces patience. But let patience have its perfect work so that you may be perfect and entire, lacking nothing (Js 1:2-4).

The reason for an unwavering trust (faith) is to guard against what James continued to reveal: “For he who doubts is like a wave of the sea, driven and tossed by the wind” (Js 1:6). Those who doubt in the controlling power of the king will live as the restless waves of the sea. They will be tossed about by every trial that comes their way. Therefore, since “the just will live by faith,” then we must assume that being a trusting subject determines one’s relationship with the King (Rm 1:17). Trusting fully in King Jesus stabilizes each citizen of the kingdom. When the citizenship is stabilized by faith (trust), then the world can see that there is something unique about the citizens.

It is only through faith in Jesus that we realize the outcome of our faith. And that outcome is “life through His name” (Jn 20:31). It is this trusting faith that will take subjects of the kingdom through the trials of life, and finally bring them into eternal glory when the King returns. It is as Annie Johnson Flint poetically wrote,

Have you come to the Red Sea place in your life,
Where, in spite of all you can do,
There is no way out,
There is no way back,
There is no way but through?

Then wait on the Lord with a trust serene,
Till the night of your fear is gone;
He will send the wind,
He will heap the floods,
When He says to your soul, “Go on!”

2. The responsibility of obedience: There is no relationship with the King unless there is compliance to His will. Unfortunately, too many seek to establish their own rules of compliance as the foundation upon which they would maintain a relationship with the King. Anarchy, however, does not define a stable kingdom, neither does it define a stable relationship that one would seek to have with the King.

Jesus mentioned this point at the conclusion of the Sermon on the Mount. He reminded the audience before whom He spoke, “Not everyone who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter into the kingdom of heaven” (Mt 7:21). This one statement assumes that there would be conditions for faithful subjects of the kingdom of Jesus.

No kingdom that is divided against itself can continue. On another occasion, Jesus reminded would-be subjects, “Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation. And every city or house divided against itself will not stand” (Mt 12:25). Therefore, if one would be a faithful subject of the kingdom of Jesus, then he or she must voluntarily subject himself or herself to the will of the King of the kingdom. The faithful subject of the kingdom reign of Jesus is the one “who does the will of My Father who is in heaven” (Mt 7:21). If one does not do the will of the Father, then this subject of the universal kingdom reign of Jesus practices lawlessness (Mt 7:23). And we know that no lawless person will inherit the kingdom.

3. The responsibility of loyalty: At this time Jesus has authority over all things, “angels and authorities and powers having been made subject to Him” (1 Pt 3:22). The Father has “put all things in subjection under His feet” (Hb 2:8). However, we do not “yet see all things put under Him” (Hb 2:8). The entire habitation of the world is under the kingdom reign of Jesus, but not all the inhabitants of the world are obedient subjects.

Every kingdom has rebellious subjects. The same is true of the universal kingdom of Jesus. But we must not forget that the presence of rebellious subjects does not negate the universal reign of Jesus.

If one would assume the responsibilities of being a submissive subject of the kingdom, then he must be loyal to King Jesus. Loyalty means faithfulness to the will of the King even throughout times of persecution. Every loyal disciple, therefore, is charged to be faithful even if it means death (Rv 2:10). “Therefore,” the Holy Spirit would remind us, “endure hardship as a good soldier of Christ Jesus” (2 Tm 2:3). We must remember the words of a faithful subject who gave himself in loyal service to the King: “I endure all things for the elects’ sake, that they may also obtain the salvation that is in Christ Jesus with eternal glory” (2 Tm 2:10).

4. The responsibility of living the gospel of the King: When Paul wrote, “Let this mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus,” he continued to reveal the gospel journey of Jesus from being in the form of God to the sacrifice of the cross (Ph 2:5-8). Our King expects us to have such a mind in order that we too be able to make the same journey. This is the gospel journey to glory. This is the meaning behind what Paul wrote in Romans 12:1: “Therefore, I urge you, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service.” Presenting our bodies as a living sacrifice is having the mind of Christ who did the same for us. It means that we must transform our minds from the things of this world to that which is above this world (Rm 12:2; Cl 3:1,2).

We live the sacrificial life of gratitude because He lived for us. We have been spiritually made alive (Jn 3:3-5), because He physically died for us on the cross. Gospel living is a life of thanksgiving for the cross. For all those who would be responsible subjects of the kingdom of Jesus, must do as Jesus did for them. “If anyone will come after Me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow Me” (Lk 9:23).

5. The responsibility of living the gospel for the honor of King Jesus: When we consider what Paul wrote to the Christians in Corinth, we understand that he was quite profound in what he said concerning our living the transformed life:

*You are our letter written in our hearts, known and read by all men; being manifested that you are a letter of Christ ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in tablets of stone, but in fleshly tablets of the heart (2 Co 3:2,3).

To the disciples in Philippi, Paul exhorted, “Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Ph 1:27). This is the mind of Christ. This is the transformed life after the manner by which Jesus transformed Himself into the flesh of man in order to live the gospel of our redemption. We thus live the gospel by following in His steps. “For to this you were called, because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example that you should follow in His steps” (1 Pt 2:21). If anyone would obey the gospel, then he or she must understand that they are committed to living the gospel. This will bring them into conflict with the world, and for this reason, gospel lovers will always suffer persecution. They must remember, however, that they have overcome the world by their obedience to the gospel.

JESUS IS LORD!

We would think for a moment. If we were all assembled on Sunday morning in a meeting hall, and there entered the President of our country, what would we do? We would probably try to look without staring, and be surprised without uttering a sound. There might be some shuffling here and there. But then think, if someone in particular entered into our assembly whom we all know through the word of God. What if Jesus would appear before us all? What would we do? Without question, we would all fall on our faces to the floor. We would all respond as Thomas when he finally realized that Jesus was indeed who He said He was: “My Lord and my God” (Jn 20:28).

Henry Ward Beecher once said, “If Christ be not divine, every impulse of the Christian world falls to a lower octave, and light and love and hope decline.”

In the early Roman culture there were masters and slaves. In fact, some historians have estimated that about half of the population of the Roman Empire was composed of slaves. The citizenship of the Empire, therefore, was keenly sensitive to what a master/slave relationship entailed. Masters (lords) were in control. Slaves carried out in every detail the wishes of the masters.

The slave culture of the Empire established the definition of what a slave was, as well as his responsibilities toward his master. When Jesus used the word “slave,” therefore, He was laying the foundation upon which His disciples would relate to Him as their Lord, for the Roman culture defined what He meant when He used the word “slave.”

Throughout the epistles, the Holy Spirit continued to use the master/slave relationship that existed between Jesus and His disciples. However, we must keep in mind that there was a difference between the master/slave relationship of the society of Rome and the master/slave relationship that existed between Jesus and His disciples. The difference would be defined by the words “voluntary” and “appreciation.” Discipleship to Jesus would be voluntary because of what Jesus did for His slaves in life, and what He would eventually do for them through the gift of eternal life.

After the crucifixion, resurrection and ascension of Jesus to the right hand of God the Father, the apostle Peter stood up on the day of Pentecost and announced for the first time in history, “Therefore, let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ”

(At 2:38). Jesus was made the Master/Lord because He was seated on the throne of God in heaven. Through the cross, He made a gospel call to all those who would volunteer to submit to His lordship. They would voluntarily submit because they knew the result of their submission. Thousands volunteered to make Him their Lord because He gave them the gift of eternal life through the sacrificial offering of His incarnate blood.

The story was written in some book we have long forgotten, about a slave who was auctioned. Some benevolent person bought the slave, and then said, “You are now free. You may go and do what you will.” The slave responded, “Since you have set me free, I will serve you the rest of my life.” We are reminded of what Paul wrote to the Christians who lived in the heart of slavery of the Roman Empire:

Do you not know that to whom you present yourselves as bondservants [slaves] to obey, his bondservants you are whom you obey, whether of sin to death or of obedience to righteousness? (Rm 6:16).

In our obedience to the gospel of Jesus we have voluntarily submitted to His lordship. In view of this, Paul continued the preceding discussion:

But God be thanked that though you were the bondservants of sin, yet you have obeyed from the heart that form of teaching that was delivered to you. And having been freed from sin, you became the bondservants of righteousness (Rm 6:17,18).

The Jewish audience to whom Peter addressed the gospel message in Acts 2 had previously known Jesus as only the rebellious carpenter from Galilee. It surely came as a shock to many of them when Peter used the word “Lord” in reference to this humble carpenter from Galilee. But the evidence of the carpenter being more than a carpenter from Galilee had become convincing by the time Peter made the announcement. At the beginning of Jesus’ ministry, the evidence of His sonship developed to the point that priests came to Him in the night, saying, “*Rabbi, we know that You are a teacher come from God, for no one can do these signs that You do unless God is with him” (Jn 3:2). And if God was with Jesus, then their relationship with Him had to change.

The validation that Jesus was who He said He was, was the absence of His body when the announcement was made in Jerusalem that He was raised from the dead. No antagonist of the apostles could produce the body in order to disprove the resurrection claim.

After affirming that God had raised up Jesus, Peter made the announcement that this same Jesus was the Christ, the Messiah, for whom Israel had been waiting since the days of Abraham. All supernatural and prophetic evidence pointed to this conclusion. It was a time, therefore, to accept Jesus, not just as the man Jesus, but as the Lord Jesus Christ. Jesus was made Lord on the throne of God. He was declared Christ by His fulfillment of all Messianic prophecies. So on the day of Pentecost, about 3,000 submitted to the authority of the name of the Lord Jesus to be baptized for the remission of their sins.

Those who obeyed the gospel wanted the Lord Jesus to be the Master of their lives. Through the Spirit's written documents of the response of the early disciples, emphasis was placed on the continuing ministry of Jesus as the Lord of those who sought to live the gospel that He brought into the world. It would be good for us to remind ourselves of the many aspects that His lordship plays in our own lives. We are who we are because of who He presently is at the right hand of God.

Jesus is our Master, and we are His willing subjects who walk in gratitude of what He did for us at the cross. We are His slaves because of what He brought into the world. And because He is our Lord Jesus, He will take us out of the world when He comes again. We now live by who He is and what He is presently doing as King of kings and Lord of lords.

Escape From Religion

For seagoing vessels throughout the world, barnacles are a nuisance. They are a type of anthropoid that attach themselves to the hulls of ships. Over a long period of time, they begin to cover the hull of the entire ship. They slow the ship down, and thus they are a cumbersome attachment to the ship. They are an obnoxious obstruction along for the ride, but prevent smooth sailing. For this reason, every sailor must deal with barnacles.

When restoration movements are young and vibrant, they thrive. The excited proponents of the refreshing wave of simple Christianity seek to be free of the barnacles of religion (traditions) that have encumbered them for so long in the past. Those of the initial restoration enjoy the gospel of freedom that they received in Christ, realizing that their salvation does not depend on defending the barnacles (traditions), but in living the gospel of Jesus Christ. They sail freely through the sea because they are not encumbered with conflicting barnacles that would make them a unique sect of the religious world.

The audience of our writing in the past few years has been to those throughout the world who are seeking to scrape the barnacles of religion from their faith in order that they might be free to sail the waters of life. There are thousands of believers throughout the world who have pulled away from barnacle-laden “mainstream” religions that have over the decades, if not centuries, encumbered themselves with the barnacles of tradition. “Barnacle free” churches are now independent and on their way. We write to these men and women who are into the word of God in order to discover anew the simple faith that is revealed in the word of God.

Nevertheless, we would give a word of caution to these often young and zealous pioneers. When the barnacles of an old encumbered religion have been scraped away, the sailing at first is fast and furious. Unfortunately, as time passes, barnacles of tradition again start attaching themselves to the hull of the ship. What was once new and vibrant becomes bogged down with that from which the fathers once freed themselves. As ships must periodically have their hulls scraped free of barnacles, so also must restoration movements. We have a tendency to lose our first love, and once again become stagnant with “barnacle religion.”

Since movements are the efforts of men, restoration movements are the efforts of sincere Bible lovers who seek to restore the authority of the word of God for their faith. The problem is with the men of the movement as the movement ages. The initial fathers of the movement braved the trials of getting our thinking back to the Bible and on track. But since the descendants of the movement are men themselves, and many years removed from the pioneers, they must recognize that the movement has picked up some barnacles along the way. The result is that the restoration loses its energy. It is no longer restoration, but the preservation of a barnacle-ridden heritage. This is simply the way of all restoration movements. There comes a time, therefore, when the ship must scrape itself free again from the obstruction of barnacles that are just along for the ride.

Restoration movements that have been around for half a century have always attached to them some barnacles of tradition. The hull of the ship is being obscured, and thus the ship is identified by the barnacles to be just another ship.

It is the nature of our religiosity to pick up barnacles. If we fail to recognize this, then we are doomed to create again that from which we once scraped ourselves clean. Any ship that does not occasionally scrape itself free of barnacles, will eventually slow down because it is encumbered.

The process of scraping away the barnacles of tradition is hard. Before the days of dry docks, sailors had to hold their breath and dive beneath the surface of the sea in order to scrape the hull free of barnacles. It was extremely hard work. But it had to be done in order to free the ship from that which hindered its smooth passage through the waters of the sea. Those barnacles had to go in order that the ship go.

It is our task to aid those church leaders who love the simplicity of the gospel so much that they are willing to endure all the pain that is necessary in order to dive beneath the surface of their religious heritage in order to scrape the gospel free of the barnacles of tradition. This is not an easy task, but necessary. If we are to see the hull again, we must scrap away each barnacle one by one. Barnacles cement themselves to the hull, and so, each one must be scraped away with much difficulty.

Our goal is to reveal the hull of the ship that lies beneath the cover of the barnacles. Every ship is sailing with some barnacles attached. But when the accumulation of barnacles becomes so massive, the ship is weighed down and slowed in the waters. When we see a heavily laden ship with so many attached barnacles, we know that the efficiency of the ship is greatly impaired. Because some do not want to suffer the pain of scraping the hull, they simply live in the comfort of the ship regardless of it losing its purpose. There are a number of ships in harbors throughout the world that are just sitting in the harbor because no one wants to clean the hull.

As we journey through the trials of barnacle scraping, we must keep in mind that we are not of the persuasion to sit in a comfortable cabin and allow the ship to sit idle in the harbor, being overloaded with the barnacles of religious traditions. As a barnacle laden ship appears ugly before the world, we seek to dive beneath the surface in order to scrape the hull clean in order that the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ can be witnessed by the world. We ask for others to take up the word of God and join in our efforts to clean away those religious rites and traditions that align us with those ships that have long grown weary of scraping the hull. If you are one of those people, then this book is meant to be a tool to encourage you in your “hull scraping” duties to keep the ship of our Lord Jesus sailing smoothly through the seas of this world.

Is there an emotional reward for recognizing and cleaning the hull of barnacles? There certainly is! Just ask any sea captain. Ask him his feeling concerning his ship as he sets sail for the first voyage after the hull has been set free from all the inhibiting barnacles. He feels that a great weight has been lifted from his shoulders. He feels the efficiency of his ship. He feels he can conquer the seas with his vessel for it is no longer laden with the encumbering weight and drag of the barnacles.

And for us to whom the metaphor is applied, it is simply great to walk again by faith in God through the purity of His word alone. We must remember the words of two former Jews who were once entangled in all sorts of legal religious restrictions. But they were scraped clean in the blood of Jesus, and thus they warned some fellow Jews who failed to keep their ship of faith free from the entanglement of barnacles:

For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled in them and overcome, the latter end is worse for them than the beginning (Peter - 2 Pt 2:20).

Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage (Paul - Gl 5:1).

Prologue

These things about which we write will be quite unsettling to some people. They will be so because we are all creatures of habit, especially in the area of how we behave our faith in response to what we believe God seeks from us in obedience. There is nothing wrong with this in reference to how we express our faith, either in worship, or in how we carry out those good works that we are driven to do. However, the problem develops when a group of people decide, either consciously or unconsciously, that they will clone one another after the same behavior as to how the disciples will express their faith in obedience to God. They then become a unique sect, a particular denomination, or worse, a cult.

It was into this religious environment that Jesus came and confronted religion. Throughout His earthly ministry, the religious establishment of the day was in continual conflict with what He taught and how He behaved. He did not fit into the norm of the religious behavioral habits of identity that defined a good religious Jew. Because He was preparing His disciples for new wine that would eventually burst the old wineskins of the Jews' religion, He lived that which was coming. He cautioned His disciples to beware of that which He confronted, lest the gospel living that He was introducing into the world would be compromised.

Jesus knew that after His departure, His disciples would put on the mantel of truth that He wore. Subsequently, they would endure the same rejection by the religious establishment that He endured. As we look into the behavior of Jesus, we learn from His experience what is necessary to confront religion. Religion, as the invention of men to manifest unique beliefs, will always conflict with the revelation of what God would require of those who walk by faith. In fact, religion would be revealed in its conflict with the behavior by which the disciples of Jesus would live the gospel. When the Word who was with God was incarnate into this world, the religious establishment of Judaism rejected Him. Jesus knew that His disciples would receive the same rejection as they took the message of the Word into all the world.

We understand that the ministry of Jesus was not only about His teachings. It would be about how they, in following His example, would be successful in taking His teachings into a religious world that was essentially antagonistic to the truth of the gospel. How He dealt with one of the most stringent religious groups of history, therefore, became the road map that His disciples would need to survive in a hostile world of both Jewish and Roman religion.

Since religion is always the invention of men, then any life-style revelation from God would be in conflict with the religions of men. This is true because men always devise religions that take the place of the will of God. Jesus came into such a scenario of religion in the first century. He lived the example of how to confront man's religion. We thus seek to follow in His steps, knowing that these steps will be contrary to the religious establishment of the world in which we live, but to which we must go as His disciples.

We would not, therefore, be surprised with the conflict that will arise out of following in the gospel steps of Jesus. These steps are simply contrary to the way of the religions of men. We will suffer persecution because we seek to live the example life of the gospel. Our danger is that we become weary of continuing this conflicting walk. Many have. And because many have, we live in a world of "Christendom" where universalism is the religion of the day.

Universalism is simply an effort on the part of all who have a little Jesus somewhere in their thinking, but do not want to live in conflict with one another. The universalist seeks to live in a religious world of no conflicts, and thus, he or she accepts any thinking that is proposed by others in reference to simply "believing in Jesus." He thus rejects judgment in reference to the word of God because of his aversion to religious confrontation. It is for this reason that books as this are very uncomfortable to read by universalists.

If we fear conflict in reference to matters of faith, then we set ourselves up to be deceived into believing that one can believe anything, and yet be saved. Belief is thus dissolved in the confusion of religious diversity. The problem with this system of thought is that the religious universalist ends up with no commitment about anything. But if everything goes, then we are going nowhere. Therefore, there must be some distinctiveness about what Jesus taught. There must be some teachings that are absolutes in order that we are accepted into the eternal fellowship of God.

It is our purpose in the pages to come to dig deep. We seek to dig until it hurts because we know that we are creatures who often take our religious habits to the level of doctrine. Once our religious habits are doctrine (law), then we start using our religious habits as the standard by which we both judge others, as well as self-sanctify ourselves before God. When we reach the point of self-sanctification, we have minimized the sacrificial offering of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Because we know who we are, we seek to guard ourselves against being those who walked in conflict with Jesus throughout His ministry. We seek to be on the side of Jesus, not the side of those who based their religiosity upon their theology, and by doing such, brought themselves into conflict with the Son of God. The very conflict that the early religionists had with Jesus was proof that they had created after their own desires a religion that was contrary to the Son of God. For this reason, it is absolutely imperative that we dig through our own religiosity. We must search through the words of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John in order to discover who this Jesus is. And just as important, we must reach into the lives of those in the first century who were deceived into believing that their religiosity was acceptable to God, when at the time, it was simply built on the foundation of the doctrines and traditions of men.

Because most people are afraid to venture down this path of discovery, we will assume that there will be those who are fearful of even considering that they are guilty of the very thing that brought the religionists of Jesus' day into conflict with what He introduced into the world. Jesus was indeed patient with His antagonists. We seek to be the same, though we realize that we are not perfect in this matter. We simply seek to be honest with ourselves that we in some way might, as the religionists who confronted Jesus, be guilty of the same misguided religiosity. Therefore, we must measure by the standard of the word of God everything we believe and behave. We seek to dig deep into our own beliefs and behavior in order to extract those beliefs and behavioral functions of worship that keep us close to a simple walk of faith.

In Jesus' parable of the prodigal, most of us are like the "faithful" son who stayed with the father, and thus did not end up in the pig pens as the prodigal son. We are often self-righteous, seeking to sanctify ourselves by our "faithful" stay in comparison to the unfaithful stray of the prodigal.

It is difficult for the self-righteous to repent. It is even more difficult for the self-righteous to look deep into his soul and discover those points of religious arrogance that keep him away from the humble Son of God who gave up all in heaven in order to humiliate Himself unto the death of the cross.

This gospel message would be to those religious groups today who think that they have the "right name," the "right doctrine," the right everything, and thus should be considered "faithful" because of their own self-sanctification and because they have been faithful to "the law." It is this group that is inherently difficult to convince that in some ways they too have become simply religious in their attempts at self-sanctification in order to justify themselves before God through some form of perfect law-keeping. As previously stated, it is difficult for the self-righteous to revisit their own beliefs and behavior, and then repent when they discover that they may have moved into the library of law something that was only a tradition.

Jesus confronted this legalistic religiosity during His ministry. In other words, as some today, He confronted those who had forgotten the weightier matters of the Sinai law and consigned their faith to a system of compliance to a defined legal code of religion that they had constructed throughout years of religious habits (traditions). The religious establishment of Jesus' day found confidence in their obedience to their legal religious habits of identity. In the same way, there are those today who have restructured Christianity into a set of similar legal codes of identity.

The problem with legal religiosity as a system of faith is that it becomes extremely self-righteous. It becomes so self-righteous that it makes it almost impossible for the self-righteous religionist to forgive the stinking prodigal son who crawls back into the father's house on hands and knees and asks for forgiveness. His own whitewashed sin makes it almost impossible for him to identify the sin beneath the sin of his own self-righteousness.

Self-righteous legalism is the curse of the day. Self-righteous legalism and universalism are extremes that oppose one another. The universalist would say to the prodigal that he is fine in the pig pen. The self-righteous legalist would say that the prodigal must clean himself up just like the "faithful" son who stayed. The problem with being as the son who stayed is that it is only Jesus who can clean us up, not our self-righteous deeds of merit in staying with the father. On the other hand, the problem with the universalist is that he fails to recognize that there is light in which one must walk in order to be continually cleaned up by the blood of Jesus.

And unless one finds that light, he is still walking in darkness. The prodigal had to return to the father.

This brings us to a discussion on how we must restore ourselves to faith in Jesus. If religion moves us further away from God, and self-righteousness keeps us away because of our determination to behave and believe the religious habits of our fathers, then we must find our way back through faith. We must be willing to find and sluff off any religious rite that would hinder our restoration to simple faith. We must be willing to ignore any religious tradition that would bar us from fellowshiping all those who are walking in the same direction.

The problem is that the self-righteous religionist thinks he has already arrived. This is where this book is going to be very painful. With the prodigal, there is little problem. He simply smells himself, and realizes that he does not smell like Jesus. But the self-righteous religionist has trusted in his legal religiosity for so long that he has associated his obedience to his proof-text legalities as a sign of his own righteousness. We must, therefore, start working our way through these legalities in order to determine if they are truly fundamental behavioral habits that God demands that must be behaved in order to be saved. Or, we must determine if they are simply a manufactured systems of religiosity that are disguised with a cloak of self-righteousness.

We cannot have a simple faith in Jesus until we peel away religion and its rites in which we have for so many years trusted to be necessary for salvation. We seek to prove all things, and then grasp with faith to those things that are true. If we are afraid to do this, then we are doomed. We are doomed to stand before God on the merit of our own supposed perfect obedience of the legalities that we have bound on ourselves, but God never bound. We are doomed to forcing God to judge us according to our self-sanctifying religious rites and good works. We are also doomed to present to God our own self-religious behavior as the standard by which we demand that He judge us. We force God to look past the cross of justification in order to measure us according to the merit of our own perfect obedience. But all of us know that all self-righteousness is futile in reference to atoning for our sins.

We propose to strip away those things in which we may have trusted for so many years, considering ourselves “faithful,” because we stayed, while the prodigal son strayed. When we get down to the bare bones of faith, it is then that we can start restoring ourselves to the gospel of God’s grace. It is then that we will start refreshing ourselves in the loving grace of a God who knows all our imperfections, but is still willing to forgive our wayward venture to trust in our own religious behavior to save ourselves apart from, or in conjunction with, the cross of His Son. We must hang on, and thus enjoy the ride to discovering the heart of God that was revealed through the Lord Jesus Christ.

INTRODUCTION

The central task of the restorationist is to call people back to the authority of the word of God. This is often an arduous task because it is difficult to refocus the minds of people from simply being religious to establishing again the original source of our faith. Restorationists arise because there has been a wayward move from the original foundation upon which the faith of the people was based. We will thus continually “ask for the old paths, where the good way is, and walk in it” (Jr 6:16).

The prophets of God arose in the history of Israel because the faith of the people moved from the authority of the law of God to religion. It was thus the task of the prophets of God in the Old Testament to bring the people back to the original roots of their faith. The same work of restoration continues today. We must continually be reminded of who we are and what we behave in comparison to the authority on which we base our faith.

The persistent messenger of God should not be unaware of the difficulties of implementing and continuing the task of restoration. The restorationists of God in ancient times sometimes ended up in pits, isolated from society, and often carried off into captivity. Indeed, some of those faithful Old Testament messengers of God ...

... were tortured ... had trial of mockings and scourgings, yes, also of bonds and imprisonment. They were stoned. They were sawn asunder. They were tempted. They were slain with the sword. They wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented—men of whom the world was not worthy. They wandered in deserts and mountains and dens and caves of the earth (Hb 11:35-38).

It is not the duty of the restorational prophet to be the center of reference of the people. It is his task to lead people to the Leader of the people. When we stray from the foundation of our faith—the word of our King—we must be restored to the authority of the word of our King (See Jn 12:48). We must remember that being religious is not good enough. Wayward religious people in the Old Testament were called upon by the prophets to restore themselves to the authority of the law of God.

Those who must be corrected are those who have created after their own traditions a religiosity that often perpetuates powerful positions and purses. But when this religiosity is opposed, the messenger of the word of God must not forget that traditional religionists will gnash their teeth against the prophet and stone him to death with either literal stones or hardened words (See At 7:54). Even the Founder of our faith was nailed to a tree because He brought judgment on religionists while delivering from sin those who had been captured by the established religion of the day (At 10:39).

The reason for this resistance is easy to understand. Traditional religiosity, especially that of those who feel they have legally determined for themselves all that is essential to be righteous before God, will often contend vigorously for the faith (traditions) of their fathers and mothers. They assume that their fathers and mothers lived inerrantly before God. They will confuse “contending for the faith” that was delivered to us by our Father of faith (Jd 3), with the religious traditions that were handed to them by their earthly fathers. In a very emotional way, therefore, they feel that they are condemning their own fathers and mothers if they would turn away in any direction from the religious traditions that were handed to them as their heritage of spirituality.

Unfortunately, those who would contend for the traditional faith of their fathers have forgotten two very important points in reference to the faith of their fathers and mothers. First, if the faith that they inherited from their fathers and mothers was truly genuine, then they must remember that their fathers and mothers would immediately accept any new Bible information concerning their beliefs, or correct their beliefs through new studies of the Bible. A genuine faith is defined as such because it continually drives us to learn more Bible. And when we learn more, our genuine faith drives us to change to that which we have learned. Nevertheless, few people are willing to honor their fathers and mothers’ genuine faith by following in the footsteps of their fathers and mothers who sought to learn more. We have few Bible students today as our fathers and mothers were a generation ago. Too many people simply rely on the faith of their fathers without testing that faith with Bible study (2 Co 13:5).

Second, by refusing to change from an erroneous heritage that they may have received from their fathers and mothers, those who are fearful of change often establish a code of religious traditions that they will in turn hand down to their own children. And when this happens, the heirs of an erroneous spiritual heritage eventually end up under the condemnation of what Isaiah said to apostate Israel in his day, and Jesus repeated concerning His own generation:

This people honors Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me. In vain they worship Me, teaching as doctrines the commandments of men (Is 29:13; Mk 7:6,7).

The messenger of God’s word must never be intimidated by the religious powers that exist. On the contrary, the prophet must be terrified by the words that God spoke to the prophet Ezekiel:

When I [God] say to the wicked, “You will surely die,” and you [as a prophet] do not give him warning, nor speak to warn the wicked of his wicked way, to save his life, the same wicked man will die in his iniquity. But his blood I will require at your hand (Ez 3:18).

No true messenger of God’s word can ignore these words. The sincere messenger of God is driven by fear of what will happen to him if he does not speak. He knows that the responsibility of teaching the word of God to those who have moved away from God rests squarely upon his shoulders. The restorationist must not, therefore, even in view of beatings and pits, detour from his or her objective to teach the word of God to the people.

We must not be surprised by any disturbance that is caused when the word of God is preached. Restorational messengers and their word are often difficult to accept, for they often remind us of that from which we have strayed. Nevertheless, we must take our Bibles and prove the word of every messenger of God’s word. We accept the messengers who would warn us of our wicked way in apostasy. They seek to restore us to that genuine faith that continues to be based on the word of God.

We are wise enough to understand that as time passes, we are always in danger of enshrining the religious traditions of our fathers. We are always in danger of allowing the culture in which we live to influence our faith. We are always in danger of allowing the politics or economics of the day to determine what we should believe. For this reason, we understand that our genuine faith is always in danger of digressing into religion. We are in fear of waking up one day and discovering that we too are as the religious establishment of the day of both Isaiah and Jesus. We are fearful of finding ourselves worshipping God in vain after the religious traditions of our fathers.

Therefore, we will bear with those who call for the restoration of the word of God, though they may be prophets of doom. If we do not repent, we will continue to allow ourselves to be unchallenged by the word of God. If a teacher has a Bible in his hands, and quotes book, chapter and verse, then, for our own benefit, we will spare him from stones and pits. The restorational leader speaks in order that we repent. He speaks in order that we not bring ourselves into destruction as was the case with Israel of old (See Hs 4:6).

In order to be restored to the Author and Finisher of our faith, we must always go back to the simplicity of the heritage of the early disciples. We use the word “simplicity” simply because over time faith is always encumbered with a host of religious traditions that cloud the original source of the authority of our faith. Therefore, we must be “picky” in our understanding of the authority of our faith. We must be willing to identify even the minutest tradition in order to understand that we are encumbered with traditions. It is not that we can live tradition free lives. What we must be willing to do is identify our religious traditions and understand that such traditions are not the foundation of our genuine faith.

God allows traditions, but in our study of the word of God, we must confess up to any tradition that might detour our efforts to restore ourselves to that which is the simplicity of His word. In this way, we can keep the original authority of our faith firmly in mind as we struggle to identify our own religious traditions. In this way we will refresh ourselves in the nurturing word that is so refreshing in a world that has invented every form of religion that men can conceive.

THE SUBTLE MOVE TO RELIGION

In her book, Fugitive Pieces, the Canadian poet, Anne Michaels, eloquently pieced together several stories of holocaust survivors and their families. She made a statement in the book that is so relevant in reference to any movement into religion:

Nothing is sudden. Not an explosion—planned, timed, wired carefully—not the burst door. Just as the earth invisibly prepares its cataclysms, so history is the gradual instant [emphasis mine, R.E.D.).

Remember the following statement by the Holy Spirit: “*For whatever things were written before were written for our learning” (Rm 15:4)? Those things that were written in the Old Testament were not simply in reference to doctrinal matters. Much of the Old Testament was written about the history of Israel in the gradual apostasy of the people from God. These things were written for our learning in reference to our own possible apostasy.

What Michaels was saying in her statement concerning the holocaust was that social norms change gradually over time. Changes toward evil are the “gradual instant” that over a period of time can find their sudden conclusion in a devastating social cataclysm. What may take years to develop, instantly comes to a conclusion. And so it was with the fall of national Israel. One day they woke up in captivity, realizing that Jerusalem and the temple were lying in ruins.

It was not that Israel was without illustrations of a “gradual instant” in their history. The book of Judges was written because of the problem of social digression that always takes place within a society. As a group, we do not get better morally. We become worse. The consequences of Israel’s moral digression finally came to a conclusion when God allowed their enemies to come upon them in order to punish them for their wayward ways. For example, throughout their cycles of sin and restoration that are recorded in the book of Judges, the cycles began when “the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the Lord” (Jg 4:1). As their punishment, “the Lord sold them” into the hands of their enemies (See Jg 4:2). Then “the children of Israel cried to the Lord” (See Jg 4:3). In answer to their cries, God sent a leader to lead the people back to the way of the Lord in order that they could be delivered from their enemies.

Over and over again this cycle of sin, repentance and deliverance happened in Israel. If we would therefore learn anything from the history of the Old Testament, it would be that we always gradually move away from the Lord. Therefore, we need to be reminded from where we have moved. We must experience a “gradual instant” for which our digression has prepared for us over a long period of time.

Our move away from the Lord is always slow. It is unnoticed, and therefore deceptive. There is no moral consciousness of the move. Because the moral move is so gradual and painless, we must not be deceived into thinking that when people fall out of love with the word and will of God, they are not on a move away from God. The people are morally moving, but their move is not a move closer to God. Moral and religious moves are always away from God. Apostasy is always a result of man's religious movement away from God in order to please himself. And in reference to Israel, these "things were written for our learning."

There were numerous examples of fall and restoration throughout Israel's history upon which the people could continually reflect. Nevertheless, they seem to never have learned. In their end, God judged their spirit of rebellion: "My people are bent on backsliding from Me" (Hs 11:7). And so are we. We live in a world of backslidden religiosity that has lost its way.

Israel's cycle of fall eventually developed into an irreversible fall that resulted from their total neglect of the word of God. There were no more restorations for the nation when this happened. The problem was that they could not repent for they had forgotten that to which they must return. Repentance, therefore, availed nothing for they had gone into the doom of misguided religiosity. It was a time when God said concerning their state of religiosity, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge [of My word]" (Hs 4:6). They could not repent and return to that which they had forgotten.

The only recourse for God was purification of the people through the bondage of captivity. Their "gradual instant" finally appeared in the north in the coming of foreign armies. Therefore, in 722/21 B.C. the northern kingdom of Israel went into Assyrian captivity, and in 586 B.C. the southern kingdom went into Babylonian captivity.

While in captivity, something new happened in their religiosity. There was a swing of the religious pendulum. They went from forgetting and forsaking the law of God to surrounding the law with their traditions.. Instead of reaping the consequences of captivity again, the people of Israel sought to guarantee that they would never again forget the commandment of God. For example, in order not to forget the Sabbath of the Sinai law, they surrounded the keeping of the Sabbath with countless rules by which they sought to guarantee their obedience to the Sabbath. They added so many rules and regulations to the original Sinai law that they had to write religious books as the Talmud and Tanakh in order that their invented rules and regulations not be forgotten or violated.

The consequence of this system of religiosity was that the simplicity of what God required in the Sinai law became buried beneath heaps of rules and regulations. The commandment of God was so far buried in their obsession to keep their Sabbath rules that a new society of religious people had to rise to the occasion in order to bring peace of mind to the people concerning the application of all the rules and regulations. These were the scribes, or lawyers of the law. And in order that all the rules and regulations be obeyed of what Paul later referred to as Judaism ("the Jews' religion"), a religious force of policemen had to arise to make sure everyone followed the rules and regulations. These were the Pharisees. The Pharisees were thus the religious policemen for what the scribes determined should be obeyed.

By the time Jesus came into the world, something opposite had happened to what had developed in the years of Israel's apostasy during the time of the judges and national Israel under the kings. During those years the people simply forgot the commandment of God and ran after their own religious rules that pleased them. Baal won out over Bible. But when Jesus arrived, the commandment of God became so buried beneath the religious rules of the Jews that the Jews marginalized the commandments. Jesus judged the Pharisees and scribes in the following statement: "For laying aside the commandment of God, you hold the [religious] tradition of men" (Mk 7:8). Jesus then went further in His condemnation of their religious behavior because they had gone again into apostasy: "All too well you reject the commandment of God so that you may keep your own [religious] tradition" (Mk 7:9).

The problem with religion is that it is always a move away from God. If we would learn anything from the history of Israel, it would be that when we either forget the commandment of God, or ignore the commandment of God by focusing on our own religious traditions, we are moving, or have moved, away from God. The problem with being in a state of apostasy where we have forgotten the commandment of God is that we have no knowledge of a base to which we can return. Those who are in the process of laying aside the commandment of God are so obsessed with the religious traditions of their fathers that they feel they are forsaking the faith of their fathers and mothers if they restore themselves to the commandment of God. Their move away from the commandment of God was slow and painless. But their repentance can often be emotionally traumatic.

The Holy Spirit did not leave us ignorant concerning how we find ourselves in the deplorable religious condition of having laid aside, or rejected the commandment of God. He explained in the Roman letter why and how such things occur in a religiously oriented people. Paul explained:

For they [the Jews] being ignorant of God's righteousness [justification] and seeking to establish their own righteousness [justification], have not submitted themselves to the righteousness [justification] of God (Rm 10:3).

When religious people who have forgotten the word of God, but seek to please God, they will invent their own system of justification (righteousness) by which they will satisfy their consciences before God. After they have created their self-justification through obedience to their own religious rites, they will with great zeal seek to self-sanctify themselves through strict obedience to the religious rites they bind upon themselves. When they falter, they will establish a system of meritorious good deeds to atone for any infractions of the rites and rules. This is apostasy to religion.

Inventors of religion will do as Paul described his fellow Jews: “For I testify of them [the Jews] that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge” (Rm 10:2). Regardless of their zeal for God through their own self-righteousness, the Jews stood condemned in their own religiosity. And for this reason, Paul wrote of his fellow Jews, “My heart’s desire and prayer to God for them is that they might be saved” (Rm 10:1).

At least one very startling point was clarified when Paul made the preceding statement: One cannot be saved by establishing his own self-righteousness (justification) in order to please God. The reason for this is clear. “For by works of law no flesh will be justified” before God (Gl 2:16). Whether a religious law is devised by man, or by God, no one can keep law perfectly, and thus all have sinned and fall short of the precious salvation that God offers through grace (See Rm 3:23; 6:23). The road to self-righteous justification is a dead end.

We can see a tear of sadness that dropped on the manuscript when Paul inscribed many years after his obedience to the gospel the following words as he remembered his former years in the religion of his father and mother:

And I advanced in Judaism [the Jews’ religion] above many of my contemporaries in my own nation, being more extremely zealous for my ancestral traditions (Gl 1:14).

He, as well as many zealous young Jews, had made their fathers proud. As many young Jews who gave so much for the religiosity of their fathers, Paul thought of this as fruitless time he had spent in bearing the burden of a religion. It was a dead religion that brought no salvation.

If there ever could be a system of self-sanctification for salvation, then certainly men as Paul could have arrived at the pearly gates on the foundation of religious performances. Many years after his enlightenment through the gospel, Paul wrote to the Philippian brothers and sisters whom he loved so much, “Beware of the dogs. Beware of the evil workers. Beware of the false circumcision” (Ph 3:2). When Paul wrote these words, he was thinking back to his former years when he was one of those “dogs,” an “evil worker” and of the “false circumcision.” In those days when his religiosity excelled above his fellow Jews, he ravaged the saints through persecution. “Concerning zeal,” he remembered, “persecuting the church; concerning righteousness that is in law, blameless” (Ph 3:6). But when Jesus confronted Paul (Saul) on the Damascus road, he was shocked into the reality that the gospel was true and the religion of his father and mother was a dead end street in reference to salvation. The power of the gospel subsequently transformed his thinking and his life.

Indeed more, I count all things lost for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things. I count them refuse [dung] so that I may gain Christ (Ph 3:8).

The King James Version was correct in literally translating the word “refuse” with the word “dung.” The translation rendered Paul’s statement that he counted his former religiosity “but dung, that I may win Christ.” All the zeal. All the works. All the self-righteousness. All the ambition to uphold the Jew’s religion. It was all as human refuse (dung) to be cast out as repugnant waste.

When we speak of discarding a religion that was handed to us by our forefathers, as Paul discarded the religion of his father and mother, something very powerful must come upon us in order to do so. Paul would know. Because of what he had done in his former life as a “dog” and “evil worker,” we can now better understand what he meant when he wrote Romans 1:16: “For I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is the power of God unto salvation to everyone who believes.”

In view of what Paul cast out as “religious dung,” we can understand that he was speaking of more in this passage than salvational matters. He was speaking of a gospel that was so powerful in one’s heart that it would move the most ardent religionist to count all his religiosity as dung to be cast out in order to gain the Lord Jesus Christ. One must come to the realization that there is no salvation in religion. Salvation is only in the gospel of Jesus Christ (At 4:12).

CHRISTIANITY VERSUS RELIGION

In reference to society in general, the definition of a “liberal” is one who has lost either his social or moral compass. The liberal seeks to live beyond restrictions. As an individual, the liberal generally seeks to be “free” from the restraints of social or legal norms that would hinder his freedom to do as he would choose to do according to the influences of the general trends of the social environment in which he lives. The word “progressive” is often used to disguise the desire of the liberal to do that which is right in his own eyes. He is progressive in the sense of “progressing” in any direction without the constraints of any moral center of reference. He is truly a ship without a moral anchor.

Because he is an “anchorless” ship on a social sea, the liberal does not like disagreement with his position at any specific time in his progression to an uncertain destiny. The conservative will answer “no” to the liberal, but the liberal is offended because the negative answer, or argument against his existing position, is contrary to the central core of his philosophy of life.

A society that is built on either a religious, or constitutional rule by law, can usually keep individual “progressive” citizens in check by the majority of conservatives. However, when the majority of the society becomes “progressive”—they are progressing in any direction the majority so chooses—then there are problems. If the majority of society is composed of those who have a liberal philosophy for establishing constitutional social norms (rule by law), then the constitution must be amended when the society morally digresses, or at least be interpreted through the social philosophy of liberal thinking. And thus, this is the inherent curse of democratic government, especially those societies that are not held in check by faith. It is difficult to hold moral standards in check by constitutional law, for constitutional democracies are often established on the basis of a separation of faith and government. Whatever the majority of the civil government chooses to be morally correct, then the majority condones. If corruption in the government is deemed acceptable, then government officials have no scruples about embezzling money from state coffers.

But in a theocratic government, things are somewhat different, but never free from the attack of a liberal philosophy of either moral or theological dangers. For example, the social norm of the nation of Israel slowly moved in a direction away from their moral norm of the Sinai law. After enjoying their freedom from Egyptian captivity for about a century, the people ignored much of the civil and moral order of the Sinai law. They determined to progress away from God’s moral norms of the Sinai law.

The reason for Israel’s progression away from the moral norms of the Sinai law was stated by an inspired historian: “In those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did what was right in his own eyes” (Jg 17:6). This is the “standard” of the liberal. The truly liberal person seeks to do that which is right according to his own desires. He refuses to be directed by any unchanging mandate of law. When the majority of the citizens of a society conduct themselves in this way, then the society as a whole overcomes the obstacle of the conservatives who seek to hold on to the social norms of what now has become the past.

Liberal philosophy can even affect an entire world generation of people. Progression away from unchanging moral norms happened with the entire world’s population at one time in the past. In the Genesis 6:5 historical statement, the word “wickedness” is used to define moral and religious behavior that is contrary to the doctrinal and moral norms of God. In other words, one can be “wicked” while being religious. As was the case of Israel, the “wicked” at the time Noah prepared the ark were not necessarily bad people who did bad things. They were people who had forsaken Divine standards of moral and social order in order to progress in the way of behavior that was determined by their own standards. The same was true of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. So the inspired historian wrote of the entire generation of progressives in Noah’s day: “And God saw that the wickedness of man was great on the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart were only evil continually” (Gn 6:5).

The definition of the conservative is that he seeks to establish in government or faith norms by which citizens will live by rule of law in society. He seeks to maintain doctrinal norms in reference to his relationship with both God and his neighbor. In government, he writes out a constitution, or some civil “bill of rights,” that will be the social compass by which all citizens of the society must be governed.

One good thing that colonial powers brought to their respective people over which they assumed rule, was constitutional law. Such was unheard of in Africa prior to the arrival of the colonials. In the absence of such, the chief of the tribe established the moral norms of the people over whom he reigned. If cannibalism was right, then those of his tribe could capture and eat anyone of another tribe. If the chief could gain wealth by the slave trade with the colonials, then capturing those of another tribe and trading them for goods from the slave traders on the coast was morally right. But when constitutional rule by law was introduced, and enforced by the colonial armies, then both the slave traders and slave trading chiefs went out of business.

It took religious conservatives in the governments of both America and Europe to banish the slave trade. The law to banish slavery was determined by the moral laws of God. When these laws were activated in society, they eventually banished slavery around the world. This was one time in history when religious conservatives won the day.

A conservative is defined by the very law of governance by which the liberal views as constantly in transition. The liberal seeks to change the constitution throughout the years, or he has forgotten the original intent by which each constitutional mandate was inscribed. In fact, throughout the history of a nation, it is almost impossible for the liberal to make contemporary judgments concerning the constitution because he views the articles of the constitution through the “moral” filter of his own liberal philosophy of life. He cannot identify with the moral conservative norms of the original writers of his constitution, for he judges that his needs, and his social environment, have changed since the original writing of the constitution.

The religious liberal maintains the same perspective in reference to his original “constitution.” He assumes that a two-thousand-year-old “constitution” of the law of God’s word is far out of date. It is not relevant to present needs. He may remain religious, but the liberal has made obsolete any “constitution” of rules that the conservative would maintain to be applicable today as it was when first written.

In this context we would compare the position of the Muslim. When Muhammad observed that the Jews were ruled by a system of Judaeo interpretations of the Jews’ original constitution (the Sinai law), he assumed that he could write his own. Therefore, as Israel was originally built upon the moral norm of the Sinai law, and thus should be a theocratic government as God intended, then he too could establish the same. If the Jews had a right to change, add to and subtract from the original constitution of the nation of Israel, then he too added his continued mandates. To the Muslim, Muhammad thus became the last of a series of prophets and lawgivers of God. His additions to God’s (Allah’s) word among men were thus sealed and final.

When Israel strayed from the mandates of their original constitution, God sent prophets to exhort them to get back on course. When that did not work over the centuries, then He sent the Assyrians and Babylonians to take them into captivity. Israel learned their lesson in captivity. However, after captivity, they were now paranoid about straying from their constitution. Subsequently, they added precept upon precept to their constitution in order to guarantee that the moral norms of the constitution be obeyed and never again broken. Muhammad just came along in the seventh century A.D. as a supposed final prophet to make additions and a change in direction and focus.

The liberal West will never understand true Islam, and for this reason, there will always be a conflict between the moral norms of the West and Islam. In order that the individual Muslim not become liberal, and thus forsake the moral and legal norms of the Islamic “constitution” (the Quran), the imams of Islam (the legal judges, as the Jewish scribes and Pharisees), enforce obedience to the mandates of the Quran.

The conservative Muslim views the West to have totally gone liberal in reference to any relationship with God (Allah). The conservative Muslim views the liberal West to be going in the direction of the pre-flood days of Noah where every person of humanity sought to live in conflict with the moral and doctrinal norms of God. And for this reason, the conservative Muslim views the West with the perspective “that every imagination of the thoughts of his [Western] heart” is only evil continually (Gn 6:5).

Those Muslims who do not view the West in this way are considered “moderate” (liberal) Muslims, and thus not real Muslims according to strict Islamic law. We may see a Muslim woman with a head scarf parading in a march of liberal Western protestors, but the conservative Muslim views the woman as an apostate who has joined those whose every imagination is wickedness in reference to the mandates of the Quran. And in reference to being consistent with his moral and doctrinal constitution in a true Islamic state, he is right. He is consistent with the teaching of the Quran.

If indeed Allah is one and Muhammad is His [final] prophet, then true Islam can be maintained only in an Islamic state wherein the constitution (the Quran) is not continually amended as individuals of the state become more liberal. There is thus the necessity for “scribes and Pharisees” (imams) in a true Islamic state in order to guarantee that the liberals of the state do not change the constitution, and consequently change the behavior of the citizens of the Islamic state.

In order to guard against the state determining the moral and doctrinal direction of His people, King Jesus separated the state from the function of His people as a heavenly kingdom. He pronounced that those citizens of His spiritual kingdom would have dual citizenship. They would have citizenship first in His kingdom, but then He said that the citizens of His kingdom must also have citizenship in kingdoms of this world. And as citizens of any earthly kingdom, the citizens of the heavenly kingdom must “be subject to the governing authorities” of the earthly kingdom (Rm 13:1). Because Jesus established a spiritual kingdom, those who were citizens of His kingdom would also be citizens of any physical kingdom of this world. Regardless of the moral condition of the physical kingdom, however, Jesus’ citizenship could live freely according to His “rule by law.”

Because the earthly governing authority seeks to establish a kingdom of peace wherein each “heavenly citizen” can function, God gave the sword exclusively to the earthly kingdom authorities (Rm 13:4). If the heavenly kingdom citizens ever try to take hold of the sword of the earthly kingdom in order to enforce their faith and morals on all citizens of the earthly kingdom, then they would be functioning outside the mandate of their heavenly King. They would be stealing freedom from those they would “convert” to freedom in Christ. In other words, if the church took hold of the sword, then the church would function in contradiction to the very principle of freedom that Jesus brought into the world.

Paul revealed a principle of freedom in the heavenly kingdom in the following words: “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1). This statement was made specifically in reference to salvational and relational matters in the heavenly kingdom. Those who would seek to live under a meritorious system of salvation by works of law would be cut off from the grace that saves (Gl 5:4). As long as civil law does not confine, work against, or subvert the law of the heavenly kingdom, then the citizens of the heavenly kingdom can live in peace. But as soon as a heavenly kingdom citizen lays his hand to a sword to enforce any religious law on all the citizens of the earthly kingdom, then he has become insubmissive to heavenly kingdom freedom.

There is the vast difference between a true Islamic state according to the Quran and Christianity. True Islam is a theocracy. Christianity is not. In an Islamic state, the state has the authority to bind Sharia law on the citizenship. In contrast to an Islamic state, a secular state guarantees freedom of religion through constitutional law. In reference to dress in an Islamic state, for example, the state would bind the hijab (head and facial covering). A secular state that is governed by constitutional law guarantees freedom, on the other hand, the women have a choice. They may wear the hijab in order to express their faith, or they may not. But if the state mandates that all women wear the hijab in order to express their faith, then the state has infringed on the religious freedom of all the citizens of the state.

The conclusion to the preceding in reference to the subject of religion is evidence of the existence of religion. Christianity is not a religion. Those who would submit to King Jesus do not propagate their faith with the sword of the state, nor with a unique dress code. This is why the Crusades of the Middle Ages did not represent Christianity, but religion in action. In order to recruit soldiers for the Crusades, the religionists of that day used the name of Christ. But this did not mean that the Crusades promoted Christ. To this day, misguided Muslims still do not understand this, for they continue to associate Christianity and Christ with the Crusades. Nevertheless, we continue to educate our Muslim friends that because Christ freed the citizens of His kingdom from any religious mandates of the state, the Crusades were an illustration of an apostate religion that used the power of the state to enforce its religious beliefs on others.

The first sign that one has moved into being a religionist is when he seeks to use the law of the state to enforce others to conform to his faith. This does not mean that Christians cannot be officials in a democratic state. But if the Christian official begins to use the authority of his office to enforce his faith on other citizens of the state, then he has become a religionist. He is no different than the Muslim official of an Islamic state.

Our efforts as restorationists are not to restore civil states. Our task is to restore the state of God’s will in the lives of citizens according to His law. We would not, therefore, confuse ourselves by thinking that if we are obedient citizens of the state, we are also good citizens of the heavenly kingdom of Jesus. One can be a faithful citizen of the heavenly kingdom even though the earthly kingdom goes in the way of wickedness as in the days of Noah (Gn 6:5). Regardless of the wickedness of the day, Noah was righteous before God. We as Christians must remain faithful to our calling regardless of the environment in which we live on this earth. After Paul had instructed the wayward brother to be cast out of the fellowship of the faithful, he exhorted the church not to condone unrighteous living, though they had to live in a world of unrighteousness. Therefore, he said to the faithful:

However, I did not at all refer to association with the fornicators of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters, for then you would have to go out of the world (1 Co 5:10).

Christians seek to remain in the world in order to be the salt and light of the world (Mt 5:13-15). Therefore, Jesus said, “Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven” (Mt 5:16).

The light that Christians shine forth to the world is the gospel that they are living. Jesus was incarnate in the flesh of man in order to give life to the world: “The bread that I will give is My flesh that I will give for the life of the world” (Jn 6:51). And for this reason, He is the light of the world. “I am the light of the world. He who follows Me will not walk in darkness, but will have the light of life” (Jn 8:12). When Christians live the gospel, they are living light and life for the world.

CHALLENGE OF THE RESTORATIONIST

All the palaver of the preceding chapter brings us to the challenge of the true restorationist. In view of what happened to the entire world’s population before Noah, and the nation of Israel, it was the work of the restorationist prophet of God in the Old Testament, and the restorationist today, to call people of faith back to the moral and doctrinal norm of the word of God. But in his efforts to deter the social and religious liberal from progressively taking the people to a destiny that leads only to doom, the restorationist has many challenges he must face. There are pits and persecution in his future because society has dug the pits and he often finds himself hidden somewhere in a cave to avoid being “cut asunder.”

In reference to faith, and in view of his mission, there can never be a restorationist who does not know the moral compass by which he is calling on people to restore. A restorationist who does not know the moral and doctrinal compass is as the blind leading the blind. If one does not know where he is calling the people, then he will never know when he gets them there.

Herein is one of the greatest deceptions of Satan. There are supposed prophets standing in pulpits around the world who are calling the people back to God and Jesus, but they have little knowledge of the Divine Compass. They do not know their Bibles. They do not study their Bibles. As a result, their call is more to membership of “their churches,” instead of calling people past themselves to the cross. These are those who are “always learning and never able to come to a knowledge of the truth” (2 Tm 3:7). They are thus blind guides who blindly lead the blind.

The true restorationist is a zealous student of the word of God, for the motive of his ministry is to call on people to return to the only source of faith that we must have in order to establish a relationship with God.

But herein a problem develops. Those who are “always learning and never able to come to a knowl- edge of the truth” will cry out that the true restorationist leader is a “liberal.” They do not understand the position of a true restorationist. What the restorationist leader is trying to do is shed all the “doctrines and traditions” of men that surround God’s standard for moral and theological direction in order to restore to the people a clear and definite compass by which the people can find their way out of religious confusion and moral confusion. Unless all the barnacles are scraped from the hull of the ship, the true ship will never sail smoothly.

In the midst of a world of religious confusion, we thank God for those Bible teachers who study their Bibles in order to come to a knowledge of the truth. They are able to separate Bible from Baal. Such religious leaders understand the plea of true restoration. Nevertheless, there are also those in the religious world who are not as noble in their desire to study the word of God (See At 17:11). Instead of calling people back to the Bible, these prophets know little Bible to which to call people, and thus they are confused with contradictory messages among themselves. Because they are confused, the people are confused because there are as many different messages proclaimed on Sunday as there are churches in every respective community.

In the midst of all this confusion, the true restorationist seeks to discard any religious tradition that would hinder us from returning to the “old paths” of God in order to enshrine His word in our hearts. The false restorationist considers sluffing off the religious traditions of our fathers the work of a “liberal.” Because the identity of his faith is defined by the uniqueness of his traditions, to forsake any religious tradition would be forsaking the religion of his father and mother. He thus uses the word “liberal” in a wrong context in his argument against the true restorationist.

To exhort the people to obey the word of God, is not legalism. To discard any religious tradition that hinders obedience to the word of God is not liberal- ism. And unless one can understand this, he will never be a true restorationist to bring the people of God back to the final norm of morals and teaching that God has given to us through Jesus Christ.

We would thus consider the following statement of Jesus to be a warning, instead of an exhortation: “He who rejects Me and does not receive My words, has one who judges him. The word that I have spoken, the same will judge him in the last day” (Jn 12:48).

Jesus and His word are the final standard by which all men will be judged (See At 17:30,31). The truly liberal would discard the word of Jesus as the final authority by which all will be judged (See Jn 12:48). When the conservative exalts Jesus and His word to be the final authority in judgment, he is by this defined to be a true restorationist. When one seeks to discard any religious tradition that would hinder all of us from restoring Jesus and His word in our lives, he is not a liberal. If one does not know the word of Jesus well enough to determine the difference between those religious traditions that mislead faith, and the word of Jesus, then that person is a blind guide, “and if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch” (Mt 15:14).

We are liberal in reference to any doctrines and religious traditions of men that would hinder us from calling the people back to the eternal norms of God. We will thus heed the following words of the Holy Spirit: “Examine yourselves as to whether you are in the faith. Test your own selves” (2 Co 13:5).

Throughout the remainder of this book you will probably judge that we are being “picky” in reference to calling the your attention to those traditions that surround the assembly of the saints and other functions of the body of Christ. But we believe that every aspect of our obedience must be brought under the scrutiny of the word of God. We must do this in order to separate religious tradition and behavior from what is actually required of us in obedience to the word of Christ. If we are afraid to sift through all our “religiosity” in order to strain out any tradition from the word of God, then we are in trouble of making religious traditions an inseparable part of our faith.

It is an axiomatic truth of history, as previously stated, that we gradually move away from God when we enshrine our religious traditions. This is particularly true in these times in the West where society is becoming increasingly liberal. As goes the culture in which we live, so goes our faith if it is not grounded on the unchanging standard of the word of God. If we are simply religious, our religion is often determined by our culture. For the liberal, social norms are the standard that dictate the beliefs and behavior of the religionists. But for those who want to stay close to God through His word, then the only option to a “barnacle free” faith is to continually reflect on the word of the One before whom we will all stand in judgment (Jn 12:48; At 17:30,31).

If we refuse to recognize the impact of social norms and traditions on our behavior and faith, then we are simply practicing “ostrich religiosity.” If we do not think that the liberal philosophy of society affects the religious behavior and beliefs of the people, then we are in trouble. When society becomes liberal, those who do not base their faith on the word of God become liberal. This is especially true of those religious groups who do not have a heritage that was built on the final authority of the word of God in matters of faith. As more “believers” move toward a doctrine of universalism in faith, the word of God becomes more obsolete as a final norm of faith.

These are times in which restorationists call people to study the history of the nation of Israel in the Old Testament. Our study of the prophets of Israel are frightful simply because they identify the social decline of a people that is so common to our world today.

GOSPEL STIMULATED WORSHIP

Here are some questions to consider in order to begin any study to determine if we have some traditions linked to our worship that could possibly hinder our efforts to restore the word of God as our final standard to guide us in worship:

- Could we worship God in a quiet meadow with David?
- Could we worship God alone in a closet?
- Could we worship alone in any isolated place?

- Could we worship God outside a “spiritual sanctuary” that was built specifically as a place of worship?
- Could we worship God without performing a system of legal ceremonies?
- Could we worship God without the sound of surrounding musical instruments?

If you answered “yes” to all of the preceding questions, then you need to be encouraged to continue on your way of worshiping God in spirit and in truth.

The unfortunate thing about the preceding questions is that many people in the religious world today cannot answer “yes” to all the questions. Being a part of a formal group in a place of designated worship, with ceremonies and instrumental sounds, is believed by many today to be essential crutches that generate worship within the worshipers. And unless they are in the environment of such, there is no inner expression of worship that is spontaneous. In some cases, emotional experientialism is confused with worship. If our worship must be generated by outside influences, then our worship cannot find a spontaneous outpouring from within our hearts.

The series of questions that we posed focus on the desires of the worshiper in reference to the One who is to be worshiped. When we speak of the gospel as the motivation that stimulates worship, we are referring to worship that is generated by the gospel. The gospel focuses on what God did for us, not on what we must receive or experience in worship.

Gospel worship is in gratitude to what God revealed through the gospel. He gave His Son freely for us without any conditions (Jn 3:16). God the Son gave up being on an equality with God in order to go to the cross for us (Ph 2:5-9). He was incarnate in the flesh of man for us (Jn 1:14). He redeemed us by His sacrificial offering. God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit did all this for us. The gospel was the revelation of how much we were loved. The more we realize this love, the more we respond in worship. The more we understand what was accomplished for us through the gospel, the less we complain about what we need in order to pour out our worshipful gratitude to God.

After being with others in worship, we must never complain, “I did not get something out of the worship.” Worship is not about getting something. It is about releasing thanksgiving. Gospel worship is never contingent on what the worshiper receives. Gospel worship has no strings attached that are necessary in order to be released. Religionists seek to get something out of worship. But gospel lovers seek to give back praise in thanksgiving for what they received through the gospel. True worship is not about getting.

When discussing the subject of worship, we must caution ourselves about ourselves. One is not driven to worship because of something that is needed, other than the need to worship. We need fellowship. We need friends. Sometimes we just need a place to go. But the gospel will not allow one to confine his worship to special places, or of necessity to be stimulated by performing legal ceremonies, burning candles, or dimming lights.

We have experienced tears of worship driving down an isolated road while singing spiritual songs to ourselves. The more we appreciate the gospel, the more worship explodes from our hearts. We need no stage props to worship the God of the gospel. In fact, the more outside stimuli one needs to worship, the more struggle he or she is having with worshiping God.

If our worship cannot be excited without all the motivational schemes and theatrical performances that are prevalent in so many assemblies in the modern church, then we must dig deep into our hearts in order to discover why we “go to worship.” We must be honest with ourselves that we are possibly “out of tune” with the gospel that generates spontaneous worship of thanksgiving.

Self-oriented worship is an oxymoron. It is contradictory. There can be no self in worship. There can be no demands for comfort, or environment, or empirical input. Worship is defined by what comes forth from our hearts as a result of a gospel outpouring to God. Worship is our appreciation for our salvation. Therefore, we must banish from our minds this thought that worship is in any way a self-sanctifying effort on our part to gain acceptance by God. All self-sanctifying performances, props, or locations cannot be conditions upon which we pour out our hearts in appreciation to God for what He did for us through the gospel.

If we struggle with our worship, and are honest with ourselves, then we will search for the true worship which God seeks. If we struggle, we grow, for struggle is the evidence that we are not satisfied with our worship. In order to grow in worship, we must discover the first requirement for acceptable worship, and this requirement is to understand the One we seek to worship. We seek to know this God of love who did so much for us in the past, and will deliver on our faith in His promises in the future.

Jesus sought to identify true worshipers with the following declaration: “God is spirit” (Jn 4:24). This one statement is enough to sweep away all the physical aids that we have treasured to be so necessary in order to generate worship within us. Gone is the necessity for special sanctuaries. Gone is the necessity to observe ceremonies that we feel we must legally perform. Gone is the necessity for all the instruments and electronic devices. Gone is even the air-conditioning and heating, with the comfortable carpets and pews. Because God is spirit, these physical things mean nothing to Him in reference to Him accepting the worship that comes from the hearts of those who are so thankful for the gospel of His Son.

“God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth” (Jn 4:24). When we discuss worship, there should be no need to interpret this statement. What the Holy Spirit says in this statement is that because God is spirit, the medium through which we approach Him must be as He is. Worship simply does not involve the physical things of this world that we often feel are necessary in order to worship God. When we understand that it was the heart of God that was nailed to the cross, then we understand that only that which comes from our hearts can be offered in worship of Him. God seeks for a spiritual response to His heart on the cross. Physical things and ceremonies have nothing to do with that which is spiritual.

These are mental and spiritual matters about which Jesus spoke to the Samaritan woman in John 4. Those things that are in our hearts (spirit) and minds (truth), are those emotional and intellectual responses that must be offered to God in appreciation for the gospel of His Son. The more emphasis we place on ourselves, the more we are distracted from the objective of our worship. The more conditions we place on ourselves in order to worship, the further we move away from the object of our worship. In other words, the more physical things we demand in order to worship, the further we move away from the God who is spirit. It is for this reason that legalized worship can never be acceptable to God. Legalized worship becomes a cloak of performance that disguises a heart that has long forgotten how to produce a tear of gratitude for the incarnational sacrifice of the Son of God.

God does not want us to be distracted from the objective of our worship. If the seating is uncomfortable, it must not be a distraction. If the singing is not in tune, this too must not be a distraction. If the atmosphere of the assembly is not conducive to our comfort, this too, must be ignored. Surrounding noise is a distraction. Worship in spirit and truth must not be distracted by the environment in which we worship. It is for this reason that worship explodes from our hearts in a quiet place in the desert because there are no distractions. Worshipers must always keep in mind that the more we desire to have crutches, props and ceremonies in order to worship, the more difficult it is to go deep into our hearts and minds to dig out appreciation for what God did for us through the gospel.

If we must go to some sanctuary, or be with certain people in order to express our gratitude for the gospel through worship, then we have cheated ourselves. At least, we have limited our worship to places and people. It is simply an axiomatic truth that the more we focus on our own desires and conveniences in order to worship, the more difficult it is to pour out our hearts in worship.

In other words, if we must do something in order to generate worship, then that which is generated may not be true worship. It may simply be an emotional stirring of our own spirit. If our worship is legalized through the performance of certain acts of worship, then we satisfy ourselves that we have fulfilled the requirements of the law. However, we often walk away from such legal worship feeling empty, unfulfilled, knowing that something is indeed wrong. We fulfilled law, but there were no tears, no remorse, and no thanksgiving for the gospel of Jesus. There is no serendipitous relief that we have emptied from the inner most recesses of our soul our gratitude to our God for His love of us through His Son.

Consider this from the perspective of what Jesus said to the Samaritan woman:

But the hour is coming and now is when the true worshipers will worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeks such to worship Him (Jn 4:23).

Understood in the historical context of when this statement was made by Jesus, the statement carries with it an incredible meaning. If we look close, this statement reveals the gospel motivation that is at the heart of the context in which He made the statement. Consider the following: First, the statement was made in view of the cross to come. We assume, therefore, that the cross to come in the life of the Samaritan woman, and thousands of others who would obey the gospel, would be a paradigm shift in worship.

Second, in the not too distant future from when Jesus made this statement, true worshipers would worship “in truth.” However, there were worshipers of God at the time the statement was made. The indication is that something different was coming that would judge one to be a “true worshiper.” What would determine “true worship” would be the motivation for worshipping, which motivation had not existed with believers from the beginning of time.

Third, the true worshiper would worship in spirit and in truth. The “spirit and truth” had to be something different than the motivation for worship that existed before Jesus came into this world. Though David and Abraham worshiped God, there would be true worshipers in the future.

Fourth, the Father would accept those who worshiped in “spirit and truth,” though He was also accepting the worship of those who had worshiped Him since the beginning of time. He accepted David’s worship, though there was a different motivation that stimulated David’s worship than the worship that was coming. It was not that God did not seek David’s worship. What Jesus was emphasizing was that there would be a different motivation for worship yet in the future.

Fifth, there were true worshipers right there at the time whom Jesus was in their midst. He was the gospel in action at that time, and would be the final revelation of the gospel at the cross, in the resurrection and in the ascension. The worship of Jesus' immediate disciples had changed in His presence. As they began to realize who He was, their worshipful response to His presence was as Thomas: "My Lord and my God" (Jn 20:28; see Mt 14:33). In the paradigm shift in worship, God would not accept legal worship according to law or locations, specifically the Sinai law. He would accept only the worship that was motivated by a recognition that Jesus is both Lord and God.

In the context of Jesus' statement of John 4:23, Jesus had listened to the Samaritan woman who explained the worship of her fathers who worshiped on "this mountain," and the worship center of the Jews in Jerusalem (Jn 4:20). But Jesus responded, "Woman, believe Me, the hour is coming when you will neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem worship the Father" (Jn 4:21).

What Jesus meant was that never again would there be a legally designated place of worship for those who believed in Jesus and obeyed the gospel. And since there would be no designated places of worship, then worship would be spontaneous anywhere and at any time.

Jesus taught that the true motive for worship would be generated at any time in the hearts of those who were driven by what was coming. And what was coming was the fulfillment of all prophecy concerning the gospel of the atoning sacrifice, glorious resurrection over death, and the consummation of the kingship of the Son of God in His ascension to the right hand of the Father. This inspiring good news (gospel) would generate worship within the hearts of those who obeyed the gospel. Those who sought God through obedience of the gospel would be those whom God would seek to be His true worshipers. No ceremonies would be needed. No purpose-built facilities, no instrumental noise, nor legally acted out ceremonies would be necessary to draw forth worship from the hearts and minds of those who bowed down in appreciation for what God had done for them through the offering of the incarnate Son of God.

GOSPEL WORSHIP

Those who walk in gratitude of the gospel of the Son of God need no official orders of worship nor commands in order to be moved to together with other worshipers. They need no choreographed ceremonies in order to fall on their faces in thanksgiving for the God who so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son. True worship is simply a spontaneous outpouring from the heart of an individual who has sensed the awesomeness of God's love that was poured out on the cross for our sins.

If Jesus were to appear before us at this very moment, we would not call for a "book of worship." We would not wait for someone to plug in a guitar. We would not call for an assembly. We would simply, reverently and fearfully, fall down on our faces in worship. It is for this very reason that any worship that does not surround the heart of men with the incarnational offering of the Son of God, cannot be worship of God according to the true worship about which Jesus spoke to the Samaritan woman in John 4. Those folks who do not often gather around the Supper of the Lord need to seriously consider this point.

When the gospel was finalized in the world, all other worship of God was nullified. Paul announced that the times of ignorance of the gospel was overlooked by God. But now God calls all men to bow down in response to the incarnational offering of His Son and in view of the coming judgment by the Son. He no longer accepts worship that is based on ignorance of who He is (At 17:22,213,30,31). All former worship became vain and obsolete when Jesus ascended to the Father. All other worship before the ascension was not based on the gospel by which we are saved. A wrong motive for worship since the cross, resurrection and ascension, cannot produce an acceptable worship of the God who gave His only begotten Son. No worship is true if it bypasses the truth of the gospel of Jesus.

This brings us to a better understanding of Jesus' rebuke of the scribes and Pharisees: "In vain they worship Me, teaching as doctrines the commandments of men" (Mk 7:7). The scribes and Pharisees not only tried to worship God legally by law, they also added their own religious rites in order to guarantee that their worship would supposedly be accepted. Unfortunately, in making all their additions of traditions, they forgot the law. As a result, they self-righteously worshiped according to their own religious rites (Rm 10:1-3; see Mk 7:1-9). They were as the Athenians who worshiped what they imagined in their minds and fashioned with their hands (At 17:24,25).

We learn a very important point from the scribes and Pharisees: There is no legal formula devised by man that would constitute true worship. Acceptable worship does not result from the performance of any legal ceremonies of worship. Worship cannot be legally acted out. The reasons for this is in the fact that we cannot keep law perfectly in order to justify our worship before God according to law. The scribes and Pharisees tried this. They were masters at creating acts of worship after the traditions of the fathers. They surrounded the Sinai law with so many ceremonial acts of obedience that the law was certainly obeyed in all its legal requirements. However, the original intent of the law was forgotten. Subsequently, their worship was in vain. We are forced to the conclusion that true worship of God can never be accomplished by any legal performances on the part of the worshipers to legally perform worship. True worship is simply not a performance of acting out laws, whether laws from God or our own laws. And from the Greeks, we learn that worship cannot be made acceptable through the construction of great temples and religious idols we would make with our hands.

The reason for this conclusion is obvious. Once the assembled worshipers accomplish certain legal acts of worship, then they feel they can go on their way from the “hour of worship” with the deceived notion that they have legally worshiped the Father in spirit and in truth. What Jesus was stating in the context of John 4 was that “in spirit” and “in truth” does not refer to actions or places of legal worship, but to responses. What He meant by using the phrase “in truth” was not the establishment of a legal system of worship ceremonies. He was revealing what God was at the time preparing through the One who was standing before the Samaritan woman. He was preparing Jesus for the cross. Jesus was the truth through whom all men must come to the Father in spirit. He was the revelation of the Word to man, which revelation would inspire worshipful hearts to give praise to God (Jn 1:1,2). The gospel, therefore, inspires worship. Gospel worship is a response to the gospel of Jesus.

In both phrases of John 4:24, Jesus was leading His audience to the cross, resurrection and to His ascension to be King over all things. Through the cross, He was leading the people to the heart of God, and thus, the true motivation that would generate true worshipers. True worship would always be an inward response to God who outwardly put His heart on the cross. No outward performances or creations of our hands could take the place of the heart of men who would worshipfully respond to the heart of God.

We must view worship “in truth” from the perspective of how Paul defended the gospel against those who wanted to continue to worship legally according to law. These were those who were denying the “truth of the gospel” by preaching a gospel of legal justification (Gl 1:6-9).

Paul’s use of the phrase “truth of the gospel” in the Galatian letter would be misinterpreted by the legalist, those to whom Paul wrote to rebuke. The “truth of the gospel” was being denied because there were those in Jerusalem and Galatia who sought to bring the disciples under certain laws in order that they be legally justified before God (See At 15:1; Gal 2:5). When Peter and others in Antioch “were not straightforward about the truth of the gospel,” Paul declared that they were behaving contrary to the gospel of freedom by which Christians have been set free. We have been set free from the necessity of perfect law-keeping in order to be saved (Gl 2:14). This is the principle of the “truth of the gospel” that we must apply to every aspect of our Christian walk, including worship. The sufficient justification of Jesus for our sins set us free from the necessity of justifying ourselves through any system of meritorious law-keeping.

In reference to worship, the legalist would assume that the phrase “truth of the gospel” must be a legal outline of ceremonies to be performed for acceptable worship. He assumes, therefore, that worship “in truth” is worship according to a legal outline of law, and thus, one must meritoriously worship according to the laws of the outline. The legalist thus formulates a legal system of lawful actions that worshipers must ceremonially perform in order to lawfully worship according to the “truth.” All other worshipers who do not perform the outline of lawful worship are judged to be worshipping in vain because the prescribed “laws of worship” are either violated or ignored.

If Peter’s actions in Antioch were not according to the “truth of the gospel,” then we must consider that some worship is not “in truth” because it is also not according to “the truth of the gospel.” According to Paul’s argument to those in Galatia who were enforcing justification by law-keeping, he first identified these enforcers to be preaching “another gospel” (Gl 1:6-9). This was a “gospel” that was based on the same erroneous premise as the legalistic Jewish brethren who would bind on Christians meritorious acts of obedience that would supposedly justify one before God (See At 15:1).

What the “other-gospel” preachers had failed to see was the primary premise upon which Paul based the entirety of his argument. It was an argument against meritorious law-keeping that denied the truth of the gospel. The premise of his argument was based on one resounding principle of the truth of the gospel. Paul revealed this truth: “A man is not justified by law” (Gl 2:16). To the Roman disciples, he was more emphatic: “Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith [in the gospel of grace] apart from works of law” (Rm 3:28). In other words, through the perfect keeping of any law, including the law of Christ, one cannot justify himself before God. The reason for this truth is axiomatic in that no man can either live or worship perfectly according to law (See Rm 3:23).

The gospel set us free from the necessity of perfect law-keeping in order to be justified before God. Peter’s actions in Antioch of withdrawing from the Gentiles because he was intimidated by those who sought to enforce law-keeping in order to be saved (At 15:1), was an action that was contrary to our freedom from justifying ourselves through perfect law-keeping. For this reason, therefore, his behavior, with Barnabas and other Jews in Antioch who withdrew from the Gentiles, was not according to the gospel of freedom that we have in Christ.

Some have sought to dodge the force of what the Holy Spirit said in the statements of Galatians 2:16 and Romans 3:28. They have sought to follow some translators who slipped the definite article “the” into the text of both passages in order that the text read, “the law.” In doing this they have sought to divert the power of Paul’s argument away from us by presumptuously assumption that Paul was speaking specifically of the Sinai law. But Paul was addressing any law by which we might presume we can justify ourselves before God apart from His grace. By works of any law, it is not possible to justify oneself before God simply because no man can keep any system of law perfectly.

It is true that the Sinai law is dead and gone (Rm 7:1-4). We know that we are not under the Sinai law. Under that law, the scribes and Pharisees sought to legally, and thus, meritoriously worship God through a self-imposed system of religious rites. However, Jesus judged that their worship was in vain because they sought to worship God legally according to the strictness of law-keeping.

The problem was not in the Sinai law, but in how they sought to implement the law in their lives. In order to keep the law in the strictness of its precepts, the Jews added precept upon precept in order that the law be kept. This was vitally important to those of the religion of Judaism. They believed that meritorious obedience to law indebted God to justify them before Him. But Jesus judged this system of law-keeping to be in vain (See Mk 7:1-9).

If we would today seek to worship according to the same system of meritorious law-keeping, then we would receive the same judgment that Jesus pronounced upon the scribes and Pharisees. We would be denying the truth of the gospel (Gl 2:5,24; Cl 1:5). The inherent fallacy of worshiping God according to a self-justifying system of law is that “all have sinned” (Rm 3:23). But the gospel revealed God’s righteousness “that He might be just and the justifier of him who believes in Jesus” (Rm 3:26).

The contradiction within the theology of those who seek to worship God according to a meritorious system of law is that Jesus set Christians free from meritorious worship by law. But this does not mean that the worshiper has a right to worship God without lawfully doing so according to His instructions. If one would seek to worship without any knowledge of God, then we are worshiping ignorantly. This point is certainly in the meaning of what Paul wrote concerning the vain worship in which the Jews involved themselves.

For they being ignorant of God’s righteousness [justification] and seeking to establish their own righteousness [justification], have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God (Rm 10:2).

In the letter to the Romans, Paul gave the example of Abraham who was not justified by works of law when he was called on by God to walk by faith (Rm 4:1-3). He then applied Abraham’s principle of faith as an example for all those who would attempt to be meritoriously justified before God according to law, including any legal system of worship as was practiced by the scribes and Pharisees who tried such, but ended up worshipping in vain (Mk 7:1-9).

We must apply Paul’s conclusion to those who would deny the truth of the gospel in their efforts to meritoriously worship God as the scribes and Pharisees. Paul thus wrote, “Now to him who works [meritoriously in worship], the reward is not credited according to grace, but according to debt” (Rm 4:4). Herein is legal worship a denial of the truth of the gospel of grace, and thus another gospel. If one, as the scribes and Pharisees, would seek to meritoriously worship God according to law, then he would be putting God in debt to accept his worship. Once the legal performance of ceremonies was concluded with a “closing prayer,” then the worshiper would go on his way, having obligated God to accept his legally performed ceremonies of worship. This is a denial of the truth of the gospel. This was not the worship “in truth” that Jesus revealed to the Samaritan woman.

The gospel of Jesus on the cross set us free from the meritorious works of law unto death. We have not ...

... received a spirit of bondage again to fear [of breaking law], but you have received a spirit of adoption [through the gospel of Jesus] by which we cry [in worshipful thanksgiving], 'Abba, Father!' (Rm 7:15).

Christians worship because they have been redeemed from the curse of meritorious law-keeping (Gl 3:10). The curse of law is that we are all lawbreakers, and thus, we all fall legally under the condemnation of law that punishes lawbreakers.

At the conclusion of the argument on this matter, Paul reminded the Roman disciples that because of the gospel, nothing can separate us from the love of God that was revealed on the cross (Rm 8:31-39). We worship God in response to this gospel of grace. If our worship is not perfect according to law, we are still accepted by God. He will not cast us away if we worship imperfectly according to law. Therefore, we do not worship God in order to put Him in debt to accept our worship.

True worship in spirit needs no law to cry out, "Abba, Father." If we would attempt to resort to a law of worship in order to self-sanctify ourselves, and thus put God in debt to accept our worship, then we are no better than the scribes and Pharisees. Paul is so adamant about this point that he reminded the Galatians, "You have been severed from Christ, you who seek to be justified by law. You have fallen from grace" (Gl 5:4). In other words, if we seek to legally worship God according to a "perfect" meritorious system of law, then we have denied the gospel of grace. If we presume to obligate God to accept our legally performed worship, and justify us on the basis of our legal worship, then we have denied the gospel of grace.

If we assume that our worship is legally perfect, then there would be no need for grace in reference to our worship. If we lead ourselves to believe that we have meritoriously performed laws of worship perfectly, then we have deceived ourselves. We are not worshipping straightforwardly according to the truth of the gospel. Our worship is thus not according to the truth of the gospel. It is not "in truth." We are thus seeking to be obedient to another gospel than the gospel that sets us free from the necessity of perfect law-keeping in reference to worship (See Gl 5:1).

Consider the fact that the interpretation of some in reference to "in spirit" and "in truth" establish a paradox. It is correctly understood that "in spirit" refers to the spiritual outpouring of one's heart in response to the gospel. However, it is also assumed that "in truth" refers to an outward performance of ceremonial acts of worship according to law. Herein is the paradox. The points of the outlined worship can be performed without any "spirit" being involved. It is assumed that if one would simply go through the outline of acts, then God is obligated to accept our worship. However, if our performance of the outlined acts of worship are used to generate a "spiritual" response in worship, then the outline becomes the crutch upon which we strive to generate a worshipful spirit. We never consider the fact that if one "act" of the outline cannot be performed, then we assume that our worship is not complete. It cannot be complete until all the dots are connected on the outlined acts of worship.

We need a reality check on what we are actually saying. Suppose we lived in a jungle or desert and did not have access to bread or fruit of the vine for the Supper. Does this mean that we could never worship God "in truth" until all the performances of the outline are completed, which would include the Supper? We sometimes forget that worship is based on love because the worshiper is responding to the love of God what was poured out through the incarnational offering of His Son. It is love that should generate worship, not legal conformity to an outline of legal ceremonies.

It is easy for love to stand outside the "church house" when assemblies are simply a legal performance of acts of worship. We often forget that it is the gospel of God's love that brings us together to celebrate the grace by which we have been set free. Christians love one another because God loved them through the gospel of the cross (Jn 3:16; 1 Jn 4:19). However, assemblies, according to law, often do not reflect love among the attendees. It is for this reason that thousands of people leave assemblies today without experiencing love. They faithfully and ceremoniously go through a system of legal assembly laws, but they experienced no love, even from fellow spectators sitting at their sides. We sincerely do not think that this is what the Lord had in mind when He encouraged the disciples to assemble with one another in order to stir up love and good works (Hb 10:24,25).

Therefore, we must seek to restore the assembly of love by which we are to be identified as the people of a God of love (Jn 13:34,35). It is gospel assemblies as this that we seek to "attend." Love "mandates" that we worship because we want to, not because we have to according to the mandates of law. Confidence in our worship is measured by tears, not by some checked off point on a legal outline of worship.

LEGALIZED WORSHIP

Because the Christian is justified by faith in the grace of God, he or she cannot worship God contrary to the gospel of grace. “Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of law” (Rm 3:28). In fact, the Holy Spirit proclaimed, “By works of law no flesh will be justified” (Gl 2:16). The Holy Spirit’s message is that because we cannot obey law perfectly, we cannot be justified before God through law without grace.

It is a contradiction to assume that we can establish an outward recognizable system of worship according to perfect law-keeping in order to self-justify ourselves inwardly after we have performed a designated system of laws of worship. It is impossible to establish a performance of supposed worship laws whereby we feel that we have justified ourselves for the week if we have legally performed the laws of worship perfectly. The religious leaders of Israel tried this, but to no avail. It led them to a hypocritical behavior. They would perform their legal acts of worship outwardly, but inwardly they were full of dead men’s bones (Mt 23:27). Once we realize that we cannot be justified by a legalized worship, then we will focus totally on the grace of God who put His Son on the cross.

If we are justified by faith through the grace of the gospel, then there is no need for a legal system of worship in order to supposedly guarantee that our justification before God is secured through a perfect performance of some system of legalities. How can those who have been set free from attempted justification through perfect law-keeping, bring themselves again under law in order to supposedly worship God perfectly according to law?

There was never a legal system of worship established in the New Testament by which worshipers could compare one system of supposedly lawful worship with another. Worship is generated in our hearts when we realize the crucifixion of the heart of God on the cross. The response to this gospel does not produce a legalized worship. If we seek to do such, then our hearts are moved away from the gospel of grace in order to focus on whether we have legally performed our legal worship. If we are focusing on our legal worship performances, then we digress into arguments over how the legal ceremonies are performed during our legal assemblies.

Legalized worship often leads to two “categories” of worship in our thinking and behavior. First, there is the supposedly lawful worship that is conducted by the performance of certain acts of worship in an “official” assembly. This worship is usually conducted on Sunday morning, which is supposedly the official time of worship.

Second, there is the worship that is performed outside the “official” worship on Sunday morning. The legalized worship must be performed with the completion of certain acts of worship. The other worship can be accomplished without performing the acts of official worship during the “hour of worship.” Therefore, one is “official” and the other can exist without the restrictions of ceremonial laws.

There could possibly be a third “partial” worship that is conducted during an “official” assembly when there is no fruit of the vine or bread present to conduct the “act” of the Supper. In some cases, when there is no money to be contributed, we might feel that our self-sanctifying act of worship was not complete because we were personally unable to perform the act of contribution in worship. We have come across many brethren who have no Bibles. They have little teaching in their assemblies because the Bible is absent from the assembly. The only Bible they may have may be with the preacher who is on a mission somewhere else in the region.

The reason for reminding ourselves of these realities is to reveal our inconsistencies, if not our Pharisaical definition of legalized worship. Worship from our hearts can more often be determined by a tear in the eye than a fat check thrown into the collection plate. Whether in an “official” assembly, or alone in the wilderness, it is the tear that reveals to God a contrite heart of worship.

A good example of the division that legalized worship can often cause was illustrated on a visit we once made to the country of Malawi. We were in Malawi, attending a meeting of several Christians in the area who had come together for a seminar on the Bible. During the weekend meeting, a wise elder of the sponsoring church group stood up to administer the Supper of the Lord. When it came time to serve the fruit of the vine, he realized that there were many in the assembly who had caused contention on whether we could use one cup or many cups in the “legal” service of the Supper to distribute the fruit of the vine among the people. So he wisely had in his hand one large pitcher that he referred to as “the cup.” He said to the audience, “Jesus took the cup.” The wise old elder then said, “Because there are so many of us here today, we will distribute the contents of the cup by using many cups I have before me here.” He then poured the contents of “the cup” into the many cups, and then served the multitude.

Some in the audience immediately saw the inconsistencies that we have created by legalizing acts of worship in the assembly. The contention among some was often based on legal performances of law, while at the same time they forgot the gospel that the bread and fruit of the vine represented. They forgot the gospel in their contention to remember the gospel, and thus revealed that they were not living by the gospel in arguing over legal worship ceremonies.

We wonder how many there are who have brought themselves into contention with one another over legal worship, and thus, denied the truth of the gospel of grace by which we are justified before God. To such people we would make the same statement that Paul made to some brethren in Jerusalem who were claiming that there were brethren who were worshipping in vain because they had not been circumcised “according to law”: “To whom we did not yield in subjection even for an hour, so that the truth of the gospel might continue with you” (Gl 2:5).

Of course some might object and declare that there would be those who would not partake of the Supper unless they were under law to do so. Some judge that others are worshipping in vain because they are not partaking of the Supper every first day of the week as they suppose the law states. But there is no such law. Acts 20:7 is not an imperative statement of command. If we would change an example into a command, then we have twisted the Scriptures.

Jesus indeed said, “Do this in remembrance of Me” (Lk 22:19). At the time He made this statement, however, the disciples understood little about what He was saying. They had little understanding of the cross that was going to take place only a few hours after He made this statement. In other words, there was nothing yet to be remembered in reference to the gospel other than Himself who was at the time headed for the cross.

However, after the cross, and seven weeks after this meeting in an upper room, on the day of Pentecost and by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, they knew the whole story (Jn 14:26). It was then that they needed no commandment to do that about which Jesus spoke to them in the infancy of their legal religiosity on the night He took the cup and bread. The cross had set them free from perfect law-keeping. From Pentecost on, they wanted to “eat and drink,” not because of law, but because of a worshipful thanksgiving of what Jesus had poured out on the cross for them. Those who neglect the Supper, therefore, fail to understand as blood-cleansed saints, the significance of the cross. We must remember that we are driven to the table of the Supper because of thanksgiving, not because of law.

However, if we do yield to legal matters where God never established such, then we are thinking that we can be justified by our own perfect law-keeping on Sunday morning, and not by the grace of the cross. If this is the case, then we are obligating God to accept our worship on the basis of how perfectly we have kept our legal acts of worship. We are obligating God to forgive our sins on the basis of our legal performance to partake of the Supper. What we have done is shift the atonement for our sins from the cross to our meritorious obedience to the “law of the Supper.” We forget that we have been forgiven, and thus we partake. We do not partake in order to be forgiven. If we are observing law in order to meritoriously justify ourselves, then we are not living according to the truth of the gospel that set us free from self-justification through perfect keeping of law.

Another example to consider in this context is what happened in Antioch when some “circumcision brethren” came up from Jerusalem to bind law where God had not bound. They came to intimidate Peter and the other Jewish brethren who were in fellowship with the “uncircumcised” Gentile brethren. Peter, Barnabas and the Jewish brethren of Antioch were carried away with hypocrisy on this occasion. They had previously affirmed that they lived according to the truth of the gospel of freedom from justification through law-keeping. But when they were intimidated by the legalistic circumcision brethren from Jerusalem to withdraw from the Gentile brethren, they were living contrary to the truth of the gospel. Paul made the following direct statement about this behavior: “... I saw that they were not straightforward about the truth of the gospel ...” (Gl 2:14).

If someone from Jerusalem would by chance visit our assembly on Sunday, and there was no bread or fruit of the vine available, would we as Peter and the other Jewish brethren in Antioch, be embarrassed because we were fellowshiping with one another because there was no bread or fruit of the vine?

When we deny the gospel by legally trying to worship God according to the perfect execution of law, we are not being straightforward about the truth of the gospel of grace and freedom from the necessity of keeping law perfectly. The actions of Peter and others placed them in a situation of being condemned before God. Likewise, by our actions we can also deny the gospel by which we are seeking to live if we succumb to the intimidation of legalists who would bind perfect law-keeping where God has justified us already by His grace. If we seek to justify ourselves through “Supper-keeping” apart from grace, then we are as the scribes and Pharisees who bound perfect law-keeping where God did not bind. As Peter, Barnabas, and the rest of those who withdrew from the Gentiles in Antioch, we would be denying the truth of the gospel. However, if we do such, we pray that someone will do for us as Paul did with Peter: “I opposed him to his face because he stood condemned” (Gl 2:11). Peter stood condemned because he succumbed to those who would bind perfect law-keeping as a means of salvation.

Christians worship God according to the instructions of His word. They do not do so to be justified before Him because they presume to keep His instructions perfectly. In fact, they pour out their hearts in thanksgiving to God for their justification at the cross because they realize they cannot keep perfectly all the instructions. True worship is offered in thanksgiving for the God of grace who has saved us from the necessity of perfect law-keeping in order to have our worship accepted. It is for this reason that we are moved to the table of the Lord. We are not moved there by law, but by an overwhelming appreciation for the grace of God that was revealed through the sacrificial offering of the incarnate Son of God. Those who neglect, or even marginalize the Supper of the Lord, have not yet understood the heart of God that was nailed to the cross on our behalf. They have usually focused their attention on the performance of their religious ceremonies in order to entertain themselves at the expense of remembering the Lord in His Supper.

ASSEMBLIES THAT REFLECT LOVE

There is something that is dramatically different between the assemblies of the early Christians and the typical assemblies that are common in the religious world today. This difference is interesting because of where we are in our assembly culture today and where the early Christians were in their participatory gospel assemblies wherein individuals with the gifts of the Holy Spirit were given an opportunity to edify the body.

We must not forget that the regular assemblies in the early church were small groups of disciples who met in the homes of the members (See At 2:46; Rm 16:5; 1 Co 16:19; Cl 4:15,16). There were possibly only a few large assemblies as we witness today, simply because the early Christians had no large facilities in which to meet. They met from house to house, for there were no purpose-built church buildings, no civic halls or school auditoriums in which to meet. Their assemblies thus reflected their personal relationships with one another in a spirit of love. We must always keep this in mind as we approach the New Testament in reference to the function of the disciples in any New Testament assembly. If we do not do this, we will miss a correct understanding of the function of the body of Christians as it is addressed in the New Testament. We will distort the meaning of those texts that speak of the relationship the early disciples were exhorted to have with one another, as well as when they came together in assembly.

The first premise upon which we must study this subject is to understand that the early Christians’ com- mon obedience to the gospel was reflected in their participatory function with one another when they came together in the assembly of their homes (See At 2:44-47). It may be that some had bound on themselves the assembly structure of the unbelievers, and subsequently never instituted the “one another” participatory function that should naturally result from believers who have obeyed the unifying gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, those who understood the implications of the gospel carried out their unity with one another when they came together.

Because they were only five to six years in the faith, it seems that the new Christians in Corinth were having some trouble in their early relationships with one another. They were behaving in their house assemblies as the pagan unbelievers of the local temple in Corinth. They were behaving as such because in their infancy as disciples, they had not yet been perfected in love. Their assembly with one another was dysfunctional because their love for one another was dysfunctional.

The instructions of 1 Corinthians 11-14 were written on the background of the dysfunctional assembly behavior of novice Christians who had not yet spiritually grown in love. Because they had not grown in love, love was not reflected for one another when they came together in assembly. We assume that the instructions of the context were directed toward their common meeting in their homes. However, there is textual evidence that the assembly about which Paul wrote was an occasional meeting that all the disciples throughout the province of Achaia had when they all came together into one place. The statements of 1 Corinthians 14 seem to indicate this occasional provincial meeting when “the whole assembly gathers in one place” (1 Co 14:23).

Since the letters of both 1 and 2 Corinthians were directed to all the Christians in Achaia, we would assume that Paul’s instructions in 1 Corinthians 11-14 were in reference to the provincial meetings that took place occasionally in the city of Corinth (See 1 Co 16:15; 2 Co 1:1; 9:1,2; 11:10; compare 1 Th 1:7,8). It was this occasional assembly that some were corrupting with their unloving sectarianism and competitive use of their gifts (See 1 Co 1:12,13).

Some were behaving in the provincial meeting as those unbelievers who behaved in the pagan feast meetings at the temple. The assemblies of unbelievers of the provincial religionists were exclusive. They were the opportunity for self-exalting speakers to seize the opportunity of any gathering to voice their opinions, become unruly, or take up a contribution. Some of the arrogant and self-appointed leaders among the disciples in Achaia were behaving in the same way during the assemblies of the disciples, especially those who were gifted with languages.

Though Paul’s instructions were possibly directed to large assemblies, the instructions would also apply to the regular weekly assemblies in their homes. In fact, the unruly behavior in the regular house assemblies would have brought on even more disruption to the participatory environment of the home meetings.

This is a common challenge today when those who are accustomed to large “church assemblies” come into the context of a house fellowship. They naturally bring their behavior of the large assembly into the participatory environment of a house fellowship. In the context of the Corinthians, it seems that some were doing the same. They were bringing the drunken feast behavior of the common temple assembly into the assemblies of the disciples. In doing so, they had even turned the Supper of the Lord into a drunken ordeal wherein those who traveled from great distances throughout the province were ignored by the gluttonous behavior of those who ate all the food of the love feast before everyone arrived (See 1 Co 11:17-22). They were behaving as they did when they were involved in the drunken and gluttonous temple feast.

But the Holy Spirit would have none of this in the context of the members of the body in any assembly of the disciples. He thus corrected the Corinthian dysfunctional assemblies by correcting those who were walking contrary to the gospel of love and unity (1 Co 1:10).

Through His instructions of rebuke, He mandated that the assemblies of the disciples should be inclusive. The eating of the love feast was to be inclusive, and reflective of their love for one another.

The partaking of the Lord’s Supper was to be inclusive. The ministry of their gifts for edification was to be inclusive of all who were gifted to exhort the body. And because the assemblies were to be inclusive, the assemblies were to be based on the members’ consideration for one another (See Hb 10:24,25). The following statement of the Spirit voiced this inclusive participatory “order”: “When you come together, every one of you has a psalm, has a teaching, has a language, has a revelation, has an interpretation” (1 Co 14:26).

The assumption of the statement is that every gifted person was to be given the opportunity to exhort the assembled body. However, if one gifted with speaking in languages was present without one gifted with interpretation, then the one speaking in languages was to remain silent. No one who spoke in a language that only he could understand was allowed to speak in the assembly.

On the background of the first century miraculous gifts of ministry, the assemblies of the early disciples were always to be inclusive of each gifted attendee for the benefit of the whole body. In any individual assembly, “everyone” who was present did not have the gift of languages or the gift of interpretation, or some other gift. In order to emphasize this point, Paul presented questions in chapter 12 that the Corinthians, as well as we, could correctly answer: “Are all prophets?” (1 Co 12:29). The answer is, NO. “Are all teachers?” (1 Co 12:29). NO. “Do all speak with languages?” (1 Co 12:30). NO. It is not that there were those in every assembly who had something to say, or must use their endowed gift for the benefit of the whole. However, since the gifts were to be used for the benefit of others than the gifted, in every assembly where the gifted were present, there must be made an opportunity for the gifted to exercise their gifts for the “profit of all” (1 Co 12:7).

The early Christians were meeting in small assemblies in homes in order that the gifted be brought into direct contact with those who needed the ministry of the gifts. In such communicative assemblies, not all the gifted individuals were always present to use their gift for the edification of the body. However, at least everyone had the opportunity to receive edification when a gifted person was present.

If there were those in every assembly who had something to say, then they were to be given the opportunity to exercise their gift for the edification of the whole body. Assemblies that did not give an opportunity for any prophet, teacher, or speaker in languages, to speak, became exclusive. In the Corinthian context, the prophets (teachers) were being marginalized by those who prided themselves with their gift of languages. This was the problem in some house assemblies of the Corinthians. Some assemblies, therefore, become exclusive and competitive, if not rude and offensive. From what we understand from the Holy Spirit, instructions in the context of 1 Corinthians 11-14 teach one very important principle: No one gifted person in the assembly has a right to dominate the assembly.

The problem in Corinth was that some of the assemblies became exclusive because there were those who were behaving as they did in their former temple assemblies as unbelievers. In this particular situation, there were those who were trying to dominate the assembly of the saints by the use of their particular gift. Because of pride, those who spoke in languages wanted to use the assembly as an opportunity to boast in the use of their gift.

Competition among gifted individuals disrupted the unity of all the believers. There was competition between those who were gifted with languages and those who were gifted with teaching (prophets). In this particular situation in Corinth, the prophets and “tongue speakers” were causing confusion because both were in competition with one another as to who would dominate the house assembly and draw the attention of those who were present. We can only imagine how offensive this became as one teacher always dominated the group, while other teachers in the same house assembly had to sit in silence.

Compare this with our common large assembly scenario today. One prophet (teacher) shows up with his message to be shared with the whole assembly. During the assembly, he is given the sole opportunity to dominate the assembly with what he has prepared to say, while other teachers, who may have a message, are not allowed to share their prepared message. In the same manner, a single song leader comes with his list of songs by which he dominates the singing of the assembly with the songs he has chosen to sing. All other song leaders are silenced because of one dominate song leader. Other songs that are on the hearts of the members are not given an opportunity to be expressed.

There was certainly a difference between the large temple assembly in the first century and the large church assembly today. Nevertheless, the leadership behavior that is cultured by large assemblies does not do well when brought into the small assembly of a home. The leaders of large assemblies often have a difficult time transforming into the participatory culture of a small group meeting. Some of the Corinthians were having a difficult time in this area. Nevertheless, they had to move from the customary large temple assembly culture of their former years in temple religion into the small house assemblies of the saints without behaving as they did in the temple assemblies.

In large assemblies, it is necessary to place limitations on how many gifted people can minister their gifts to the body of people who have gathered at any particular time. But this necessity must not move us to overlook the assemblies of the early church to whom the Holy Spirit gave the instructions of 1 Corinthians 11-14. The problem was that the majority of the gifted were required to sit continually in silence. When this happens, both spiritual and numerical growth are stymied because gifted members cannot use their gifts for the edification of the body.

One common answer to this problem for large assemblies today is to give an opportunity for all gifted individuals to use their gifts at different assemblies. In this way no one person is allowed to silence any other person who has the same gift. It should be the objective of the whole body to encourage every gifted member of the whole body to use their gifts for the edification of the whole body, though the exercising of the gifts does not necessarily have to be at the same assembly.

Sometimes the problem arises when a gifted member would rather sit in silence while others use their gifts to the edification of the body. If this is the situation, then the “silent sitter” must be exhorted not to bury his talent, but to use it for the edification of the body.

In order to maintain order, the assemblies of unbelievers designated those who would participate in an assembly. If there were no order of assembly of unbelievers, chaos often prevailed in the assemblies. We must keep in mind that it is not wrong to have an order of assembly. However, if the order is to prevent disunity in a Christian assembly, then we must go deeper into the problem of why disunity would prevail among those who are supposed to be living the gospel of Jesus. This is exactly what Paul did when he wrote on the subject of love in 1 Corinthians 13.

We must also keep in mind that some order of assembly is necessary for large assemblies. However, we often forget that the instructions of 1 Corinthians were given to those who were meeting in small assemblies in the homes of the members. The common assembly today is often composed of hundreds, if not thousands. In order to prevent chaos in these assemblies, there must be orders of assembly. But this was not the historical context in Corinth among the house assemblies. Paul’s instructions to correct the Corinthian problems in assembly must be understood in the context that the members were meeting in small groups throughout the province of Achaia. The same would be true of the assemblies of the disciples wherever there were Christians in the first century.

In our efforts to prevent assembly disunity in large assemblies, we have incorporated orders of assembly. Such orders were necessary in the assembly function of the first century unbelievers, which assemblies often became chaotic as the one in the temple of Artemis (Diana) in Ephesus when Paul once visited the city (See Ep 19:28,29). However, in our Western institutional obsession with order, we have forgotten one very important point that brought order to the assemblies of the early disciples without becoming exclusive of “everyone” who would come to the assembly to minister a prayer, a song, a message, etc. The most important “order of assembly” that brought order to the assemblies of the early disciples was written on their hearts. Love was written on their hearts, and thus love prevailed when they came together in assembly.

We must think for a moment on this point because our common assemblies today are so far removed from the early church “order of love.” To begin, we must ask why did the Holy Spirit place the greatest chapter in the Bible on love right in the middle of His instructions on how the assemblies of the members were to function? 1

Corinthians 13 is not there because it was time for the Spirit in the document of 1 Corinthians to complete a legal outline on doctrine. It is there because there was dysfunction on the part of some in the assembly who sought to selfishly dominate the assembly with their particular gift. They were not behaving in their assemblies according to the gospel of love.

Some gifted individuals wanted to exclude others from using their gifts in the assembly. A teacher wanted to present the only lesson of the assembly. The song leader wanted to sing only his list of songs. Our inquiry is how the Spirit, who determined the distribution of the gifts (1 Co 12:6,11), corrected their assembly dysfunction in view of the principle that “everyone” must be given the opportunity to exercise his gift when the disciples come together in one place.

According to 1 Corinthians 13, the Spirit’s “order of assembly” was based on the gospel of love by which the members of the body in assembly were to relate with one another. Paul wrote, “Love suffers long and is kind. Love does not envy. Love does not exalt itself, is not puffed up” (1 Co 13:4). 1 Corinthians 13, therefore, must first be understood and applied in the context of how Christians are to relate with one another in an assembly context. After identifying the Corinthians’ disorder when they came together, Paul introduced love-organized assemblies with the statement, “And yet I show to you a more excellent way” (1 Co 12:31).

LOVE – ORGANIZED ENCOUNTERS

Here is how we should interpret the instructions of 1 Corinthians 13 in the context of Paul’s guidelines of love:

Love suffers long when several prophets speak on and on because they have something heavy on their hearts. Love does not jump up and say, “It’s my turn.” Love does not sit there and listen, while thinking, “I could teach better than him.” Love does not say, “I wish I were better than him.” Love is not puffed up and says, “I am a better song leader,” or, “I can word a better prayer” or “I can preach that subject better.” Love does not dominate the assembly by exalting one’s gift above others.

When the gospel of loving others as Jesus loved us is made the foundation of any assembly of the disciples, then order always prevails in the assembly.

The gifted must remember that their gift is given to them by the Holy Spirit. The gift is not given to exalt one’s self in the presence of others, neither is the gift given in order that the receiver might seek to self-sanctify himself by the use of the gift. It is given in order to minister to others. Love does not say, “We need to sing more songs because we sing in order to be right before God.” Leading singing is for the benefit of others, not for one’s self. In any assembly of the saints, it is the love of the saints for one another that brings order to all assemblies. We minister our gifts for the love of others, not for the purpose of putting ourselves on display before others. “The manifestation of the Spirit is given to everyone to profit all” (1 Co 12:7). (Some preachers need to rethink this point.)

Love encourages all things to “be done for edification” (1 Co 14:26). Love prevents chaos because there is consideration for one another as members encourage love and good works (See Hb 10:24,25). When others are speaking, love is considerate to be silent and listen (1 Co 14:28). So to all the teachers, Paul wrote, “For you can all prophesy one by one so that all may learn and all may be exhorted” (1 Co 14:31).

In early house assemblies, there was given the opportunity for all those who had a message to share with the group. No one teacher excluded any other teacher by dominating the stage with his message. If more than one teacher was present, then no one teacher was to dominate the assembly. The order was “one by one,” not one excluding the others by exalting his gift over the others. It is assumed from Paul’s instructions, that those who were gifted with teaching had to be given an opportunity to teach.

When assemblies are inclusive, then they become totally different from the chaotic assemblies of unbelievers. Love inherently brings order. “For God is not a God of confusion [as in the pagan assemblies], but of peace, as in all the assemblies of the saints” (1 Co 14:33). When “all the assemblies of the saints” function in peace, then the world can see that there is something different about those who assemble in peace (See 1 Pt 3:15).

(Some will agree that there is no possible way for the disciples to implement all the instructions of 1 Corinthians 11-14 in the assemblies of the typical modern large-assembly church. Now we are getting to the point. In view of what Paul wrote, we will either have to pass over some of the Spirit’s instructions of 1 Corinthians 11-14 in reference to mutual edification within the assemblies, or we will have to change the structure of how each one of us will function in the environment of a participatory assembly. This is not to say that large assemblies are wrong. Paul wrote to correct disorder in such assemblies. The purpose for the instructions of the 1 Corinthians 11-14 context were at least directed to the abuses that took place in the large provincial assemblies. However, we must question the problems that can arise when the orders of worship that are used to maintain harmony in large assemblies are brought into the context of a small group of disciples in a home. When such is done, the “order” often brings stilted or formal relational behavior between brothers and sisters who assemble around a living room table.)

It seems that we have forgotten one of the most important evidences that the unbelieving world can witness when we are truly the disciples of Jesus. Jesus exhorted that by love “all men know that you are My disciples” (Jn 13:35). If our assemblies are inclusive without being chaotic, then the world can see that love is functioning in our assemblies. However, if there is little love, as in the Corinthian scenario, then there will be disorder. And if the assemblies are not participatory where love can be revealed in the harmonious function of all the participants, then those unbelievers who come into our assemblies cannot experience the love by which we are to be known as the disciples of Jesus. If the assemblies of the Christians were organized after the order of any temple assembly, or according to law, then there is no opportunity for the unbeliever to witness the love of God in action in the hearts of Christians who are actively participating in a relational assembly with one another.

It is difficult to witness love in a large assembly of believers that is highly structured according to the mandate of an “order of worship.” Upon his visit to the assembly, the unbeliever only witnesses the precision by which the attendees can conduct an orderly assembly just as the Gentiles. But if we take away the directive of an “order of worship,” and place the attendees in a living room as a small group, it is then that the visiting unbeliever can experience love in action as the disciples function in a relational consideration of one another.

This should lead us to question our love for one another if our assemblies are chaotic. If we cannot have an assembly of peace without an order of assembly wherein everyone’s duties are organized with specific times, then we are probably revealing our lack of love for one another.

This is why the traditional religious culture of the “hour of worship,” that is enclosed between an “opening” and “closing” prayer, reveals more than we would confess. The belief and behavior of such assemblies reveal more “unity” that is based on structure or law, than love. The structure of an “hour of worship” that sets between the bookends of two prayers reveals that the assembly is “unified” more on the foundation of institutional orders of assembly than on love. After all, whoever would want to “open” our love for one another with a prayer, and then close one another off with another prayer after we have performed an hour of ceremonies?

If love is to be reflected in our mutual participation in assembly, then love would demand that our being together is always too brief. We must keep in mind that if the “uninformed” (unbeliever) attends our assembly, it is not our “order of performed worship” that will convict him (1 Co 14:23,24). It is love that convicts. Therefore, unless our assembly is identified by the function of love, then it has lost its mark of identity as the church of Christ, and its power to convict the unbeliever. For this reason alone, it is quite impossible for an institutionalized large assembly to be the medium through which we can reach out to the unbeliever who may visit. In a large institutionalized assembly, all the unbeliever witnesses is an order of assembly that is executed with the precision of a parliamentary assembly according to Robert's Rules of Order.

The good news about all this is that most of the large assembly churches of the Western world are now using small house fellowships through which they seek to manifest the love of Jesus to their neighbors. They continue to have their large assemblies, but they have realized that large assemblies alone do not present the opportunity for the members to love others as Jesus would have us be identified by our love for one another (Jn 13:34,35). Large assembly churches that are not into small loving fellowships in the homes of the members are still basing their “unity” on organization, charismatic speakers, autocratic leadership, or “orders of worship.”

We must keep in mind that in the Corinthian context, as well as the context of all the disciples in the first century, the Christians met regularly in small fellowships in their homes on a weekly basis. For the occasional large assemblies when the Christians of the entire province of Achaia came together in one place, there was assembly chaos. At the end of chapter 14, Paul deals with this problem. He corrected chaotic large assemblies in the context of the Achaians' occasional gathering together in one place. However, he was also correcting small assemblies wherein the pride of some in the city of Corinth was causing disorder. Some were manifesting their pride and arrogance in their assemblies by the use of their gifts. Their assemblies, therefore, were not based on love. It seems that some were bringing their behavior of the large assemblies of the temple before they were Christians into the context of the small house fellowships.

We must not forget that when Paul did give some instructions concerning “orders of assembly,” he stated that the leading participants should function orderly by speaking “one by one.” He attached no “end time” to the time of speaking, or an end to the succession of the participants. Maybe we need to read again the following instructions:

If anyone speaks in a language, let it be by two, or at the most by three, and each in turn, and let one interpret. But if there is no interpreter, let him keep silent in the assembly, and let him speak to himself and to God. Let two or three prophets speak, and let the others judge. If anything is revealed to another who is sitting, let the first [sit down and] keep silent. For you can all prophesy [teach] one by one so that all [the audience] may learn and all may be exhorted. Now the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets (1 Co 14:27-32).

We see no “closing prayer” to stop the preceding succession of speakers. Since the “spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets” (1 Co 14:32), then we suppose that it is the decision of the speakers as to when to conclude the proceedings of the assembly, and not the audience. The number of speakers who had a message of exhortation must be given the opportunity to minister their word of edification. If an “hour of worship” was enforced with a “closing prayer” before all the speakers had an opportunity to speak, then the assembly would become exclusive of some speakers.

If the context of the 1 Corinthians instructions was an occasional provincial assembly of all the members in the province of Achaia, then Paul was stating that the assembly must go on until the last speaker was finished. If the situation was a regular weekly house assembly, then any speaker who did not have an opportunity to speak could come back next week if he so chose this “order.” The final decision must be left to the speaker, for he may have something heavy on his heart that must be said. If several speakers had something heavy on their hearts, then we would assume that loving patience on the part of the audience would prevail. The assembly would continue until all the speakers, “one by one,” completed their ministry of exhortation. This is what love for the word of God and the speakers would do. Each one of us need to think about this the next time we look at our watches during the end of the Western 20-minute sermonette that has become so common.

Now herein is the behavioral nature of the small group assemblies that characterized the Christians for over three centuries after the Pentecost of Acts 2. Because the early disciples implemented the gospel of love for one another, they easily followed the instructions of Paul: “Let all things be done properly and in order” (1 Co 14:40). This can be accomplished in assembly only when “love suffers a long assembly and is kind to all speakers; love does not allow any speaker to envy another speaker; love does not allow speakers to exalt themselves over one another; and as a speaker, love does not allow one's self to be puffed up as a speaker” (1 Co 13:4). The “order of assembly” of the disciples is not written on a chalkboard, or handed out on a piece of paper. It is written on the hearts of all those who show up at the assembly with a spirit of love.

FREEDOM AND LAW

The law of God hangs on the two principles of loving God with all our heart, soul and mind, and one's neighbor as himself (See Mt 22:36-40). Because the law "hangs" on love, then freedom from religion cannot exist without law. Those who respond to the love of God seek to know and do God's will. They seek His will because they do not want to return to religion which is based on the law of man.

However, obedience to the will (law) of God gives no opportunity to boast because we have kept the law perfectly in order to demand God's favor. The law of faith in God, Paul wrote, sets aside any boasting in reference to any proposed justification through perfect law-keeping (Rm 3:27). Paul continued that we do not set aside all law because we trust in God's justification (Rm 3:31). On the contrary, because we trust (have faith) in God's love for us, we seek to establish His law in our lives. It is by the law of faith, therefore, that Christians have been freed from the necessity of justifying themselves through the law-keeping of religion. But if one has come out of a religion of law-keeping, this is usually not the end of the story.

When one is released who has been imprisoned for many years by religion, he walks outside the prison doors. His first feeling is to return to the security of the prison. He has this feeling because he subconsciously, or consciously, realizes that now he must take ownership of his freedom. He must determine for himself how he will conduct his life. And herein is the purpose of law. Law must teach the newly released prisoner how to conduct himself in society. When those who have escaped the prison of religion first walk free, they cry out, "Abba, Father." They thus seek law from the Father in order to stay free from religion. Jesus set them free through the justification of the cross. They stay free because they live by the law of faith, and thus need not resort to the perfect law-keeping of religion in order to be justified before God.

When Israel was finally delivered from the bondage of Egyptian captivity, the people had not yet reached Mount Sinai before they complained to Moses and Aaron about not having what was needed to survive in the wilderness. They complained about it being better with the "meat pots" in bondage than in the freedom of the Sinai Peninsula (Ex 16:3).

God knew that the people would emotionally and spiritually be disoriented in their release from bondage.

So the first thing He did with the people was to march them straight to Mt. Sinai and give them instructions (law) concerning social behavior. Their minds had been institutionalized in Egyptian captivity. They now had to learn how to relate with God and one another. They had to learn in the desert how to totally trust in Him. In the absence of the "meat pots" of security in prison, they now had to walk by faith in God to take care of them.

Once one is molded by "bondage mentality," it is difficult for him to enjoy the spirit of freedom. The explorer can wake up everyday with adventure on his mind in reference to new things he might discover during the day. On the other hand, one who finds comfort in the traditions of his own religion has a very difficult time venturing outside that with which he is familiar. The common phrase we hear in reference to behavioral matters in Africa is that "it's our culture." "It's our culture" brings a certain predictability about life. It erases surprises, and thus lends one to being unchangeable and susceptible to religious traditionalism. However, God deals with us in a manner by which we must deal with traditional religiosity. We are set free from religion, but we must be brought into the instructions of His will by faith. If we do not submit to His instructions (law), then we will bring ourselves into the bondage of behavior that is contrary to the will of God. We will be right back in the bondage of religion.

But there can be a problem. The problem with a fear of freedom is that we naturally seek to live according to our traditions in order to feel secure, especially if the traditions have been handed to us by our forefathers. In this way, the one who is fearful of freedom does not have to take ownership of his own faith, even of the traditional religion that was handed to him by his forefathers. Someone else determined the traditions, and now it is only the responsibility of the heirs to continue the traditions.

This is a very common problem because those who would be free of religion do not study their Bibles. They do not study because of their fear of discovering something that might be wrong with the religious heritage they have received from their forefathers.

As long as Israel lived in the bondage of Egypt, they could easily complain about the oppression of their taskmasters. However, when the taskmasters were taken away through Israel's deliverance from bondage, the people complained in order to return to the taskmasters.

For many years, they had developed a bondage culture that gave them security, even though the burdens of slavery were difficult. At least they did not have to wake up each morning as an explorer and determine by faith what they would do for the day. The freed Israelites were mentally disciplined to live under law, but in their freedom, they were emotionally insecure. So through Moses, God continued to march them to the holy mountain where they would be given law.

“Bondage mentality” became a problem among the disciples of the first century. Most of the early disciples were former Jews, and thus they had lived for centuries in the bondage of the Jews’ religion. The problem was that one who lives in the comforts of religious bondage usually never realizes that he or she is actually in bondage. No faith is challenged when one walks in bondage.

Jesus, as Moses, came to set men free from bondage. In the case of Jesus as the Deliverer, He would not only set men free from the bondage of sin, He would also set them free from the bondage of Jewish religion. Jesus once said to some Jews who believed in Him, “If you continue in My word, then you are truly My disciples” (Jn 8:31). This was not a problem at the time. But “those Jews who believed in Him” had no idea what He was saying or what was coming. So Jesus continued, “And you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free” (Jn 8:32). They did not understand the freedom about which Jesus spoke.

Religious people who are in the bondage of their own religiosity have a difficult time understanding that they are in bondage. The psychological reason for this is simple. Religion is a system of belief and behavior whereby and wherein one finds satisfaction and security in his own self-sanctifying performances of his religious rites or Sunday ceremonies. As long as the religionist performs the rites of his religion, then he can live within the comforts of his own religious village.

Keeping the religious culture of the fathers is comfortable. In doing so, one need not take ownership of our own destiny. This all sounds fine except for one fact. The one in bondage to his own religiosity of self-sanctification needs to have little trust [faith] in God. If one can justify himself by keeping the traditions of the religion, then God is kept off one’s back through perfect keeping the rites of the religion.

So “those Jews who believed in” Jesus, responded to Jesus, “We are Abraham’s seed and were never in bondage to anyone. How is it that You say, ‘You will be made free’?” (Jn 8:33). This is bondage denial! They had certainly forgotten that they had 1,400 years before been delivered from Egyptian bondage. They had 536 years before been delivered from the bondage of Assyria and Babylonia. And at the present, they were in the bondage of the Romans.

But Jesus was not speaking of being in the bondage of another kingdom power. It may have been that the religious leaders were getting the point, and thus, they complained that they were not in the bondage of their own religiosity. But they were, and this was the bondage from which Jesus would deliver them. When religious bondage becomes the culture of an individual, it is a fearful thing to consider leaving that cultural security bondage. So in this context, the Jews may have been arguing against being set free from what they did not consider to be the bondage of the Jews’ religion (Gl 1:13).

The revelation of the gospel through Jesus was a wake-up call, a culture shock of reality, and thus, a call to freedom from religion. But offering and giving freedom to those who have been in bondage has its risks. It is difficult for some to adjust to freedom after coming out of institutionalized religion.

When gospel freedom came to Corinth, those who were freed by the gospel were delivered from the bondage of temple religiosity. But there was a problem with some of the new converts. When Paul wrote to the disciples in Corinth, he made the statement, “However, not everyone has this knowledge” (1 Co 8:7). By “knowledge” he was referring to the fact that there was no longer any religious significance to eating meat, which meat the weak still associated with the offerings at the temple. So for these, he reminded everyone that “meat does not commend us to God, for neither if we eat are we the better, nor if we do not eat are we the worse” (1 Co 8:8). He said this for the sake of those disciples who were still in the bondage of their past religion in reference to eating meat that had been sacrificed to idols.

Those who had determined that there was no religious significance to the eating of meat were using their freedom to eat without considering the consciences of those who still had not grown out of their emotional attachment of meat to temple religion. Their minds were still in bondage to former religious rites. Paul reminded those who ate meat, “Knowledge puffs up, but love edifies” (1 Co 8:1). “However,” Paul continued, “not everyone has this knowledge [that there is nothing religious about eating meat], for some accustomed to the idol until now eat meat as a thing sacrificed to an idol, and their conscience being weak is defiled” (1 Co 8:7).

The mature disciples who had escaped temple religion had the freedom to eat any meat. But they must forego this freedom until those who were still in the bondage of their consciences would grow up in their freedom to disassociate meat from idol religion. But until then, Paul exhorted the mature, “But take heed lest somehow this freedom of yours [from “religious meat”] becomes a stumbling block to those who are weak” (1 Co 8:9). Though there were those still in the bondage of certain religious scruples associated with the eating of meat, those who appreciated their freedom to eat must be considerate of the weak until they also appreciate their freedom from religious rites that they had received from their fathers.

However, the exhortation to those still in the bondage of “temple religion” was that they must eventually grow until they are as the strong and mature disciples who had completely freed themselves from temple religion. We learn from the Holy Spirit’s instructions in 1 Corinthians 8 that we can escape sin in baptism, but it takes time to free one’s mind from his former religious scruples. Through faith in God one must struggle to leave the “meat pots” in the bondage of religion, and free himself from all binding traditions. Once one has been set free from sin in obedience to the gospel, he is indeed set from the bondage of temple religion when he grows up in Christ.

Those who have already been set free from religion must be cautious with their freedom. They must be considerate of those who are still struggling to set themselves free in their minds from the bondage of their past religiosity. Paul wrote that for the free “all things are lawful, but all things are not expedient” (1 Co 10:23). We have the freedom to function where there is no law, but our freedom must not infringe on the conscience of those who have not yet grown out of the bondage of past religious rites. In the Corinthian situation, some of the new Christians were struggling to enjoy their freedom in Christ. It was the responsibility of those who were mature in Christ, therefore, not to seek their own good, “but everyone another’s good” (1 Co 10:24). This is the law of love.

Paul voiced the complaint of the free when he wrote, “For why is my freedom judged by another man’s conscience?” (1 Co 10:29). In our freedom to function under grace, we must always remember our purpose as disciples. We would do as Paul in these areas. “I please all men in all things, not seeking my own profit, but the profit of the many, so that they may be saved” (1 Co 10:33). In some things, therefore, it is right to give up one’s freedoms for the purpose of drawing people to the love of God. It is right to give up eating meat in a way that would encourage a brother to eat meat in violation of his religious conscience. Love would dictate that the freedom to eat meat should be sacrificed for the benefit of those who are growing out of their past idolatrous association of sacrificed meat with idol worship. This is what love would do.

But at the same time, we would heed the Spirit’s warning through the hand of Paul:

Beware lest anyone take you captive through philosophy and vain deceit according to the tradition of men, according to the elementary principles of the world, and not according to Christ (Cl 2:8).

Since we have “been buried with Him [Christ] in baptism,” we are no longer under the bondage of any “hand-writing of [religious] ordinances” that Jesus nailed to the cross (Cl 2:12,14). We have been set free from the religious ordinances that once kept us in bondage. When we obeyed the gospel of freedom through baptism into Christ, Christ set us free. Therefore, in our freedom from the legal rites of religiosity, we must beware lest others come along in order to bring us again into bondage.

There were those brethren who had moved into the area of the new disciples in Galatia. They had moved into the region with intentions of bringing the new disciples in that region into the bondage of a legal religiosity. Because legal religion attacks the very core of the gospel, the book of Galatians was probably the first inspired Scriptures to come forth from the Holy Spirit. In this letter to defend Galatian disciples in their freedom, Paul warned, “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1).

Freedom from religion is not something that should be taken lightly. It must be guarded. The fact that the Holy Spirit warned the Colossians about others taking them captive back into religion, and the Galatians about not being entangled again in the bondage of religion, is warning enough that there is always a real possibility that Christians can return to the prison of religious bondage from which Christ delivered them. We fear when we hear no warnings from religious leaders concerning these matters. The reason we are concerned is because there is little sensitivity in the Christian community of returning to a religion of self-justification through the supposed perfect obedience of religious rites.

Universalism is the belief that everyone is religiously accepted before God on the merit of their own religiosity. Universalism is always a threat to Christianity. When Christians start believing that everyone who believes in Jesus can meritoriously find their way to heaven, then universalism has set in. When we make Christianity a religious system of self-sanctification in order to be justified before God, then the universalist leads himself to believe that everyone will be saved as long as they do good works and believe in Jesus.

We are as God who does not desire that any should perish (1 Pt 3:21). But the fact remains that Jesus said, “Not every one who says to Me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he who does the will of My Father who is in heaven” (Mt 7:21). Universalists must take a moment and consider the fact that if everyone will be saved on the merit of just being a good person, then they have denied the gospel of Jesus. If one is free on the merit of his own performance of deeds before God, then the gospel was a useless effort on the part of God to so love the world through Jesus. Therefore, there would have been no necessity for the incarnation. There was no necessity for Jesus to suffer on the cross. If everyone is justified before God on the merit of his own self-sanctifying good works, then there is no such thing as freedom in Christ. If we are all free to do as we so choose, then there can be no special freedom in Christ.

According to Peter, there is a realm of freedom that Christians enjoy in Christ. Christians “live as free men” (1 Pt 2:16). We live free because we have been set free from the religion of meritorious justification through good works. However, as the free, Peter exhorted, “Do not use your freedom as a covering for evil” (1 Pt 2:16). Law was made for the unlawful (1 Tm 1:9). But freedom from law does not mean that the Christian is free to live contrary to law. In the first century, some turned their freedom from law into a behavior to live unrighteously and contrary to the law of Christ. These denied Jesus, thus denying the resurrection of the Son of God. Jude wrote of these apostates:

For certain men have crept in unnoticed, who were long before marked out for this condemnation, ungodly men who turn the grace of our God into licentiousness and deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ (Jd 4).

Jesus came into the world to set us free from the bondage of our own religious selves (Lk 4:18). And if the Son of God “will make you free, you will be free indeed” (Jn 8:36). But if we deny our only Master and Lord, then we deny our freedom. We bring ourselves into again the bondage of religion.

Rise And Fall Of Civilizations

Have you ever heard the statement, “Once you leave home you can never go back”? I can testify to the truth of this statement. Its truth is based on the fact that societies are always in transition. Change is the very core of every society that seeks a better way of life. And since it was America that my wife and I left in 1974, we have never been able to go back to the society that we left.

After we had been gone for only two years, we made an excursion back into the rapidly changing culture of America. We were quite surprised. Change had already taken place in many sectors of the society. Political issues were different. Interests in current affairs were different. The economy was different. America has never been the same as it was when we left in 1974.

Throughout the years we have had the privilege of living on two other continents. I have traveled to more countries than I can remember—at least seventy-five. I have experienced and lived in so many cultures of the world that the only affinity I have with the American culture and society is the English language I still speak. Other than that, both Martha and I would be considered world citizens.

Much travel, however, has been a blessing. It has allowed both my wife and I to experience civilizations at different stages of transition throughout the world. This personal experience has also given us the privilege of experiencing the rise and fall of many civilizations that are surrounded by national borders. We have been there when some of these civilizations went through the throes of a sociological paradigm shift. These experiences have schooled both of us in the art of putting our finger on those things that inherently bring a civilization to its demise. In those times of transition, it has given us the opportunity to remind the saints that no matter what comes out on the other side of social chaos, God remains the same and we still have the same unchanging Savior.

It has been with some apprehension, however, that I have written this book. My transcultural experience has urged me to look back over my shoulder and see that the Western civilization of America, from where we originated, is passing through some sociological chaos that is common with civilizations in transition or decline. The West is experiencing the social chaos we have personally experienced in so many nations throughout our many decades of enrollment in the school of world cultures.

Those who live within a changing society often feel only small tremors of change throughout their lives. Nevertheless, those small tremors eventually build over time into a tectonic movement that eventually signals the fall of a civilization. When a civilization has changed so much, it is no longer identified by those cultural norms it maintained in the past. This book is about identifying those social tremors that will eventually lead to tectonic changes in Western civilization.

When talking to people about what may to them seem to be only minor social dysfunctions, they are often offended concerning the matters that are discussed in this book. This is especially true when there seems to be a time in the history of a collapsing civilization when society is fighting back to preserve itself. But we never forget what happened during the thirty-one year reign of King Josiah when the civilization of Israel was in its final years (See 2 Kg 22, 23). Israel as a whole had failed to print their Bible, and subsequently, all copies of the law of God were forgotten by the time of Josiah's reign. The word of God was no longer a part of their civilization. In the former years of Israel when the temple was built, one wise old scribe knew what would eventually happen in Israel's history. He knew that the people would eventually forsake and forget the word of God and follow after their own religiosity. He thus buried a copy of the law of God in the walls of the constructed temple of Solomon.

This copy of the long-forgotten law of God was eventually discovered many years later during the reign of Josiah. When King Josiah read the warnings within the law concerning what would happen if God's people forsook the law, he repented. He then led a populace movement to restore conservative values—restoration of the law of God—throughout Israel. He burned the Baal “church houses” (temples). He burned to ashes all those articles of religiosity within the Baal “churches.” He even put to death all those “idolatrous pastors” whom the former wicked kings had ordained. He broke down all the adulterous sodomite houses next to the temple in which women committed fornication in religious worship. In fact, Josiah was so zealous in restoring Israel to God that the Holy Spirit recorded of him, “Before him there was no king like him who turned to the Lord with all his heart and with all his soul and with all his might, according to all the law of Moses. Neither after him arose there any like him” (2 Kg 23:25).

However, it was too late. When Josiah died, except for a small remnant that was carried off into captivity, the last residents of the civilization of Israel in Palestine were terminated. When a civilization is embedded with those negative social norms that lead to its demise, no matter how zealous a populace restorationist king might be to detour the fall, the fall is inevitable. After all that Josiah did, the Lord was still going to bring down the civilization of Israel in Palestine because the people had embedded within their society those suicidal social norms that lead to the collapse of civilizations. The Holy Spirit wrote,

The Lord did not turn from the fierceness of His great wrath with which His anger was kindled against Judah because of all the provocations with which Manasseh had provoked Him. And the Lord said, “I will remove Judah also out of My sight as I have removed Israel” (2 Kg 23:26,27).

We are world citizens, and thus, we look at the world as a whole in reference to eternal matters. Though this book focuses on identifying those social dysfunctions of the West, we understand that what afflicts the West, afflicts the rest of the world. In view of the world influence of the West, we are always fearful of God's pronouncement of Genesis 6:5: “And God saw that the wickedness of man was great on the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually.”

We know the end of this story. The civilization of the world that then was was wiped from the face of the earth by a global cataclysmic flood of waters. The civilization of the world that then existed was terminated. We infer a principle from what God did through the global cleansing of the earth during Noah's era: When the world morally digresses to the point of no moral return, then the world has lost its purpose for existence, and thus, it will be taken out.

The next time God takes out the world, it will not be by water—thank God for the rainbow of remembrance. It will be by fire. But the lesson is that the world is moving in the direction of no moral return. The world is losing its purpose for existence, that is, to populate heaven.

The civilization that is the impetus of this moral decline is the West. Because of the explosive influence of the entertainment industry over the past century, and now both the international corporate news media and social media, the West is taking the rest of the world down into the immoral quagmire where every thought of man is only evil continually.

There are some societies of the world that are already there. We do not know how long God will allow the moral demise of the rest of the world to go before He calls it quits for humanity. Only the naive and culturally cocooned do not realize that we live in a world that does not get better, but worse. No matter how many feel-good books we write and read, the world is still moving toward a tectonic destruction by the hand of God.

Men do not become morally conservative over time. As Israel, when people become religious without the word of God, they will turn to “religious fornication” or some other deviate form of religiosity. Most of the time people simply turn away from religion. Either way, society ends up in the same spiritual pit.

It is for this reason that I have focused in this book on those things that are filtering from the West into all the world. But do not be deceived into thinking that a moral decline is not in action. Satan is still that roaring lion who is going about and devouring whole civilizations as he has so successfully done in the past.

The responsibility of God’s people today was clearly uttered in a repetitive statement that Jesus made when He warned the first century Christians not to be caught up in the demise of the Jewish civilization that ended in A.D. 70. He warned, “Be not deceived.” Those who would ignore the moral decline of Western civilization are allowing themselves to be deceived. Those who have been desensitized to those things that bring civilizations down, have been deceived. It is the responsibility of God’s prophets in every generation to be straightforward in their message in order that the people of God not be deceived. When the Israelite civilization was on the brink of termination, God called a prophet to do his duty before the people. We can envision God looking directly into the eyes of the prophet Ezekiel when He made the following mandate:

When I say to the wicked, “You will surely die,” and you do not give him warning, nor speak to warn the wicked of his wicked way, to save his life, the same wicked man will die in his iniquity. But his blood I will require at your hand. Yet if you warn the wicked, and he does not turn from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he will die in his iniquity. But you have delivered your soul (Ez 3:18,19).

INTRODUCTION

We live on a continent where hundreds of civilizations have come and gone over the past three centuries. Along with some individual tribal civilizations, they have throughout these centuries gone through a series of paradigm shifts in culture. When colonialism came to the continent, one tribal civilization after another succumbed to the new law and order of the colonial powers who submitted the people to new “tribal” orders. Admittedly, some of those old tribal civilizations were quite barbaric in reference to cultural dysfunction. But those civilizations of barbarism are all gone. The sociological behavior of those old cultures have long since been replaced with new cultural values and morals and hope for future development.

After the colonial years, “dictatorial colonialism” came amongst the people, and unto the 1950s to the middle of the 1990s, this culture of control had formed many of the nations of the African continent. But the dictators, too, have mostly passed on and Africa is entering into a new paradigm of democracy that the Africans have redefined according to African culture in general. What has brought on this new paradigm is a culture of education. For the past fifty years, education has captivated generations of people who in many ways are not unlike their Western counterparts. The Internet, with smartphone connectivity, is transitioning the new Africa into a world that is much different than their forefathers less than a century ago.

The new Africa is becoming increasingly urban. Well over half of the population of Africa today now resides in urban centers. This percentage of urban residents will increase dramatically by the end of the century. This urban generation has long forsaken the culture of the rural village. It is a generation that will define Africa for the rest of history. No urban African wants to return to the village.

We introduce this book with these historical insights that are characteristic of many civilizations throughout the world. The Internet has globally connected people to the point that when we speak of the decline of Western civilization, we assume that this decline affects other civilizations. This is true because of the influence that Western civilization continues to have on the rest of the world. As goes the West, so goes the rest of the world. All of those moral norms of the West, whether positive or negative in reference to the existence of civilizations, are spreading with light speed around the world through social media. We live in a world today where no civilization can remain isolated from the rest of the world.

We judge that it is detrimental for the rest of the world to be influenced by many of the negative social values that define Western civilization. Since the moral values of the West are now embedded in the human rights of the United Nations, we are concerned that the negative values of the West are now being imposed on peoples throughout the world. In conjunction with the pressures that the United Nations imposes on all its member states in reference to moral values, the social media that is now such a part of the lives of billions around the world, continues to be the medium through which the negative moral values of the West are propagated worldwide.

Christians must prepare the residents of the world to face the onslaught of unrighteous moral values that are now being propagated around the world. Civilizations since the beginning of time have gone through individual paradigm shifts. In many cases, those civilizations collapsed. But those were civilizations that were in many ways autonomous. In the world today, however, it is drastically different. The world is now so interconnected that where the West leads, the rest of the world is following through the Internet. Such is the curse of the Internet in reference to propagating unhealthy moral values.

Unlike centuries in the past, no civilization today lives in a world of its own. No “great walls” can be built to hold out invading forces from the north. No border can be so secure to refuse entry of those detrimental moral values that lead to the decline of a civilization. We live in a world that is connected, and thus, where the moral norms of the West go, so will follow the rest of the world.

The things about which we speak have no need of a stamp in a passport. With a tap on a smartphone, negative moral values can now be broadcast around the world. There are now over two billion people on Facebook alone. Add to this the billions that are on other social media. It is for this reason that Christian leaders need to be alert to what is happening in the West. What is happening there shows up on thousands of smartphones throughout the world every day. We can no longer say, “That is the problem of the West.” The West, as it declines from within, has now become our problem. The problems that are causing the decline of Western civilization are in many ways, problems for the rest of us.

RISE AND FALL

As we journey through any study of the decline of civilizations, Christians must always remind themselves with the following statement of King Asa of old as he faced his enemies and the probable end of his kingdom:

Lord, it is nothing with You to help, whether with many or with those who have no power. Help us, O Lord our God, for we trust in You and in Your name we go against this multitude. O Lord, You are our God. Let no man prevail against You (2 Ch 14:11).

And then there were the words of the psalmist, who at the time, was evidently experiencing traumatic times in either social or national upheaval.

God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore we will not fear, though the earth is removed and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea (Ps 46:1,2).

No better words could have been spoken at a time when God's people stood against the onslaught of opposition that would prevail in a world of evil. It is always as Jonathan said to his armor bearer as he was about to engage the enemies of God, "... there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few" (1 Sm 14:6).

With that encouragement, we rally our thoughts around what many historians believe is the final chapter of Western civilization as we know it. It is not a matter of if, but when. And when we speak of the fall of civilizations, we speak of decades, if not centuries. But one truth is always axiomatic when historians contemplate the end of empires. All empires eventually reach their consummation. Only the naive assume that what they have and enjoy in the present will continue forever. In the history of civilizations, that is simply not possible.

We must sometimes live for decades before we can be aware of centennial transitions in civilizations. As Western civilization now transitions into another social paradigm, our experience of many decades speaks no different than those of past millennia who have experienced the fall of empires in their time. As Israel's prophets cried out against the majority in their final years, so we would cry out today as we experience the moral decline of Western civilization. If one would question our concerns, we do not stand alone. A simple Google search on the Internet will reveal an overwhelming amount of books and articles on this subject. So bear with some of our own speculations, if not postulations concerning what we have gleaned from the material that has been researched and written, and in our lifetime, have experienced.

Rachel Nuwer, in a featured BBC Future's Best of 2017, was right when she wrote that the collapse of many civilizations ...

... have occurred many times in human history, and no civilization, no matter how seemingly great, is immune to the vulnerabilities that may lead a society to its end.

Regardless of how well things are going in the present moment, the situation can always change. Putting aside species-ending events like an asteroid strike, nuclear winter or deadly pandemic, history tells us that it's usually a plethora [combination] of factors that contribute to collapse. What are they, and which, if any, have already begun to surface? It should come as no surprise that humanity is currently on an unsustainable and uncertain path—but just how close are we to reaching the point of no return? (Emphasis mine, R.E.D.).

ECONOMICA INEQUITY

The consensus of historians on this matter is in agreement with the conclusions of Nuwer. It is also a consensus that Western civilization as we know it is showing many of the signs that brought down empires of the past. As Christians who are a part of any society, it is our ministry to give hope in times of social tensions. When experiencing what seems to be the tensions of social transition in Western civilization, it is a time to direct the minds of the people toward the unchanging God who has been around since the finality of hundreds of civilizations since the beginning.

Christians must always be the apostles of hope for those who are having difficulty as a part of a society that is transitioning into a new and different civilization. The Holy Spirit's exhortation of 1 Peter 3:15 is appropriate to prepare the people around us with hope, regardless of what happens. As Christians were in the throes of the fall of national Israel prior to A.D. 70, Peter wrote to encourage those Jewish Christians who believed the prophecy of the demise of national Israel that was spoken by Jesus (Mt 24). Jewish Christians must encourage their fellow countrymen to maintain their faith in our Lord Jesus Christ.

But sanctify Christ as Lord God in your hearts and be ready always to give a defense to everyone who asks you a reason for the hope that is in you, yet with meekness and fear (1 Pt 3:15).

It causes no little anxiety to compare the judgments of the prophets of Israel in reference to Israel's demise to what is leading Western civilization to the same conclusion. One of the major reasons for the demise of national Israel could be summed up in one statement: A poor economic class developed in Israel that was continually exploited by the rich for the benefit of the rich. When this social structure was developed in Israel, God closed the book on Israel.

When such a social structure develops within any society, it is not possible for the principles of God's word to rule in the hearts of the people. What rules is a selfish elite class who exploit the lower class who compose the majority of the society. In such a social environment of inequity, the concept of "love-your-neighbor-as-yourself" is marginally practiced. The principle of loving one's neighbor as himself cannot be sustained in a society where one economic class marginalizes another in order to maintain their own economic superiority. There are no "love-your-neighbor" people on wall street.

In the end of Israel, God said to the economically advantaged, "For you have eaten up the vineyard. The plunder of the poor is in your houses" (Is 3:14). Their luxurious houses manifested that the poor had been exploited for the benefit of the rich. The rich had ground "the faces of the poor" for their own prosperity (Is 3:15). The rich took the money of the poor investors on the downside of the stock market. Isaiah judged,

Woe to those who enact unrighteous [constitutional decrees], and who write misfortune that they have prescribed [through legislation], in order to turn aside the needy from justice and to take away the right from the poor of my people, that widows may be their prey and that they may rob the fatherless! (Is 10:1,2).

As a prophet during social demise, Isaiah continued to speak of the foolish ones of Israel who led the way to the end of Israel's civilization. The rich aristocracy were the "investors" who devised "wicked devices to destroy the poor with lying words, even when the needy speak right" (Is 32:7). Jeremiah joined Isaiah by proclaiming that the economically advantaged "do not defend the rights of the poor" (Jr 5:28).

We wonder where Western civilization is in reference to this reason for the end of civilizations? Could there be embedded in the financial structure of the West those things that exacerbate the continued separation of the haves from the have nots?

Nuwer also reported the results of a systems scientist by the name of Safa Motesharrei at the University of Maryland. Nuwer referred to the conclusions of Motesharrei when she wrote that ...

... elites push society toward instability and eventual collapse by hoarding huge quantities of wealth and resources, and leaving little or none for commoners who vastly outnumber them yet support them with labor [Emphasis mine, R.E.D.].

These words echo the pronouncements of Isaiah and Jeremiah when the two prophets proclaimed the final days of Israel.

Benjamin Friedman compared Western civilization with the spinning wheels of a bicycle. The wheels are kept spinning by the forward motion of economic health. However, if the forward motion of the bicycle slows, then the bicycle starts to teeter. If the wheels cannot be kept turning by strong economics in order to produce social equity, then the bicycle society is headed for social collapse. We would add that the bicycle may come to a conclusion in forward motion and fall to the side, but the wheels will keep spinning as a deceptive indication of continuing life in a fallen economy. However, the spinning wheels will eventually come to a halt.

AGING CIVILIZATIONS

Societies make nations, and thus, societies are as aging individuals within a nation. Western civilization was built on the forward motion of financial prosperity. But if for some reason cracks begin to appear in the financial structure of the society, then the society is showing the first signs of age. For this reason, the rise and fall of nations in a modern world is defined by the rise and fall of the society of individuals within the nation who depend on the financial institutions of the nation.

As individuals, our bodies are unfortunately a metaphor of the rise and fall of every nation that has appeared on the stage of history since the beginning of time. As a young person, we were alert and vibrant. We were idealistic with ambitions for the future. We were full of hope and optimism. By our middle age years, we had determined who we were, and thus, were on course for the rest of our lives. Unfortunately, we began to grow old. We knew we were losing the energy of our youth.

In our aged years it is difficult to make decisions. Actually, we become fearful of making decisions. It is as Solomon said. The evil days have come upon us (Ec 12:1). Our functionality has slowed down to the point that we seem to have no function at all. We are afraid to make decisions because we have slowed down in our ability to function both physically and mentally. Hope is often lost because there are no aspirations for the future. The future is only death, not a long life of achievement. Solomon resolved, “As he came forth from his mother’s womb, naked will he return to go as he came. And he will take nothing from his labor that he may carry it away in his hand” (Ec 5:15).

In our old age we start fall apart physically. There is modern medicine to patch up dysfunctional parts, and in some cases replace those parts that have long since worn out. But regardless of all the patch work, the end is inevitable. We will fall apart when there is no strength to maintain life among the living.

What is most frustrating above all is that the mind seems to have been originally made by our Maker to be terminal regardless of the extension of the physical. We can medically keep the physical body going, but often the physical long surpasses the ability of the mental to continue. We forget who we are. We sometimes forget where we are. We do not trust others. We become paranoid in thinking that someone is out to get us. We make sure all the doors are locked. We are over cautious. We take no risks as we did when we were young and ambitious, and stroked by invincibility. We thus withdraw within ourselves in order to survive. We lock ourselves away from a supposedly evil world that is out to suck the last remaining sparks of life out of our very existence.

Does the preceding remind us of any particular society/nation of the world? It has all happened before a hundred times over as civilizations reached their aged years. One of the most classic series of books on this matter was written by Edward Gibbon, History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Books as such could be written about every empire/civilization that has existed since the beginning of time. Before and after Rome, there have always been the rise and fall of empires. The West is just another in a series of empires that have risen throughout history, but now it is showing the signs of an eventual consummation. It is now in the twilight of its existence as a civilization on earth because it, as all aging empires, is winding down. It is as an aging individual who cannot stop the aging processes. As a civilization, the West manifests all the symptoms of an aging body that has only demise to which to look in the future. We thus join Isaiah and Jeremiah, not to be pessimistic, but realistic in reference to God’s work among the nations of this world in order to bring about His purpose for the world. Nevertheless, there is a “walking dead” society in existence in Western civilization that has given rise to the competition of sub-societies who will determine what will be the next group of conquerors that will assume control of the West. A society filled with “doomsday preppers” know that something is up, but they cannot yet lay their finger on the eventual cause that looms over the not so distant future that will threaten their survival. They only live with the dread of what lies in the future. Bunker sales are on the increase in such a society.

CRACKS IN THE SYSTEM

We would remind ourselves that the demise of the present Western civilization will not be the termination of the people. It will be as the demise of the Soviet civilization decades ago. Russia still exists today as a people, but the Republic of the Soviet Union no longer exists. What will terminate the West will be the fall of conservative Western morals, Western values, Western behavior, the Western family, and possibly a variation in the Western system of democratic government.

As Rome, the West is, or has, fallen from within. Charles Moster was a former litigation attorney in the Ronald Reagan and George H. W. Bush presidential administrations. His evaluation of the Western civilization in comparison to the Roman civilization is striking:

The historical consensus is that Rome rotted from within and ultimately collapsed in a whimper. Although there are divergent historical opinions on the cause of societal death, most attribute Roman's demise to suicide resulting from a precipitous decline in traditional values and outright failure of government [Emphasis mine, R.E.D.].

Those who are aware of what is culturally now in progress in the Western world will find little with which to disagree on this matter. This is especially true among those who can still remember the 1940s and 1950s. The Western world today is vastly different from those decades that marked the end of a society that no longer exists. But before we think Western civilization is finished with transformation into something vastly new and different, hang on for the end of this century. Unfortunately, those who will take Western civilization into a different social paradigm will have fewer moral norms of bygone years by which they can judge their digression. The West is as Peter Lavelle of the news media, Russia Today, stated in a January 2018 TV broadcast: "The West is living in an intellectually morally corrupt world." This is the way all civilizations go out, that is, from within. The civilization of the grandfathers is long forgotten by the time the grandchildren or great grandchildren usher in a new moral system.

The socially democratic West began in its youth as a vibrant civilization that was full of hope and optimism. Economic growth has taken the West unto heights of remarkable prosperity. Its prosperity to a financial zenith has affected the rest of the world. In fact, many nations of the world, as was the case with the Roman Empire, depend on the existence and financial strength of the West. Rome pumped life-giving financial blood throughout the Empire. Societies continued as long as they would vote in favor of Rome that held up their societies through financial aid and military reassurance. But in the end, Rome was unable to financially sustain all those who depended on her wealth. Initially, Rome was able to increase the financial prosperity of the people of the Empire because its economic foundation was established on a high moral standard. Moster's evaluation of the strength of the Empire was correct:

Rome emerged and captivated the world because of the strength and stability of its family unit and commitment to universal national values over selfish interest. With increased affluence came complacency and the abandonment of core ideals. The national government failed because it was paralyzed by irreconcilable conflict and corruption.

The West is simply reliving the consummation about which John wrote of Rome in her later days when dependent nations mourned over the demise of the Empire. Their mourning was not over Rome itself, but over their loss of financial and military security that was provided by Rome (See Rv 18). In her latter years, when Rome forsook her moral foundation, the financial and military structure collapsed.

The nations that leached on the finances of Rome were similar to the financial relationship that many nations today have with the West. Dependent nations will vote in the United Nations against positions of the West, but at the same time they will have their cuffed hands stretched out behind the UN building, begging for foreign aid for their perpetually impoverished nations they govern through corruption, or to continually take advantage of the West through unfair trade deals.

Aging has affected the moral norms upon which the West accomplished its great financial power and influence. To some extent, the democratic system that was given birth by independence from England through the Revolutionary War, has to some extent developed into a congress of governance that cannot get along with itself. The governance of the West is almost impotent in reference to making decisions. And for this reason, the financial base of the West is always on the verge of the bears who would take the stock market into a financial tail spin. Most financial gurus with whom we have consulted on this matter are almost unanimous in their conclusion that the stock market is headed for a severe crash sometime in the future. And where goes the Western stock market, so goes the markets of the world.

There is heart disease in the source from which financial blood is pumped to clinging societies throughout the world. There is so much political paranoia in the governing environment of the West that elected officials are afraid to make decisions lest they lose the votes of their liberal or conservative constituencies that put them in office. Western civilization is experiencing the Achilles' heel of democracy: As goes the electorate of society, so goes the elected officials of society and its government. In the case of Western civilization, the divisions within the society of the voting constituencies is so great that governance of the populous becomes almost impossible.

The problem is not so much with the forces of conservative preservation, but with a neo-liberal constituency that has lost its moral compass. After the days of President John F. Kennedy, the people of Western civilization progressively digressed into a liberal culture of despising dignitaries. As Jude spoke of the final days of Israel in the latter part of the first century, so Western civilization is today. We are in the days of those who morally "defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignitaries" (Jd 8). This is the biblical definition of a true neo-liberal society. These are the days of banners that read, "Not my president," "Abortion is legal," "My body is my choice," or "My life-style is my business," and popular songs with lyrics that read, "It's my body I'll do what I want." Citizens have lost all respect for honoring the king or any authority that would impose on them moral standards that preserve society. They thus feel free to march in streets against elected dignitaries whom they despise. They march for immoral social rights that attack the very fiber of society. They thus march for moral degradation that expedites the collapse of any civilization.

The more harsher the criticism becomes from the social liberal, the more successful those candidates are who reflect the moral digression of the society. The civilization has now accepted the cancer of an aging person that has spread throughout the body for social self-destruction. Dysfunctional cancerous cells are spreading throughout the body of society. Moster wrote specifically of America:

The statistical evidence is clear that American society is rotting from within as the rate of divorce has skyrocketed along with the rise of so-called nontraditional families and births out of wedlock. Religious views, whether Christian, Jewish or other faiths, are in rapid decline as atheism has expanded its reach.

No matter who is Caesar in the final years of a morally degraded civilization, it is a time when this head of state will be severely criticized by those who defy moral standards. Those who seek to relieve themselves of any moral constraints despise any leader who would impose on them any moral standards. This answers the question as to why the Millennial Generation that is less than ten percent religious according to Bible standards, has a difficult time with moral standards that would come from any faith that believes in the morals of a Higher Power. This eighty-million strong generation is bringing into the American civilization the collapse of religious social standards that preserve societies. "Church goers" in a collapsing civilization, therefore, should not be surprised that "church attendance" is in decline. It is simply a telltale sign of a collapsing civilization when a society "despises the dominion" of anyone who would impose moral values, starting first with the religious institutions of the society.

The most sinister morals of a falling civilization thrives on the criticism of any leader who would promote standards by which society must conduct itself. This criticism would be focused toward any local religious leader, and go all the way to the top seats of government. And among the top seats, senators of the empire are willing to take knives of criticism and put Caesar to death. And then after Caesar is gone, another Caesar is set up for the same fate. There is biting and devouring among those who are supposed to control the society.

Among the remnants of the religious community of a collapsing civilization, religious universalism becomes the philosophy of religion of the times. Universalism (everybody is going to heaven) becomes so accepted that those religious leaders who preach unchanging moral norms are "despised dignitaries." Since anyone of faith will be saved, and thus should be accepted by everyone, then those who would impose any moral standards on society should be rejected. Whether from the Bible, Quran, or any "book of faith," unchanging moral standards are rejected by the neo-liberal society. The faithful become a remnant within a society that has become increasingly nonreligious. No one has a right to judge another, and no religious book of authority is to be accepted if it requires obedience to unchanging moral standards, or absolute truth that must be believed and obeyed. It is believed that if one is simply religious, then he or she will make it through the pearly gates, if indeed there is life after death.

Universalism is the result of a shrinking religious community within a society. When a society begins to decrease in its religiosity, religious leaders become desperate. Since the liberal society in which they preach is rejecting moral and doctrinal absolutes, church attendance declines. Since only a certain percentage of the society is religious, churches start competing for their share of the religious remnant that remains within the society. All sorts of “religious gimmicks” are used in order to “keep the youth,” and give the flock a “worshipful experience.” A healthy society is always measured by the faith of the society in a Higher Power. When this is gone, the society has lost its moral direction.

In such a religiously sterile society atheism becomes fashionable. And for this reason, atheism is on the rise in the West. Atheism is flaunted by politicians who recruit Hollywood stars because both seek the approval of a nonreligious audience. When a civilization is going down, one of the first indications of such is the rise of atheism. Of course the atheist says he needs no belief in a Higher Power to control his moral behavior. But he needs to make this argument with the former Nazi Germans who led themselves to believe that it was morally right to murder a society of people within the society as a whole.

The people of a dying civilization become frustrated with the constant political turmoil that has brought the aging nation to the old age of political paranoia, social dysfunction and a crippled government. As an old person who can no longer make decisions for the future, Western civilization is in the throes of constant struggles from within. Citizens are frustrated with social dysfunction, having little understanding of that to which they aspire. Such is the frustration of a liberal society that has lost its moral compass. What is being experienced is the collapse of a civilization through the fall of sustaining norms that keep a society on a moral course. So as Rome, the collapse is from within. The city of Rome did eventually fall to an invading army in A.D. 476. However, it had already fallen morally and economically long before the invaders reached the gates of the capital.

In our aging years, we are not in control of our being. We used our youth to gain our wealth to decide our future, and now in our old age we are trying to use our wealth to sustain our existence for just a few more decades. When an aging nation is out of control because of the lack of ability to make decisions, it becomes as individuals whose aging process is out of control. In order to disguise the teetering bicycle, we “dress for success” in order to hide our aging. In order to give a presentation that we are still great, we present ourselves in a way that portrays to the voting constituents and the world that we are in control of our own destiny. Arrogance by the leaders gives the impression that they are in control.

So we deceive ourselves. One of the signs of a civilization that has aged is the presentation of their rulers as “presidential.” Our leaders must look and behave like kings. They must dress like kings. And as President Macron of France, they spend thousands of dollars on cosmetics in order to give the physical appearance of a king who is in control. The use of the word “optics” is now the cherished word of those who would give a presentation of being in control. In fact, we now have masters of body language to evaluate our kings in order that they behave in public as kings who are in control of the empire. But such theatrical presentations lead us to ignore that beneath the cosmetics, there are irreversible aging processes that have set in. There is sin beneath the sin that will bring Western civilization as we now know it to an end.

We forget that our destiny is determined by our age, and thus, we all follow the path of Rome and a thousand other expired empires since the beginning of time. No matter how successful we present ourselves to those who depend on us, there are aging forces at work within the Western society that will eventually bring the civilization to its knees. We are only deceiving ourselves if we think we can elect a successful technocrat as our leader, and at the same time, avoid the overpowering forces of social and economic dysfunctions that bring empires down. Aging civilizations choose no moral leaders to save them from their decline.

AGING PARTS AND PAIN

As a nation—and as our physical bodies—we become inflexible in our old age. Every movement becomes painful. Our loss of flexibility means that we are moving toward falling apart. In reference to nationhood, we have entered the time when parts must be propped up in order to continue. Congressional indecision is evidence of an aging process. Indecision is the reflection of a polarized society that finds it difficult to discuss politics at the kitchen table. Our lack of flexibility means that the West has entered the years of a bipolar civilization.

Rome fell apart from within because it could not produce a unified society that wanted to work together for the glory of Rome. National pride gave way to petty special interests within that were centered around local matters. The greater glory of the Empire could not overshadow the social divisions that existed within the Empire. Once the control of the central government collapsed through inflexibility, the dangling dependent nations throughout the Empire sought to go their separate ways.

In the gradual social paradigm shift of a civilization, we start choosing leaders who we believe will fix our aging body. Since the West is a business-oriented empire that was established on the foundation of two centuries of hard work, society will elect populist technocrats who major in success in the business world. Regardless of the technocrats' experience in democratic functionality, however, society assumes that if business technocrats were successful in the financial world, then certainly they will make us economically successful again as we were great in bygone years. If our technocrats take our prosperity to new levels, then certainly our nation is in good hands and we will survive. We are forcing ourselves to believe a lie.

What we forget is the fact that when empires fall it is usually not from the top down, but from the bottom up. The causes of the fall come from within the society, not from the halls of the capital, though those in capital reflect the people in a democratic society. When God sought to preserve for the captivity of His people the society that had Nineveh as their capital, He did not send Jonah to the capital building to preach to the politicians. He sent the prophet to the people in the streets with the message, "Yet forty days and Nineveh will be overthrown" (Jh 3:4). The problem was in the society of the Ninevites. In order for the society to be preserved for the arrival of Jewish captives when the northern kingdom of Israel fell to the Assyrians in 722/21 B.C., the society of the Ninevites could be preserved only if the people would repent, which thing they did.

We forget that great civilizations are not built on money, or the success of technocrats, but on the people. When purse and power are used to manipulate people, then as Israel, the civilization is on its way out. When a society refuses to recognize that its financial institutions are in trouble, they are burying their heads in their troves of money. If they think a new leader will rise to be their messiah, then they are not focusing on the cause of their demise. What was commendable of the society to which Jonah preached a short eight-word message is that the people took ownership of their social problems in order to escape their certain demise that was coming (Jh 3:4-9).

The financial world of printing money in collapsing civilizations of today lead the people to believe that the printed paper money will perpetuate the existence of an empire. But printing money produces inflation, and inflation further increases the gulf between the rich and the poor. The printing of money increases the shares the elite have in the financial institutions of the free-market society. The success of the financial institutions and stock markets, therefore, are deceptive. Because so much printed money is in circulation, its "appearance" in society shows up in overinflated financial institutions. Successful financial institutions and a high stock market deceive the populace into thinking that their economy is healthy.

One need only to look south from America across the Gulf of Mexico for a history lesson on this matter. Venezuela is printing bundles of money to prop up a revolution that is imploding. In decades of the past, the rich become so prosperous in Venezuela and other Latin American countries, that the masses of the poor rose up in democratic elections. In Venezuela the masses elected Hugo Chaves to take control of the empire that had been in existence since the days of the Spanish Conquistadores. In the election of Chaves, the empire of the elite was overthrown by the poor labor class. But now, those who have assumed the leadership of the revolution, are taking the empire further into demise by printing so much money that inflation is into the thousands of percent per annum. People are now fleeing the country in order to survive. President Ronald Reagan once said, "No great nation that has abandoned the gold standard has ever remained a great nation." The problem is that without a gold standard, there are no limitations on how much money the government will print and spend in order to prop up the nation. Paper money is continually printed in order to pay the expenses of an economy that is continually beyond its own resources to pay the bills.

There is a difference between a stock pile of gold and a stock pile of paper money. One pile indicates that an empire is truly rich. But the other indicates that an empire is built only on a pile of paper. Today's world money is simply on a computer chip of some financial institution. We are just a mouse click away from a financial fall as the bears would take advantage of 401K stock holders. The only hope in this possible electronic catastrophe is that only about 50% of the population of America have any investment in the stock market.

The destiny of a "paper empire" is terminal. When the empire cannot print enough money to pay the interest on the accumulated debt of the empire, then the empire is destined for a catastrophic financial correction. And when the correction comes, those who know these things about “paper empires” have already cashed out and sold their stock. In doing so, they further enrich themselves and their separation from those who lost fortunes in “Bitcoin bubbles.”

The social result is that the financial and social gulf between the rich and poor is exacerbated to revolutionary proportions. The rich land owners are run from the land. A social paradigm shift occurs, and thus a French Revolution (1789-1799), Russian Revolution (1917), and Latin American civilizations socially restructured when the land owners are run out of their countries (1950s, 1960s). In the case of Zimbabwe, the poor simply took the land from about 4,000 farm owners and redistribute it to the poor who could not afford to buy land. And in South Africa, the majority of the politicians voted in parliament in February 2018 to take the land from the farmers, who owned 72% of the land, and give it to the poor who also could not afford to buy land.

A society that has been born and bred on prosperity always forgets that the social norms of a society are always more influential in the future of the civilization than financial wealth. Must we return to the lessons that Israel learned in her rise and fall? Rome, as Solomon and Rehoboam, also tried the deception of taxation to produce a strong nation (See 1 Kg 12:10,11). The problem was that enough finances could not be produced through taxation to sustain the military systems that would sustain the nation. As a nation cannot tax itself into prosperity, so neither can the printing of wealth perpetuate a nation that depends on the same.

We have fooled ourselves when we think that financial health has priority over social norms. It is a morally healthy society that perpetuates a civilization, not a stock market that is breaking new limits. In fact, aging financial health often works against social health because financial health is so deceptive in reference to a morally degraded society. In a society that has prided itself on financial successes one after another, we forget that in a free market democratic society, such successes place the majority of the wealth into the hands of the few. The problem with this inequity is that the few rich, as in the end of Israel, have few moral norms by which they can maintain their wealth in reference to the poor, who become the mass labor force of the society. The labor force that produces and maintains the empire, begins to be marginalized by the elite few. It is then that social cracks begin to appear in the civilization. It is then that the financially exploited begin to consider revo-

Among the disadvantaged, hope gives way to despair, and despair in a democratic society eventually catches up with the nation as a whole. The poor have no hope of being successful as the rich for whom they labor. They can only envy the Kardashians and imagine their life-style. The reason for this is that in a democratic free-market society, the cost of living bypasses the financial abilities of the labor population. Labor finds it difficult to survive because the wealth of the society is in the hands of too few people, who have, for example, priced all the houses out of financial reach of the poor. The masses who are on the bottom cannot keep up with the economy that is governed by the wealthy on the top of the food chain. In a democratic society, the majority that is now financially suffering, determines the future of the civilization.

In this social environment, the rise of “prosperity prophets” infiltrate the religious sector of the populace. They preach a “prosperity gospel” in order to bring hope to the financially disadvantaged. They deceive the people into believing that they can use their faith to gain wealth. Because the faith of the deceived is often the last social norm upon which the disadvantaged have to maintain some hope, they bite into the deception that their faith can produce financial success. They convince themselves that God wants them to also be rich. Therefore, they conclude, the more faith one has, the richer he will become. Religion thus becomes an investment scheme for the profiteering preacher.

The prosperity preacher dresses himself in fine clothing. He wears gold in order to give the appearance of financial success. He orchestrates emotional assemblies before whom he stands as a successful pulpiteer who dangles an audience of religious puppets before him with an orchestra of stringed instruments who play rapturous concert music. In order to take his audiences into a hypnotic frenzy, people are supposedly healed and dead people raised. The coffers are passed among the poor and filled with pension money. Worship is sacrificed for an opportunity of the pulpit profiteer to weekly convince the attendees that they too will “be blessed” if they will only “bless” the collection for the day.

The deceived ignore the fact that the “financial success” of the prosperity preacher came at the expense of a people who have been jilted into believing a prosperity religion of deception (2 Th 2:1-12). The prosperity preacher thus joins the exploiting rich in a declining civilization. He has bought into the culture of financial prosperity, and thus has convinced himself that the aging civilization of which he is a part can be restored when the people of faith gain financial success. He ex-exploits the contributions of his constituency in order to maintain his wealth. The religious constituency has been blinded to the historical reality that the Baal prophets of Israel were interested in bales of money.

In Israel it was the same in their final years before the captivities of Assyria and Babylonia. The prophets of God encountered the prosperity prophets who said that the end was not near. The prosperity prophets cried out, “Peace, peace” (Jr 6:14). But there was no peace. Doom was imminent. The “peace prophets” lashed out against God’s prophets who said that the end was near. God’s messengers, subsequently, brought upon themselves the “trial of mockings and scourgings, yes, also bonds and imprisonment” (Hb 11:36; see Hb 11:37-40).

The same prosperity preachers existed again when national Israel was coming to its final demise in A.D. 70. With the consummation of national Israel in view, Luke recorded that the prosperity preachers of the time, the Pharisees, were “lovers of money” (Lk 16:14). This group of preachers had even digressed in their covetousness to the point that the money that was to be given by the children to support their parents in their old age should be given to them as Corban. According to the Pharisees, the money for the aged parents should be dedicated in contributions to the prosperity preachers (Mk 7:9-13).

When preachers take advantage of the people in the offerings that the people should offer in their commitment to God, then they are no better than Hophni and Phinehas who siphoned off more than their share of the contributions that were offered by the people (See 1 Sm 2:12-17). As their judgment, these two prosperity preachers ended up dead because they took advantage of the people’s offerings to God.

FROM FARM TO CITY

When Israel was first established as a nation in Palestine, it was a rural society. The people lived and labored on their own farms—as it was in the early development of America. In early Israel, God gave the cities to the preachers (Levites) who were supported by the people. When there was a drought or pestilence in a particular region of Palestine, according to the law, other farmers would help to aid the unfortunate who were suffering because of the loss of their crops. The “gleaning law” was designated for those whose land was unproductive because of drought or pestilence (Lv 19:9,10). There was to be no poor among the people because there was sharing in times of need (Dt 15:4,9). There was to be a debt cancellation every seven years (Dt 15). The year of Jubilee, when all land was to be returned to the original owners, was to guarantee that the society would not move into a “haves and have not” economic society (Lv 25). God’s civil equity laws of the Sinai law would guarantee that the society of Israel would never digress into a social order where the poor were marginalized by a rich elite.

A poor class did not exist in Israel until some citizens began to ignore the rules of the Sinai law that were established to ensure that a society of equity would exist and prosper as a whole. Therefore, when inequity set in that produced a minority elite, a majority became the exploited for the benefit of the elite. It was then that God said that such a society could not exist to represent Him among the nations of the world. Such a society could not carry on to manifest His benevolent nature of love to the world.

While Israel was digressing into moral and social decay, God was building two foreign economies that would become stronger than Israel in order to bring judgment upon Israel. Because Assyria and Babylonia became stronger economies with totalitarian governments that had stronger military forces, they were able to overpower a nation that depended on the power of the rich “corporate” owners in the cities of Samaria and Jerusalem. Because the upper wealthy class of Israel could not inspire patriotism from the “deplorable” rural masses, Israel was doomed. The rural masses of the exploited saw no need to defend the prosperity of the rich, even though it was against an invading power.

In the case of Israel, it was not a revolution by the poor farmers, but an invading force that brought the nation to a close because of its moral weakness from within. Ironically, when the outside invading forces showed up at the city gates to bring down the rich city elite, the captors took the elite city survivors into captivity. However, the invading armies “left some of the poor of the land to be vinedressers and farmers” (2 Kg 25:12). With the final destruction of Jerusalem and termination of the southern kingdom of Israel, “Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard [of Babylon] left in the land of Judah the poor of the people who had nothing. And he gave them vineyards and fields at the same time” (Jr 39:10; see Jr 40:7; 52:16).

The irony of both the Assyrian captivity of the northern kingdom of Israel in 722/21 B.C., and the Babylonian captivity of the southern kingdom in 586 B.C., was that the city elite of both Samaria and Jerusalem were marched off into captivity. The poor, however, were allowed to remain in the land to farm the farms and tend the vineyards. God's judgment of the elite exploiters of the poor was just. The poor did not suffer the judgment that was due the elite. The poor, who were left in Palestine, restored a rural society as Israel was when she was first established in Palestine after Egyptian captivity.

The poor were again to institute the rural statutes of the Sinai law. The only thing that changed was that they became an occupied land, first by the Assyrians, then by the Babylonians, then the Medo-Persians, the Greeks, and finally the Romans. It was during the occupation of the Romans that they would be allowed again to have their own king. However, their real King Jesus would not reign on earth in Jerusalem as King Herod. Jesus' reign would be as it was before Israel cried out for a king on earth during the days of Samuel. As the Father was their King in heaven for almost five hundred years after they came out of Egyptian captivity, and when they were a rural society before King Saul, King Jesus would also reign in heaven over the spiritual Israel until the consummation of the world at the end of time. Under the reign of King Jesus, the social economic policy among the citizens of His kingdom reign was explained in Acts 2:44,45: "Now all who believed were together and had all things in common. And they sold their possessions and goods and divided them to all, as everyone had need." This was a social order policy after the order of the Sinai law, that there would be no one in need among the disciples (Dt 15:4,9).

TOO BIG TO SUSTAIN

Israel did not have, but we do, the example of millennia of empires that have fallen because the societies of these empires moved into social conditions that could not be reversed. For example, we again refer to the Roman Empire. One hundred years before Jesus, and because of its strength, Rome had conquered every nation encircling the Mediterranean basin. The problem with the expansion of the Empire, however, was that Rome became ambitious and reached beyond the Mediterranean basin to territories that overextended their financial ability to sustain. By the beginning of the 5th century A.D., their expansion and control aspirations eventually caught up with them. It was then that the Empire began to collapse from within when civil wars and invasions, with national tensions, taxed their financial strength. The end was finally in sight when the Visigoths attacked and took the city Rome in A.D. 410. However, the collapse of the Empire had actually begun far before this date as the society had already started to implode from within.

In the area of government and finances, Rome, as all collapsing empires, ignored the principle of "social thermodynamics." In the realm of natural law, the law of thermodynamics is a principle that the energy that sustains the physical world is constantly degenerating into entropy. The universe is simply running down and will not be restarted with new energy. As a burning match that is going out, the energy that maintains the "burn of the universe" cannot be recaptured to burn again. The energy that maintains the continued existence of the physical world will eventually evaporate into uselessness (entropy). Lost energy will not be regenerated, and thus there remains no more energy to sustain that which is now running down.

The same principle is true of societies and kingdoms. There is a social thermodynamic that cannot be reversed in a democratic, free-market society. The continued existence of the empire is based on the energy of the society to produce wealth, and thus continue the existence of the empire. When the society begins to lose its power to sustain both society and government, then the society and government begin to crumble. Rome exercised great social ingenuity and social energy in order to continue for several centuries. But in its last century of existence, the signs of consummation were evident. The energy of social strength was digressing into a realm of "social entropy."

Rome grew its military force in order to conquer and control a vast number of nations. To encourage continuity and a strained patriotism, she permitted self-rule of those people whom she conquered, and sought to integrate conquered societies into Roman culture and government. Rome sought to encourage patriotism to the Empire that would in turn keep the peace. Rome even gave a limited autonomy to regional courts within the societies of the conquered people. But as Gibbon and other historians have concluded, these things were to no avail. As the society of Rome began to follow the course of “social thermodynamics,” the government and war machine headed into “social entropy.” There was eventually no more social energy (patriotism and finances) to continue the Empire.

When social structures within the society and government of Rome were crumbling, it was only a matter of time until the final collapse. Historians give A.D. 476 as the date of the end of the autonomous function of the Roman Empire. This was the date when the Germanic Odoacer deposed from Rome the last of the Roman Caesars. Odoacer became the first barbarian to rule in Rome. One thousand years of Roman influence over approximately twenty percent of the world’s population came to an end.

And as went Rome, so goes all empires of this world, including Western civilization. As we previously stated, it is not if, but when Western civilization will eventually consummate its existence as we now know it, and give way to another. No civilization can withstand the changing forces of “social thermodynamics.” Even as we write, Western civilization is giving way to another predominate social civilization that will eventually make itself known by the end of this century. A social paradigm shift in Western civilization is well on its way.

The people of West will not vanish away. Only the means by which they morally conduct themselves and govern themselves will pass away. When the final outcome reveals itself as having shifted from the morals of the past, then it may be more advantageous to be a poor farmer in the fields of Palestine, than an elite resident in the crime-ridden urban centers of the empire.

FAITH PERMEATES TRANSITIONS

When the unbelieving citizens of a fading society are on the downside, they seek to find some demon on which they can place the blame for their demise. They conclude that some foreign demon has surely interfered with their continued prosperity and success, and thus has diabolically sought their demise. This outside force has surely been the cause of why they are doing so badly, and specifically, why their system of free-market democratic government has been impaired. Finger pointing and criticism of suspected demons, even from within, become the norm of a society that is moving into “social entropy.”

When we are paranoid about the rise of other contemporary empires, we know we are in trouble. A lack of confidence in the strengths of our own civilization leads us to be in fear of others. By our own telltale division and mutual criticism from within, and the rise of other competitors, we know that our civilization is supposedly under attack, or transforming into another paradigm of social existence. Social division is the impetus that leads us to question our own social structures, and subsequently, expedite our own demise.

Whether perceived, or ignored, societies that are in social chaos are seeking to give birth to something new and different. The physicist, Margret Wheatley, in her book, Leadership and the New Science — Discovering Order in a Chaotic World, alerted us to the fact that both in the physical and social world, chaos always gives birth to something new and different. We may recognize this sociological conflict within a society that is in a social paradigm shift, but we are always apprehensive about the new and different that is coming. Nevertheless, we must realize that social tension is simply a natural process in the social world that is constantly in change. The Holy Spirit revealed this when He metaphorically used the word “sea” as a metaphor to illustrate the restlessness of the people that compose society (See Rv 4:6; 5:13; 7:1-3; 8:8,9; 10:2,5,6).

There is a status quo within the restless “sea” of any civilization. This status quo is always changing. The common identity of what is considered “it-is-our-culture” is always in transition. In other words, the status quo of a society never remains the same throughout the history of any civilization.

We have used the words “liberal” and “conservative” to define the general position of those within any society who are in constant conflict to determine what would be the future status quo of a changing society. The definition of the status quo is always moving at the control of the majority of those who are either liberal or conservative. When either side has the advantage within the society, a new status quo is defined by the opinion of the majority of the people. This is why social norms are always defined by the status quo at any one time in the history of a civilization. For example, if same-sex marriage is accepted by the majority of the society, then same-sex marriage becomes a part of the new status quo. A civilization falls when the status quo constitutes those social norms that are inherently detrimental to the survival of the civilization.

The generation within a restless civilization that is most sensitive to social paradigm shifts is usually the older generation. Older people often stand between the status quo of the past and the new status quo in which they live. The uncertainty of the society in which this generation resides, will, in a democratic government, motivate them out of their easy chairs to go to the ballot box. They go because they perceive that there are candidates to be elected who will preserve the past status quo, and thus, stabilize society and prevent change into a new and different status quo.

The younger generation, however, is often the engine of change. The youth are often in the streets, marching in protest against the status quo of the past. They seek change and the possibility of a spring that will cause the winter of the past to go away. If a society of youth who march for change dwell in a society of autocratic leadership in government, then the street protests become more radical. In order to maintain their power, autocratic leaders often use live bullets to resist the change of the emerging new status quo. People subsequently die in the streets. But if the majority of the protesting generation is young and unemployed, then they will stay in the streets and face the bullets until an “Arab Spring” is realized. If the cries of a peaceful revolution are not heard, then the peaceful turns into violent revolution.

Democracy is certainly not the most efficient form of government. But it is the most free. And that freedom is worth fighting to preserve. In the marches for change in autocratically governed societies, those in power load their guns with bullets to put down revolutions. But in a democratically governed society, the police load up with tear gas. And there is a vast difference between guns and tear gas.

Our advice to the older generation who resists social paradigm shifts is not to become indifferent. They must, in a democratic society, assume their responsibility to vote. They must be thankful that they can make their way in peace to the ballot box.

When bombarded with overwhelming information that pours into our minds because of our obsession with social media, we must be patient. The young people of the West spend an average of four hours a day on social media. If the reported protest march in some area of the society is over an issue that does not involve a paradigm shift in civilization, then patience is in order. There are those on the streets who are seeking relief from social stresses that have built up within their area of society.

Christians who live in democratic societies must be thankful that marches and ballot boxes exist. When these two rights of a democratic society are threatened, then it is time for Christians to be on their knees for their leaders. They must be there in order that they lead a quiet and peaceful life (See 1 Tm 2:1,2). We must always keep in mind that those social forces within a civilization that change the direction of the civilization, transpire over decades, if not centuries. Therefore, it is not a time to become anxious when we are messaged a news report on our smartphones of a minor disagreement of some segment of society where a group of people who are marching for something that will soon pass away.

The beautiful thing about Christianity is that its principles of gospel living are applicable to all societies of all history. The reality of the gospel is that it brings peace of mind that surpasses anything that can be offered by any government of any society. The Christian understands that Jesus is in control of all things, for He now has all authority over all things (Mt 28:18). When a society is in a social paradigm shift, Christians must not forget that they will always come out victorious on the other side (Rv 17:14). The gospel will permeate any social paradigm shift.

Rome fell, but the fall was because of a society that could not sustain a self-imploding government that was unable to militarily rule over all the people of the Empire. The people of Rome (Italy) continued to exist after the fall of Rome, but the government order that continued was new and different. So it will be with the transition of Western civilization into a new paradigm. The people will continue, but they will continue with new and different social standards or governing orders than that which they experienced in the past generations.

In reference to the fall of Rome, we must not forget that the people of God continued strong within the civilization. After the fall of the Roman Empire in A.D. 476, Christians continued to thrive throughout the former boundaries of the fallen Empire. We must not as Christians forget this. Christianity was treated as an insurrectionist religion in the Roman Empire from about A.D. 150 to A.D. 311. In this their darkest hour, Christians hid in the catacombs of Rome. But after Jesus took away the persecuting Caesars, Christianity continued to exist, even unto this day. And thus the encouraging prophecy of Revelation was realized when Caesar Constantine issued the Edict of Toleration in A.D. 311. We thus find encouragement in the words of John who wrote to prepare the early Christians for the state persecution of Rome that was coming soon in their lives, and would not be lifted until A.D. 311:

These [enemies of Christianity] will make war with the Lamb and the Lamb will overcome them, for He is Lord of lords and King of kings. And those who are with Him are called and chosen and faithful (Rv 17:14).

REMEMBERING ROOTS

The citizens of a civilization in transition become increasing dissatisfied and anxious about their future. They often lose hope. They then start assigning blame for their frustrations. But the blame is often directed to those outside their national social order. Their finger pointing is often directed to other social groups, other religions, other nations, or the combination of all the preceding. Or worse, they start blaming their own leadership for the cause of their own uncertain future. They are frustrated because their social transition, of which they are often unaware, seems to be chaotic and out of control. They are mostly unaware that the fall of civilizations always comes first from within. Outside forces are only the mechanism by which the fall is sometimes finalized.

In the American West, a national paranoia has set in to the point that a refugee is now considered a threat to the social existence of the empire. Immigration means the dissolving of the identity of the society that is in chaos. Even within the society itself, divisions arise between race or economic groups in order that identities and social structures be preserved. Therefore, immigration is targeted as one of the threats to the existing civilization. And for this reason, immigration in the West has become the most important social issue of the day.

In the Western civilization of America, amnesia concerning how America was originally built is systemic in producing this social paranoia. America was strengthened in the latter part of the 19th and early 20th centuries when immigrants fled oppressive feudal systems and religious oppression in Europe that offered little hope for the future. In their frustrations, these immigrants had their hopes revived when they gazed from aboard ships that approached the statue of Liberty in New York harbor. Ellis Island became a gateway to a New World for millions who sought hope and freedom.

As immigrants congealed into a society over the next century, they built the “American Dream.” But the present generation, whose fathers and grandfathers built America, seem to have forgotten that what made America great in the first place was the injection of immigrant energy from Europe. The existing society of America is an immigrant society that now seems to turn its back on immigrants who come to America for many of the same reasons their forefathers came more than one hundred years ago. Admittedly, the origin of the new immigrant is different than the origin of the original forefathers, but with many the dream is the same.

New immigrants from oppressive secular and theocratic nations are again looking to the liberating West. The free West has engraved on a plaque of the statue of Liberty the following words of hope:

*Give me your tired,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free.
The wretched refuse of your teeming shore.
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tossed to me,
I lift my lamp beside the golden door.*

A civilization that forgets its roots of freedom upon which it was built, is truly a civilization that has fallen from the true “dreamers” who built the civilization. Every year the United States accepts more immigrants than the rest of the nations of the world combined. But we see a growing resistance against immigration that originally made America great. And from one point of view, this resistance is valid.

Those original immigrants over a century ago built America. They came to the West in order to build a better life. Through hard work and great hardships, they built that for which the new immigrant thirsts to be part. The new immigrant, therefore, is not necessarily seeking to immigrate to the West in order to build, but to get a job in what has already been built. He wants a piece of the pie, but is not thinking about making the pie. He is often a poor financial immigrant who has few dreams of building, but simply becoming a part of the labor force. So in many situations, he does not immigrate on the basis of merit, but on the basis of cashing in on a dream that has already been created. We are sure that those who originally inscribed the preceding words on the statue of Liberty had in mind the masses who could help build the American dream. Those immigrants who built America were generally farmers who spread out across the western frontier of America in order to make a life of freedom for themselves. The new immigrant, however, more often wants to show up in a city and get a job. And when finding no job, he has simply transferred from poverty in his homeland city to be in poverty in a Western city.

In a democratic society, the society as a whole must be cautious about electing a government that would manipulate society against the very principles upon which the society was first built and continues. This means that an immigrant society has the responsibility to allow into its ranks those who will aid in continuing the values of the society and the building of the economy. Nevertheless, with the immigration influx into America over a century ago came also some of those who disrupted the moral values of society. The Mafia came in on the back of a wave of immigrants who wanted to better their lives. But the moral norm of the Mafia was to use the existing society as a means to generate wealth for themselves by leaching off society. In these times, the vetting of those who seek to immigrate often stops at the foreign consultant the socially dysfunctional. Those from gangs as MS-13 (the new Mafia) can be stopped before their social cancer can enter a society that is seeking a better life for all. Islamic radicals who would also seek to endanger the democratic society of the West can be barred from infiltrating a society that seeks to be free in both speech and religion.

Each established society has a right to secure its own borders. If such a right is not enforced, then the society is endangering itself to turn from the values upon which the society was originally established. What the illegal immigrant does not understand is that through his illegal actions, he is actually changing the society to which he illegally immigrates. Through his actions, he is actually making the society to which he illegally entered dysfunctional in law and order that was characteristic of the society from which he fled.

The West must be cautious about any political ambitions of the new immigrant. If the new wave of immigrants come to assimilate into an existing social order in order to continue the “American dream,” then the West should welcome the new social energy that seeks to escape oppression. Those who find freedom will again energize Western civilization. But if the new immigrant seeks to conform his new adopted society to his own political agenda or theocratic constitution, then there will be a stressful social transformation of a Western society that was founded upon freedom from either political or religious oppression.

The West was firmly built on a free democratic society that was liberated from the constraints of both feudal governments and theocratic religiosity that choked freedom of speech and faith. Any threat to these fundamental rights upon which the culture of the West was built should be shunned at all cost.

We look to the United Kingdom as a forecast to caution the West to guard the principles of freedom and free speech upon which immigrants of the past built America. There are today four million Muslims among the sixty-six million population of the UK. However, these four million Muslims have throughout the years elected Muslims as mayors in major cities as London, Birmingham, Oxford and Sheffield. There are now over 1,000 Muslim mosques in the UK, over 130 Sharia courts and 50 Sharia councils, though there is little difference between the courts and councils.

This is not the post WW II picture of the UK. One paradigm shift has already taken place in the civilization of the UK. Since WW II, another social paradigm shift is on its way, if it has not already occurred. The average Muslim family has 2.3 children in the UK, whereas the overall average for the rest of the families is 1.8. One need only to do the math in order to calculate where this civilization will be by the end of the century. In reference to paradigm shifts in society, a shift to Islam is essentially a shift to a different form of government if Muslims do not modernize the Sharia law mandates of the Quran.

Throughout the centuries, the civilization of the UK was not built on the foundation of democracy, liberty, freedom of religion, and free speech as was America. These pillars of civilization came only when kings and feudal systems passed away. These three pillars that define the West are the primary citadels against the invasion of any system of government or religion that would change the constitutional government of the American society. As a note of caution to America, when the vast majority of the UK becomes Muslim, theocratic Islamic law could become the law of the land and the Quran the new constitution. The country will pass from its present democratic society into a system of law upon which the Ottoman Empire was built—Islam.

If Islam modernizes in the UK, then the UK will be spared the paradigm shift from constitutional democratic law to Islamic Sharia law. Many Muslims are now working to modernize Islam, though they face great opposition in the Islamic world. It is simply a race between the modernization of Islam and Islamic majority rule in the UK that will determine the final outcome for the UK civilization.

The efforts of many Muslims to modernize Islam has caused great tension within the Islamic world. We must remember that it is the radical Islamists who are fundamental in their faith of practicing Sharia law. From this very small group of radicals come some who seek to terrorize the rest of the world. We would urge our Western leaders not to base their view of Islam on the terroristic acts of only a few Islamists. We do not want Muslims to define Christianity by the political-religious anomaly of the Crusades. The Christian should be fair in not defining modernized Islam by the crusading Islamic terrorists in their efforts to terrorize the West.

At least the terrorist is unknowingly accomplishing two very important social reactions: (1) By his radical activities, he is making the West more cautious and apprehensive about the conservative agenda of Islam. (2) He is motivating the moderate Muslim to work harder to modernize Islam.

The terrorist is accomplishing both goals, for civilization in general repudiates any form of terrorism against innocent people. Atheists would conclude that the murder of innocent people by a teenage suicide bomber is the ultimate proof that there is no God. And he is right. The god of the terrorist exists only in the mind of the terrorist. Such acts of terror are simply insane madness on the part of a people who cannot assimilate with any society, even with moderate Islamic societies. The West must secure its borders to such people, for radical Islamists are a cancer to any society, including Islamic societies.

INWARD INEQUITY

At times in history in a democratic society, special interests of the society send their candidates to the center of government where social division is reflected in a parliament that has difficulty walking in unity for the benefit of the whole. Representatives of their respective constituencies arise to the floor of congress and express their frustrations as to why the elected officials cannot make unified decisions. The empire, therefore, has started to implode socially through an electorate that reflects the deep divisions that exist within the society. Through social implosion by division, the empire is weakened, and subsequently, it is on its way to consummation from the unity that built the society. From the floor of the parliament we will begin to hear repeatedly the words of betrayed compromises, “et tu, Brute.”

The more divided the empire becomes, the sooner its consummation is realized. Western civilization will not go out with a bang, as many empires of bygone years went out when militarily conquered by an invading army. Western civilization will not come to an end with a nuclear holocaust. That which we now know will simply fade into the past. As the British Empire, upon which the sun once never set, faded away, so Western civilization will fade away in order to give way to a new order. In his book, 2052: A Global Forecast for the Next Forty Years, Jorgen Randers concluded, Western nations are not going to collapse, but the smooth operation and friendly nature of Western society will disappear, because inequity is going to explode.

Rander’s conclusion may be correct. He added, “Democratic, liberal societies will fail, while stronger governments like China will be winners.” In 2017, 1% of the people of the world controlled 82% of the wealth of the world. We can assume that there will be some dramatic changes in societies where there such a great economic inequity is real.

As Christians, our worry is not so much about economic inequity, but moral dysfunction that inequity causes. Economic inequity surely leads to change, if not revolution, but moral dysfunction leads to the collapse of civilizations. Moral irresponsibility is always the cause of fiscal inequity. The greedy will always exist because they are that part of society who have given up the social norm to “love your neighbor as yourself.” The poor are always within society in order to remind the rich not to forget their heart. But when the rich elite have no consideration for the poor, it is then that a group of financial elite within society have lost their heart. And when the elite lose their moral heart for the poor, then the society as a whole begins to spiral down.

We must never forget why God took the land away from the rich city elite of Israel. There were no corporations at the time of Israel’s existence in the land of Palestine. However, the land was the “corporation.” The city elite used the corporate land to exploit the poor farmers. To do this, the rich city elite ignored the restoration law of the year of Jubilee, and thus, the farmers became poor as the city elite controlled the land and the marketing of the produce. In this way, the wealth of the nation shifted from the rural farmers to the corporate elite in the cities. When this happened, God, through both the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, removed the city elite who owned all the land. Since the city elite would not honor the land restitution law of the year of Jubilee, God removed them and restored the land to the poor farmers.

Those who are familiar with rural America understand that land inequity is well on its way to the reason why God brought down Israel. As the wealth of the nation gravitates to the wealthy elite of the city, only the wealthy have the resources to buy the land. The price of the land thus becomes too high for the average farmer to purchase and pay for over time with the profits that come from the sale of the crops of the land.

Corporate farms have arisen in Middle America. The land is moving from individual farmer ownership to corporate ownership, just as it was when God judged Israel. Farmers are becoming tenet farmers of the land, and thus their profits are determined by the speculation of the futures traders on the US stock markets. When there is a good year and crops are plentiful, crop prices are traded low. When there is a dry year, and the crops are sparse, then traders push the prices up on the markets. In both situations, farmers receive the same profit margins for their labors, while the traders on the stock markets make their money in buying and selling on the futures of the stock market. In such a scenario, the farmers never win. We have not forgotten the final years of Israel.

LOSS OF THE MORAL COMPASS

The more liberal a society becomes, the easier it is for the citizens to lose their moral norms, and thus, their moral compass. Consequently, the more liberal the society becomes in a free-market democracy, the easier it is for the people to lose their way. And in such societies, fiscal inequity invariably becomes real, and eventually the social trigger that ignites revolution is pulled.

The definition of a social liberal is that society is allowed the freedom to determine its own moral norms at any time in history. For example, if homosexuality is the present moral norm within the society, and subsequently agreed upon by society as a whole in the present, then homosexuality is right for the times. However, homosexuality is not the real problem. Homosexuality, and a host of other social behavioral dysfunctions of the society according to the Bible, when consolidated as the behavioral norm of the society, bring a civilization to its demise.

A society that has prided itself on freedom, often makes the mistake of assuming that society can exist without any moral boundaries. The far left thus feels liberated from any moral restraints. The liberal seeks freedom from all moral standards, and thus, relishes in the freedom to determine his own social behavior.

As a liberal society, the people as a group are losing moral norms by which they identify themselves as a unique society. They lose those moral structures that keep society as a whole from adopting social behavioral values that promote social continuity. The loss of moral standards is what produces divergent behaviors, which behaviors are contrary to a conservative philosophy of life that produces social stability. Therefore, we must always look deeper into the soul of a liberal society in order to discover those eroded moral norms that cause a paradigm shift from the moral status quo of one civilization to that of another.

Though homosexually and same-sex marriage are social attacks against the family—the major building block of society—the moral problem of the two sins goes much deeper. There is sin beneath the sin. When a civilization is in collapse, those prophets who would stand up and voice their warnings, must focus on the sin beneath the sin that is destroying the sustaining moral norms of the existing society. And in reference to the preceding two social dysfunctions, it is the attack against the central structure of the family that is the problem. This was reflected in the fact that Time Magazine reported in 2015 that 26% of the citizens of the West have made a decision to remain single. Others have made a decision to live a gay life-style. These are choices that are made regardless of the far left erroneously asserting that one is born gay. The Western family is under attack because there are those who choose to live contrary to family values.

But we must dig deeper into the sin beneath the sin of both homosexuality and same-sex marriage. A few of the males among the 26% who have determined to remain single have done so on basis of religious principles. We know this because some young men have not been able to find within Western society a wife who would emulate the relationship of their mothers and fathers who lived according to biblical principles.

In the Western civilization of yesteryear, before 50% of the marriages ended in divorce, the wife maintained an Ephesus 5:22-33 relationship with her husband. In other words, the wife submitted to her own husband in order to live an example of how a citizen must submit to authority in society. But when children grow up in homes where there are no examples of submission, they often go forth into society without a social norm of submission to authority. This is particularly true in a home where there was an environment where a wife resisted any form of submission to her husband. When we speak of these things, we must not forget that when any principle of the Bible is violated, there will be consequences.

The “women’s liberation movement” that started over a half century ago in Western civilization has now produced its fruit. Part of the fruit is single parent “families.” Another fruit is in reference to a man who wants to be a man in a marriage relationship. One male resident of the West once said to us, “I think I will find an immigrant woman to marry in order to find someone who knows how to submit according to biblical principles.”

The submission of the wife in a marital relationship is a biblical norm. Violate this norm and society will pay the price with many citizens who do not know how to submit to authority. Two men, or two women will often live in a homosexual or lesbian “partnership” because neither came from homes where the dignified ministry of submission was lived by a devoted wife. Of course these thoughts seem outlandish in a liberal society where Bible standards for marital relationships are now deeply resented.

The liberal can never address the sin beneath the sin that destroys any social order. The liberal cries out in fear about generating the possibility of a nuclear war, a truly bad “sin.” But he fails to see the flawed moral norm that would push the nuclear button in the first place. In the fall of the existing Western civilization, it will not be a nuclear blast that will lead to the end, but a gradual decay of stabilizing moral norms that govern how we socially interact with one another. When the moral norms of the God-ordained structure of the family falls aside, then we know that a civilization is on its way out.

If we are liberal, and thus refuse to be directed by constant moral norms, then the majority in a democratic free society will transition the conservative society of the past into a new and different society of the future. This process of change is already at work in the West. If the 2016 presidential election in America revealed anything, it revealed the statistical fact that America is now divided in about half between neo-liberals and conservatives. It is our prediction that the neo-liberals will eventually win the elections in the decades to come simply because it is usually the demeanor of conservatives to remain somewhat indifferent to social changes and take the moral blows of a fading civilization. It is usually the liberals of society who get out and march for their positions, while conservatives stay home and watch on their televisions and complain about the liberal marchers.

We must continually remind ourselves that elections in free societies are the reflection of the society as a whole. It is worthless rhetoric to complain about the politicians who are elected by society. Society puts the politicians in power in order that decisions be made for a population that voted for the political position of the elected politicians.

The extreme loss of moral norms in the Philippines encouraged a frustrated society to vote into power an autocratic leader who rightfully saw, in the proliferation of drugs, the end of their democratic society. Extreme measures, therefore, were implemented to alleviate society of the problem that would bring down their democracy, for a democracy cannot survive a cultural behavior of drug addiction—do not forget this point. But the problem was and is not the drugs, nor a new social order of extreme police domination. The problem is sin beneath the sin. Social problems within society must be addressed before the sins of society can be corrected. Unfortunately, a liberal society exists because it seeks not to be judged by standard moral norms. Because of this, it cannot correct itself, and thus ends up in a downward spiral.

If a society is to be morally preserved for the future, then the moral norms that make a society functional must be highlighted by society as a whole. Unfortunately, in a society that is on its way out or down, there will be no marches by liberals in the streets who encourage the binding of moral standards. If there are marches by those who seek moral standards, then there will be voices of derision from the liberals against the moral marchers. Liberal marchers always march against those who would impose on them moral discipline.

In the country of our present residence, there was a nationwide moral march against the high number of murders, especially those committed on farms. One of the degenerate politicians of one of the parties of the nation stood up and berated the marchers with the statement, “If they [the moral marchers] don’t like the country, then let them leave the country.” This is the language of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is immoral language that brings nations down. The problem comes when the supposedly moral leaders of the country and the religious leaders do not sense the self-destructive sentiment of such language of moral degradation. A society is in serious trouble when the leaders of society have been desensitized to the moral degradation of the society as a whole.

Consider also the January 2018 Western CNN interview with the new president of Zimbabwe. The interviewer asked the President, “Will you defend the civil rights of same-sex marriage?” The President replied, “Such is against our constitution, and it is my duty as President to defend the constitution of my country.” The CNN interviewer then asked, “So you are willing to keep your country in another age” (Emphasis mine, R.E.D.). We wonder if the interviewer in this matter did not represent a dysfunctional society that is morally degenerate, while the “Third World” leader was trying to preserve a higher standard of morality for his country. At the very least, the interviewer was a representative of a Western civilization that has fallen from the moral standards of the Zimbabwean President, which moral standards were once cherished in the West less than half a century ago.

Those moral dysfunctions that took down Sodom and Gomorrah have now become classified as human rights in Western civilizations. And it is a function of the United Nations to promote human rights throughout the world. Therefore, not only has the West adopted those “human rights” that bring down the family structures of a society, the moral values of the West are now a mandate for the United Nations to impose on the rest of the world.

The Philippines is an example of a society that revealed through drug abuse that it morally lost its way, as the West as a society has revealed that it has lost its way in the opioid epidemic. We are waiting to see what the West will eventually do in response to the opioid epidemic of Western civilization.

Statistics are now out for 2016 and 2017 in reference to life expectancy in the United States. Because of the opioid deaths, particularly among Millennials, average life expectancy has come down in America. Heroin related deaths tripled in America from 2010 to 2015. The New York Times, in a news release entitled, “The Opioid Epidemic: A Crisis Years in the Making,” reported:

The current opioid epidemic is the deadliest drug crisis in American history. Overdoses, fueled by opioids, are the leading cause of death for Americans under 50 years old—killing roughly 64,000 people last year [2017], more than guns or car accidents, and doing so at a pace faster than the H.I.V. epidemic did at its peak.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported through Reuters, Life expectancy in the United States dipped in 2016 as the number of deaths due to opioid drug overdoses surged and total drug overdose deaths rose 21 percent to 63,600.

The U.S. Centers for Disease Control also reported that opioid deaths have been on the rise since 1999. However, between 2014 and 2016 there was an average surge of 18 percent per annum in opioid-related deaths. Of the approximately 64,000 opioid-related deaths in 2107, most occurred between the ages of 25 – 54.

There is social sin beneath the sin in this civilization. We see the symptoms of this moral cancer that is eating away at society. If what usually happens in the future in reference to solutions that are made by liberal democratic societies in the present, the solution to the opioid epidemic will not deal with the real sin that has caused the sin of opioid addiction. To address the problem, the liberal society of America has simply increased legislative punishment against the supposed perpetrators (the drug companies) whom they have demonized. Lawsuits, therefore, are now brought against the opioid producing corporations.

The Philippines, in a different manner, dealt with the problem of drug abuse through the rise of an autocratic leader and police force that dealt harshly with the drug offenders on the street. Thousands of drug users and dealers were shot dead in the streets. But in a liberal society, these measures are judged to be too harsh and barbaric. Nevertheless, if all the lawsuits against the opioid corporations are won, the problem of opioid addiction will not be solved. The liberals of society, who reject the enactment of strong moral standards, will find contentment for themselves in their minor victories to prevent social destruction by penalizing corporations. Western civilization that has sluffed off moral constraints is actually overdosing itself and committing social suicide.

A liberal society always deals with its social problems by enacting legislation against evil. But this is only a surface cure. The citizenship forgets to deal with their own hearts. They want to ban guns, but only put bandages on evil hearts. This is now the way of the West. Their interpretation of freedom is to ignore the sin that causes harm to their own social order.

DISCOVERING THE MORAL COMPASS

Liberal societies never approach the problems of society through the preaching of moral norms. The corporate liberal news media will report and cry out against the opioid epidemic and other social problems. However, they will never interview a Bible believer who has the solution for the problem of opioid addiction. The corporate news media cannot interview the Bible student because the very definition of a liberal society is that the people seek to free themselves from moral restraints.

Since the majority of the viewers of the corporate liberal news media pay the bills of the corporation through their purchase of the products of the sponsors, then the corporate news media is locked into aiding the downward spiritual of the civilization. In other words, there are not enough conservative viewers to buy the products of the sponsors. The corporate news media must cater to the majority of the viewers in order to keep their ratings up. And when the vast majority of the viewers are the liberals of society, then the corporate news media can only lean toward the desires of the liberals of society. They must do this in order to survive as a corporation in the free-market economy. The focus of news broadcasting in the West has now tipped toward the liberal base of society. So unless the Western viewer turns off his or her televisions, liberal values will continue to be fed into the minds of those who seek to free themselves from moral restraints.

The lack of moral norms of the liberal society of Noah's day led the people in the direction in which "every imagination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil continually" (Gn 6:5). There was a point of no moral return to establish standards that would preserve that civilization. The same is true of Western society today. Every day the majority of the corporate news media must, for financial survival, please the liberal majority of their viewers.

We are not optimistic about the solution the liberal West will provide for the opioid epidemic. The West may build more jails, but jails are only a legal bandage to a real social cancer about which the legal news media is unable to report.

There are more people incarcerated in prisons in America than in any other nation of the world. One answer to solve this prison problem is to legalize what put many people in prison. So the West is now on its way to legalizing certain euphoric drugs. But this too is not the solution. Since many of the West have lost their moral center of reference, it is doubtful that the West will ever deal with the sin beneath the sin by dealing with the emotional depression of those who seek a chemical solution for depression.

Faith assumes moral standards. But the Western liberal seeks to throw off the moral standards of faith that bring relief to both stress and depression. This means that any faith that promotes an absolute moral standard must be ignored, or sent out the back door of the church house. Society would rather overdose on opioids than overdose on faith.

We have now introduced ourselves to a paradox in reference to what we formerly referred to as a "Christian" nation. Why would a supposedly "Christian" nation end up with a psychological social sickness that leads to the death of over 64,000 people every year from opioid overdose? Why would a "Christian" nation have a decrease in life-expectancy because of the opioid epidemic? Where are the guardians of faith of this society?

The answers to these questions is quite simple. We would suppose that a "Christian" nation would morally direct its society by moral standards that would preserve society, which moral standards are commonly stated throughout the Bible. These moral standards were the foundation upon which the West was originally built when the first Puritan immigrants stepped off the Mayflower. But something has gone terribly wrong.

All went well until about half a century ago when the religious community of the West became simply religious, having forsaken the authority of the word of God. And in forsaking the authority of the word of God, society was released from the moral constraints of the Bible. Religion in Western culture today is generally not Bible based, especially in reference to the application of moral standards.

The liberal thinking of society has moved into churches. In order to keep the liberals in attendance (particularly the Millennial Generation), religious leaders can no longer preach "hell, fire and brimstone" sermons that are based on Bible truth. Western religion has subsequently become biblically sterile. And through the international communications media, this sterile religion has been broadcast throughout the world. Instead of serious Bible study, pastors and priests watch or hear their sermons on the communications media, and then stand up on Sunday morning with the same morally sterile, “Bibleless” sermons. Social media as Facebook and Twitter have brought the world together, but they have also become the engines to propagate moral decline throughout the world. Bible study is no longer a part of being religious. Religion in the world today is based on how many people can be gathered for a concert, a charismatic speaker, and in some cases, performed “miracles.”

One of the greatest religious leaders of Western civilization was buried in America not long ago. After living a long ninety-nine years, Billy Graham was laid to rest. He was probably one of the greatest, if not the greatest religious leaders that Western civilization produced. But his greatness in his generation of the 1940s and 1950s will always remind us that the West has religiously fallen from the days of his ministry.

Graham drew hundreds of thousands to stadiums across America. He drew people with the simple message of the gospel of Jesus Christ and repentance. But today, that same message draws audiences only in the hundreds. Those years of Graham, and a host of others who preached Christ and repentance, are forever gone in Western civilization. They are gone because the religious community of the West has dwindled to a small remnant of faithfuls who are becoming even smaller. Since the believer is the salt of the earth, the salt is fast passing out of the West. The West that sent a missionary force of faith into all the world in the middle twentieth century is now withdrawing within itself for its own preservation.

The mission of the Western remnant has for half a century struggled through motivational sermons and entertainment to build assemblies and draw contributions. But there is no message to strike fear in the hearts of those who continually violate the Divine principles of gospel living. The people are not drawn to forceful messages that call the people to repentance. If Jesus were to personally speak out today to the Western religious world, He would surely say the following:

I have a few things against you because you have there those who hold the teaching of Balaam, who taught Balak to cast a stumbling block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols and to commit fornication (Rv 2:14).

I have a few things against you because you tolerate that woman Jezebel, who calls herself a prophetess and teaches and deceives My bondservants to commit fornication and to eat things sacrificed to idols (Rv 2:20).

You say, “I am rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing.” But you do not know that you are wretched and miserable and poor and blind and naked (Rv 3:17).

In these times, “miracle-working” charismatic prosperity preachers have sought to captivate audiences. The attendees are overwhelmed in hysterical faith-healing assemblies, but go home with the same life-style by which they conducted themselves on the way to the religious theater. Because the people are deceived by experiential religiosity, they do not hear sermons today coming from pulpits that use the word of God to bring judgment on homosexuality, same-sex marriage, fornication and a host of other sins that destroy both the family and the moral fabric of society (See Gl 5:19-21).

Therefore, we are not surprised with the opioid addiction in a society that has rejected Divine social standards that deal with the stress of the soul. When a society is in social turmoil, stressed out about having no moral compass, then drugs, not faith, are always the solution in such secular societies. A faithless society never adopts solutions that deter the moral fall of civilizations.

The opioid epidemic is to a great extent among the Millennial Generation, those who are in their late twenties and early thirties. According to Rainer and Rainer, this generation is only 6% religious in reference to believing in the authority of the Bible and Jesus as the One through whom one would approach God (The Millennials, p. 232). This is basically a faithless generation of about 80 million strong in a nation of over 300 million. This generation is bringing down the religious core of Western civilization. The children and grandchildren of this faithless generation will greatly decrease faith in the Western civilization as we now know it. Faith in the West is becoming the minority even as we write these words. The remnant of faith is fading away. In the future, the faithful “120” will be meeting in an upper room in order to start it all over again.

And for us who grew up on a farm in Middle America, even now, America is not what it was in the days of our youth when men like Graham drew hundreds of thousands into stadiums to listen to Bible preaching. No mass audiences could be drawn together today to listen to the preaching of Jesus Christ.

Unfortunately, many of those who are seeking to immigrate to America are driven to do so by a dream that no longer exists in reality. They are motivated by an illusion. The “Christian” nation of America has long since faded into a memory of years gone by. If you do not believe this, then consider the following moral norms that were not accepted as common life-styles in the general public fifty years or more ago. These social dysfunctions existed, but the general acceptance of these life-style sins today is the signal of a morally fallen society:

- Abortion
- Fornication of every kind
- Gender choice
- Gender changing
- Same-sex marriage
- Homosexuality
- Mass abuse of drugs of every kind
- Pornography of every kind
- Premarital sex
- Premarital cohabitation
- Recreational sex
- Divorce for every reason
- Despising public officials
- Despising the President

Need more be said? If we would continue listing the specifics of the sins of the flesh in Galatians 5:19-21, we could mention many dysfunctional behavioral sins that are now accepted as normal in the West and openly promoted in society by a liberal corporate news media and the entertainment industry.

Those who ascribe to the above listed social dysfunctions are often highly critical of other societies that are governed by moral absolutes, especially religious absolutes. For this reason, no Western liberal corporate news media has been kind to the President of the Philippines, or the existing President of a divided American society. Through the social news media, corporate news media, Hollywood, television, and now some articles on the human rights of the United Nations, the West is seeking to take the rest of the world into this social sin quagmire where “the thoughts and imaginations of men are only evil continually.” It is not simply a Western sin phenomenon, but it is now spreading worldwide through Western systems of communication.

The Western resident simply cannot understand why a woman wants to wear a hijab (head covering) to reveal her faith and womanhood in an Islamic society. The Western woman cannot understand the fact that a Muslim woman personally wants to wear the hijab in public in order to manifest her submission to her husband. For this reason, the liberal West will never understand Islamic countries, for the social fabric of Islamic countries is religiously and culturally conservative, and thus functions in contrast to neo-liberal Western values. Islamic countries thus consider themselves threatened by the neo-liberal West. They believe that Islam is under attack by the behavior that is promoted by the moral liberals of Western civilization. And they are right. The fact that the West judges Islamic countries to be backward because of their conservative life-style should give some indication of how far to the left on modesty and morals the West has gone.

For the same reason, it is difficult for the West to understand culturally conservative nations as Russia and China. The Russian society is conservative, based much on the moral conservatism of the Russian Orthodox Church. China, and the Far East, are likewise morally conservative according to the teaching of Buddhism. Both civilizations have centuries of existence that have been based on conservative moral norms.

For the liberal Westerner, the religiously conservative Russia, and principle-driven China, are to be feared because he cannot envision that we can live with moral absolutes in a free democratic world. We cannot bring down harsh judgment on drug offenders. We cannot execute thieves and punish adulterers. The death penalty is considered barbaric. We could never defend a constitution that prohibits fornication and same-sex marriage. Such constitutional mandates are indications of “another age.”

A liberal society, therefore, is continually in judgment of a social order that would be controlled by conservative values. Since the social liberal thrives in a social order wherein freedom from control is the foundation upon which all things can be changed to satisfy the status quo, then the liberal concludes that citizens who live in morally controlled societies have no freedom. This may explain why the citizens of Western civilizations are so fearful of both Russia and China, and some Islamic countries. But the liberal has simply forgotten that there is no freedom without law and there are no morals without law. A liberal resents being criticized by any who would judge him according to absolute moral standards. He is known for his reaction, “Don’t judge me.” But what the social liberal is doing in protesting for freedom from moral restrictions is taking his or her civilization to where every thought and imagination of society is only evil continually.

ROAD MAP TO CONSUMMATION

The historical setting of the prophecy that Jesus made in Matthew 24 took place in the latter part of His earthly ministry (See also Mk 13 & Lk 21). The information revealed in the prophecy was for the purpose of preparing His Jewish disciples for the fulfillment of the prophecies of both Daniel and Ezekiel concerning the consummation of national Israel after the Messiah had come. The fulfillment of the prophecy of Matthew 24 subsequently became added information for the disciples as they went forth throughout the Roman Empire from Jewish synagogue to Jewish synagogue.

The disciples' ministry was first to preach the gospel and proclaim that Jesus was the fulfillment of all Messianic prophecies (Lk 24:44). However, they were also to prepare the Jewish Christians for the consummation of their national heritage. When the disciples went forth with the message of the gospel, they informed all the Jews to whom they went that it was indeed "the end of times." God was going to shut the book on national Israel.

The fullness of times had come upon national Israel, and now it was time to terminate this special nation of people that God had used to bring the Messiah and Savior into the world. There would not be another Messiah. There would not be another Savior. Therefore, unless the unbelieving Jews who rejected Jesus should hope that the Messiah was yet to come in Israel, God shut down Israel.

Israel was no longer needed as a physical heritage from which a Messiah or Savior would come. The Savior had come and was standing in the midst of those to whom the message of Matthew 24 was directed. What was now offered to the Jews was the only alternative they had in reference to any covenant relationship with God (See At 4:12). All things were summed up in Jesus Christ, and thus the last excuse not to respond to the gospel of Jesus was about to be taken away in the destruction of national Israel, the temple and Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

Those who would seek to further their understanding of what transpired during the final days of Jerusalem should consult the Jewish historian, Josephus. Josephus wrote Jewish Wars as a personal account of the final wars of Rome against the insurrectionist Jews of the Roman Empire. As a historian who was contemporary with the events, Josephus claimed to have been a personal witness of the fall of Jerusalem. His account of the fall of the city is quite revealing.

In their novice interpretations of the Scriptures, many miss much of the context and purpose for which Jesus gave the information of the Matthew 24 prophecy. Instead of applying the prophecy to Jesus' intended audience to prepare contemporary Jewish Christian families for the end of their national heritage, some seek to steal the fulfillment of the prophecy from those immediate Jews. They mistakenly apply the fulfillment of the prophecies to a time two thousand years removed from the first century Jews.

In fact, their misapplication of the fulfillment of the Matthew 24 prophecy is quite calloused. Instead of Jewish fathers and mothers, who lived with their many children in Jerusalem at the time, being warned and prepared for the final destruction of Jerusalem, they steal the warning of the prophecy from these fathers and mothers. They leave these Jewish families in Jerusalem unprepared for the coming of the Roman armies, and thus condemn them to suffer the fate of being a part of the over one million Jews who were killed during that calamity that overcame Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

Those profiteers today who voice their misunderstanding of Jesus' prophecy steal away from those early Jewish families the warning that Jesus made to His beloved resident Jewish disciples in Jerusalem. They do so by applying the prophecy to some historical fantasies that are yet to occur in the future. In doing so, they have interpreted the prophecy erroneously. They are willing to leave those early Jewish families in Jerusalem without any warning to flee the calamity that would occur in A.D. 70. They are willing to do this in order to satisfy their own misguided prognostications concerning the final coming of Jesus.

We are convinced that some preachers today need to take another look at what they would be doing if their application of the Matthew 24 prophecy does not refer specifically to the Jewish Christian families of the first century. If they were themselves Jews and residents of Jerusalem in those years leading up to the fall of Jerusalem, and were standing in the presence of Jesus when He made this prophecy, then surely they would want to have their children and grandchildren warned concerning the devastation of their lives that would take place forty years after Jesus made the statements of the prophecy. They, too, would want their families to flee Jerusalem.

In fact, if Jesus was who He said He was, and God was bringing national Israel to a catastrophic conclusion through the destruction of Jerusalem, then we would rightly suppose that Jesus would forewarn the Christians who lived in Jerusalem. If He did not warn them, then two things would be true: First, Jesus was totally unaware of the consummation of national Israel, but supposedly, according to some interpreters, aware of all “signs of the times” in reference to His final coming. However, if He were supposedly aware of the signs of His final coming, then certainly He could have been aware of the signs that led up to the consummation of national Israel.

Second, if Jesus knew of the coming destruction, but did not give the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem warning, then He was calloused and hard in heart. Jesus was at the time at least a prophet. And as God warned of the fall of national Israel through His Old Testament prophets, then Jesus was given the same privilege to warn the disciples. We must always remember the principle of the statement of Amos 3:7: “Surely the Lord God will do nothing without first revealing His plans to His servants the prophets.”

Jesus said, “But of that day and hour no one knows, not even the angels of heaven nor the Son, but My Father only” (Mt 24:36). On earth, Jesus did not reveal the “day and hour.” If He had, then we would accuse Him of not revealing that specific “day and hour” in order for the resident Jerusalem Christians to flee the day just before the “day and hour” when the Roman army showed up at the gates of the city. Instead, as God did through the Old Testament prophets, He gave them all the indications of the fulfillment in order that through faith, they would believe the “signs,” and then move away from Jerusalem the years before the fall.

Unfortunately, too many interpreters today do the same with the prophecies of the prophets of the Old Testament, as well as John’s prophecies of the book of Revelation. They leapfrog over the intended fulfillment of the prophecies in time in their obsessions to find some “signs of the times” for the end of the world at the end of time. In doing this, they miss entirely the fulfillment of the prophecies of these books in the context of those who would personally experience the fulfillment of the prophecies.

Throughout the Old Testament prophets, God prepared His people for their fall as an independent nation when the Assyrians and Babylonians were to be victorious over both the northern and southern kingdoms of Israel (See Am 3:7). In the same way, Jesus, in the prophecy of Matthew 24, prepared the resident Jewish Christians of Jerusalem for the termination of national Israel in the destruction of Jerusalem.

As He did with those empires He used to punish Israel in Old Testament times, God would eventually bring down the Roman Empire. As God had brought down both the Assyrian and Babylonian kingdoms, He would also bring down the Roman Empire that rose up its head against His people, the church. In the book of Revelation, John would encourage the Christians of the Roman Empire concerning its consummation, which eventually took place in the latter part of the 5th century.

In the context of Matthew 24, we seek to identify those things that Jesus said would identify the “signs of the times” that would exist during the consummation of a civilization. We seek to know those things that are indications of the fall of civilizations, for indeed, the fulfillment of the prophecy of Jesus concerning Jerusalem was more than the fall of a city. As Josephus graphically explained, it was the consummation of a civilization.

In the fall of both the northern and southern kingdoms of Israel through the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, Israel lost her right to the possession of the promised land and her independence as a theocratic nation. However, the people were allowed to keep their Jewish identity. Nevertheless, in the fall of Jerusalem, not only were over a million Jews killed in the actual battle of Jerusalem, but the remaining eighty or more thousand survivors, according to Josephus, were sold off as slaves across the Roman Empire, thus eliminating any Jewish establishment as a people in Palestine. Though all the goals of the Romans were never truly realized in their war against Judaism, at least all the birth documents of the Jews were destroyed in the burning of the Jewish temple. All that the dispersed Jews had to identify themselves as Jews was their memory of who they were, which information was passed from one generation to another unto this day.

Some of the social reasons for the consummation of national Israel in A.D. 70 are those reasons why all civilizations come to a close. When Jesus revealed the collapse of national Israel, He embedded within His message reasons for the fall. He wanted the Jews to understand at the time of the collapse of the Jewish civilization that it was their own fault. It was not that the Romans just woke up one morning and decided to end Israel. Vespasian, the commander of the Roman army at the time, simply responded to an increasing “Jewish problem” that necessitated the extraction of the Jewish social cancer from the Empire. The following are some of the surrounding circumstances that Jesus revealed would occur during the final days of national Israel. Our task is to determine if some or all of these social characteristics exist in the Western civilization of today.

• Social dishonesty: We must keep in mind that Jesus made His statements in this context in view of the Jews' nationalistic hope for the reestablishment of an independent Israel. Even the disciples had this misguided belief unto the final hours of His time on earth (See At 1:6). In order to recruit loyalty to the national/religious state (theocracy), insurrectionist Jews would use deception to convince fellow countrymen to take up arms against Rome. If Christians were not alert to this misguided patriotic call, then some Jewish disciples could possibly join the ranks of the resistance. Therefore, Jesus warned His disciples, "Take heed that no one deceives you" (Mt 24:4).

There would arise many who would come and claim to be the Messiah (the Christ), whom the Jews believed, would restore national independent Israel (Mt 24:5; see At 1:6). These religious/political deceivers would "show great signs and wonders to deceive, if possible, even the elect" (Mt 24:24). Because the nationalistic Jews had rejected Jesus as the Messiah, in the final years before A.D. 70 when political tensions began to rise between nationalistic Jews and Rome, there were numerous political messiahs who arose in order to recruit fellow Jews to rally around a nationalistic cause.

We would assume, therefore, from Jesus' warning to His disciples that they be not deceive. The fact that they could be deceived indicates that the religious/political intimidation in the final years of national Israel would be strong. In fact, it became so strong that even some Jewish Christians could possibly be led astray in answer to the patriotic call of the false messiahs. At least, when the book of Hebrews was written during the last decade before A.D. 70, there were some Christian Jews who were being intimidated into returning to the Sinai law and covenant that the nationalists were particularly enshrining in the minds of the Jewish society (See Hb 2:1-3; 6:4-6; 10:36-39).

• Popular leadership: The Jews were waiting for the coming of a national restorationist messiah. Their expectations were earthly, not spiritual. And because Jesus' kingdom was not of this world, He did not have a great reception among the nationalistic Jews of His day (See Jn 1:11; 18:36).

In the final years of Israel, Jesus revealed that there were those who would appoint themselves to be the messiah (christ). These would be those who would stir up the patriotism of the people in order to gain a following to lead in rebellion against Rome (See At 21:38). These popular messiahs believed that they could lead the people in a movement to restore an independent national Israel if the occupation of Roman could be overthrown. According to Josephus, even in the final days before the fall of Jerusalem, there were false messiahs springing up within the falling city of Jerusalem who were calling on the people to remain loyal to the cause.

Leaders who could make the loudest noise in appealing to the patriotism of the people were elected as the leaders of the day. "Make Israel Great Again" was the cry, and many joined the ranks of the rebellion against the Romans. If only Israel could separate herself from the Roman community, these false messiahs preached, then she would prosper. What actually happened in history was that all the nationalistic leaders passed on, national Israel was concluded, and history moved on. They forget that when a civilization is in its final chapter, no individual leader can prevent its cessation.

When civilizations fall, no one individual can be the messiah to prevent the fall. The fall of civilizations is not determined by the leaders. Self-proclaimed messiahs can delay the process of falling, but we must not forget that self-proclaimed messiahs are always populace leaders. They are voted into office by a popular vote because the people are simply frustrated in their present situation. They are thus looking for a "messiah" who will deliver them out of their social despair. But the people must not forget that their frustrations are the result of their own moral demise. They themselves are the problem, whether in cause or effect. There may be no outside force that is occupying the land. After all, Rome did not decide to terminate Israel until Israel from within provoked Rome.

If the fall of a civilization is coming from within, then the citizenship must consider the possibility that there are those from within who are seeking to overcome the land. A liberal or revolutionary movement is working from within the Western society to change society to a new and different order. A social paradigm shift is happening from within and no one "popular messiah" can stop the shift.

When Jesus came into the world as the Messiah, He represented a new and different order. However, what He brought as the Messiah was contrary to the expectations of the religious establishment of the day. The majority subsequently dispelled with Him and His Way because He did not conform to the religious aspirations of the general public. He did not preach a nationalistic message that would please the populace Jews who were headed for the termination of their social order in A.D. 70. When a civilization is set on a course for a paradigm shift, the change is going to happen regardless of the efforts of any one individual.

Jesus' message of Matthew 24 was an encouraging reminder to the disciples that they would continue to remain in the minority when the final day came. No populace messiah would change the final outcome of the misguided majority. In fact, the conclusion of the misguided majority would be the opportunity for the faithful minority to “shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father” (See Mt 13:36-44). When Christianity permeated the fall of national Israel, then the world could see that the body of Christ was not a sect of the Jews.

• Stirring of fear: Jesus alerted the disciples, “And you [disciples] will hear of wars and rumors of wars. See that you are not troubled, for these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet” (Mt 24:6). The Roman Empire was continually engaged in some war with some nation somewhere throughout the extremities of the borders of the Empire. As America in the world today, Rome was in perpetual war somewhere in the Empire. In order to engage in these wars, Rome was built on the backbone of a strong military. In fact, as also in America, it was a military welfare state where the military consumed a great deal of the taxable income of the state. The Caesars of Rome had a thirst for conquest and expansion, and thus, every effort was made to build the military through tax increases. However, the wars about which Jesus spoke in this context were battles between Jewish loyalists and Rome as the Roman army took three years of war before ending the war against Israel in A.D. 70.

When Vespasian marched the Roman army from Rome to Jerusalem, for three years he squashed every Jewish resistance effort alone the way. Word of mouth of the battles spread like wildfire in reference to what was transpiring. This gave the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem, who believed the prophecy of Jesus, time to get out of town. Jesus’ prophecy of Matthew 24 saved the lives of thousands of Christians who were still living in Jerusalem at the time. Because they believed the prophecy of Jesus, they fled for safety to other regions of the Roman Empire.

A previous exodus from Jerusalem, because of the persecution of Saul, is insignificant in reference to what eventually came in A.D. 70 (See At 8:4). This initial exodus of Christians from Jerusalem set the ground work for the massive exodus prior to A.D. 70. Because of the initial exodus, there were relatives already settled in other regions of the Empire who could receive Judean family members who fled during the exodus immediately before A.D. 70.

The distant wars, therefore, were the signal of the coming end. When the Christians in Jerusalem heard of these skirmishes, Jesus said, “See that you are not troubled, for these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet” (Mt 24:6). The skirmishes between rebellious Jews on the road from Rome to Jerusalem were only signals that doom was in sight for national Israel. These wars, however, were only a sign that the end was coming.

The resident Christians in Jerusalem must not become complacent and assume that Rome’s victories over Jewish zealots in distant lands would appease Rome’s determination to once and for all terminate the insurrection of Judaism in the Empire. The Christians must remember that Rome was determined to cut the heart out of the Jewish insurrection by the total destruction of Judaism and Jerusalem. The Christians’ love for their homes, therefore, must not lead them to believe that Rome would surely not bring down the temple and Jerusalem.

(We must add here that the countless wars in which Rome involved herself in her last century of existence as a world Empire eventually led to almost bankrupting the Empire. The borders of the Empire had been extended to so many distant lands, that it became increasingly difficult for the central government to support the military establishment. As America that has over 700 military bases throughout the world today, Rome over-extended herself militarily. If the military failed, then the Empire would collapse, which very thing happened at the end of the 5th century. Rome could not support a strong enough military to hold back the invading Germanic groups from the north.

All this did not transpire for over four centuries after the events about which Jesus prophesied in Matthew 24. At the time of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the strength of the military of Rome was at its zenith.)

• Conflicting society: “For nation will rise up against nation and kingdom against kingdom” (Mt 24:7). When a civilization is in its final years of existence, it is tormented by other civilizations that would assume their leading role in world affairs. Civilizations exists because of military strength, for it is the military strength of a nation that builds and sustains the civilization through strength. It is a strong military that intimidates other civilizations to negotiate for terms of peace (Compare Lk 14:31,32).

Though Jesus was not directly educating the disciples in reference to the fall of civilizations, He was giving them historical information to which they must be sensitive in reference to the civilization of which they were a part. The Roman civilization would continue after the fulfillment of all those things about which He spoke. However, the Jewish civilization, with its Roman-controlled nationalism within Palestine, would cease. It would cease because God allowed in the leadership of the Jewish civilization the existence of the false messiahs who would lead the Jews to accomplish His will, that is the termination of national Israel in Palestine.

The end of some civilizations is characterized by their clashes with other civilizations. On the world stage of the rise and fall of civilizations, the first indication of the fall of one civilization and the rise of another is revealed when there are clashes of one civilization with another. Throughout history the clashes between civilizations have often been the result of military conflicts. But military conquests do not demand the passing of the citizenship of a civilization.

The fall of civilizations from within is different. These consummations come through revolutions. The fall from within is characterized by sociological clashes within the citizenship. Whether from outside forces through military conflicts, or through social conflicts from within, what comes out on the other side of social chaos is something new and different. The citizenship is changed until another era of tension arises that starts the cycle of change all over again.

We must never forget that dominant civilizations will always have “cold wars” or “trade wars” with one another. This is the relationship between contemporary kingdoms that are in contact with one another. From the beginning of time, there has always been a struggle of one civilization against another. But when a civilization falls from within, the fall is often not realized by the citizenship. It is usually not realized until historians start writing history books on the way it was.

In the context of Jesus’ prophecy there were certainly continual military conflicts of Rome against other world kingdoms throughout the extremities of the Empire. However, Jesus’ reference to clashing kingdoms was probably more in reference to isolated Jewish confrontations with Rome throughout the Roman Empire. Because of the continual clashes of pockets of Jewish resistance throughout the Empire, the Roman government sought a final solution to the problem of Jewish insurrection. Therefore, the final solution was to march on Jerusalem, and thus destroy the center of Jewish patriotism and religiosity.

• The sign of natural catastrophes: During the days of the prophet Amos, God had to reveal through Amos that the great locust plague that brought great suffering upon the people at the time was actually judgment sent directly from God. The people thought it was just another natural plague. But God wanted the people to know that the plague was His doing in order to urge the people of the northern kingdom of Israel to repent.

This seems to be the same connecting of the dots in reference to what Jesus said in the context of the final years of the Jewish civilization. The difference between the two scenarios, however, was that there was no call for repentance given to the Jews of national Israel. The time for repentance was over. It was now time for judgment. And as evidence for this coming judgment, Jesus said, “And there will be famines and earthquakes in various places” (Mt 24:7). Famines and earthquakes in various places have existed throughout the world since the beginning of time. But there was something unique about these “famines and earthquakes” that would alert the disciples that something was up.

The “various places” were within their ability to know that they were occurring. Therefore, if they connected the dots between the “wars and rumors of wars,” with the “famines and earthquakes,” then they would be reminded of what Jesus said in this specific prophecy concerning the end of national Israel. They would understand that these physical catastrophes of the world of nature were not accidental, but God caused. Therefore, these were certainly regional “famines and earthquakes” that would sensitize the people to the coming fulfillment of what Jesus prophesied in Matthew 24. Their occurrence would indicate that God’s judgment of national Israel was near.

• Painful consummation: Jesus continued, “All these are the beginning of sorrows” (Mt 24:8). There would indeed be sorrow in the final consummation. The end would be painful. There is always social pain in the collapse of a civilization. In this context, those who were citizens of the Jewish state would suffer the sorrow of losing a number of family members who were not Christians. These would be unbelieving Jews who would not heed the warning to stay away from Jerusalem in its final days.

There was great sorrow throughout the Jewish world among family members who believed Jesus, and thus stayed home and did not make the fateful Pentecost journey to Jerusalem, for it was on the Pentecost of A.D. 70 that Rome marched against Jerusalem. Many Jews who believed Jesus and stayed home said good bye to their unbelieving family members whom they would never see again as they journeyed to Jerusalem for Pentecost. During the three-month onslaught of Rome against the city of Jerusalem on the Pentecost of A.D. 70, and according to Josephus, the Roman army slaughtered over one million Jews. Great sorrow spread throughout the Roman Empire as the news of the death of so many loved ones began to trickle back home to friends and loved ones.

• Politicalization of society: During the times before the fall of Jerusalem, there was great pressure imposed on the Jewish society by loyalist Jews who urged all Jews to join the ranks of the resistance. If one did not join in opposition against the unbelievers (Rome), then he or she was as a “traitor.” Every aspect of society was politicized in order to recruit individuals to be patriotic to the cause.

Patriotism to Judaism became radical. Therefore, “they [the radical Jews] will deliver you [Christian Jews] up to be afflicted and will kill you. And you will be hated by [the Jews of] all nations for My name’s sake” (Mt 24:9). Those Christians who would not join in the rebellion were despised by their fellow Jews throughout the Roman Empire. Because faithful Jewish Christians would remain loyal only to the name of Jesus, they would be hated by those Jews throughout the Roman Empire who took up arms against Rome.

When a civilization is in collapse, it is divided politically from within. Those of the citizenship are forced into taking sides. If a particular side is not taken, then the accusation of being a “traitor” is thrown around by one side against another in order to intimidate individuals to take sides on the “patriotic” movement of the status quo. When a society becomes so polarized, it is then that it is on the verge of social suicide from within. Divided civilizations self-inflict themselves unto their own consummation. When no peaceful political discussions around the kitchen table can be conducted by family members, then a society is beginning its revolution through division.

• Social pressure invokes disloyalty: “And then many will be offended and will betray one another and will hate one another” (Mt 24:10). When the great persecutions came, the disciples should not be surprised that some Jewish Christians would think more of themselves and their safety, than standing for the name of Jesus. In view of this one prophecy of Jesus, we can better understand why Paul wrote the following words to Christians who lived in the seat of command of the Roman government that would commission the destruction of Jerusalem: “For I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is the power of God unto salvation ...” (Rm 1:16).

Even while Paul was in prison in Rome less than ten years before A.D. 70, some brethren disassociated themselves from him. They spoke out to bring opposition against him (Ph 1:15-18). Their lack of love for him was revealed in their unwillingness to stand by him in his darkest hour. This was the very thing about which Jesus prophesied in Matthew 24. Some Christians in Palestine also forgot this when the Roman army marched toward Jerusalem. The social turmoil of the time revealed that they had little loyalty to the name of the King of kings when they gave in to the social intimidation of the times.

Those who denied Christ went even further. When an oppressing army is trying to flush out all rebels, they will through torture demand the names of other rebels. And because some succumbed to torture, they betrayed others. In a collapsing civilization, one’s own self-preservation becomes more important than one’s loyalty to his neighbor. At least this is what happened while Paul was in prison in Rome in A.D. 61/62.

• Desperation of the elite: “And many false prophets will arise and will deceive many” (Mt 24:11). In the case of the fall of national Israel, there were those Jewish religious leaders in the society as there were in the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah. They cried out “Peace! Peace!” However, there was no peace. In other words, deceived religious leaders who are participating in the social and financial benefits of the collapsing society have no desire that their influence over the people should come to an end. This was the social and economic situation among the Jews at the time of the end of Israel.

James wrote about three years before the fall of Jerusalem. He wrote to a Jewish audience in which he included a special reference to the rich Sadducean Jews by whom many Jewish disciples were exploited. As he wrote concerning the rich Sadducean elite of national Israel throughout the Jewish diaspora (Js 1:2), he reminded them that they were about to lose all they had.

Come now you rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you. Your riches are corrupted and your garments are moth-eaten. Your gold and silver are corroded. And their corrosion will be a witness against you and will eat your flesh like fire. You have heaped treasure together for the last days (Js 5:1-3).

The rich Sadducean Jews had “despised the poor” (Js 2:6). They had exploited the poor farmers for their own benefit (Js 5:4). Therefore, the judgment of God was coming upon them in the consummation of the economy in which they had reaped their wealth.

The judgment about which both Jesus spoke and James wrote was not something that was going to transpire over two thousand years after both prophets spoke their words of judgment. James comforted the poor of his Jewish readers in A.D. 67 with the words: “You [faithful disciples] also be patient. Establish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord is near” (Js 5:8). This was the coming of the Lord in time in judgment on unbelieving Israel. The judgment was near. James’ Jewish readers in A.D. 67 could be comforted by these words because relief from their exploitation by the rich Sadducean elite was near. It was the same coming in judgment that brought relief to the poor among the northern kingdom of Israel during the days of Amos.

- Willful violation of covenant laws: “Lawlessness will abound” (Mt 24:12). In a society that forsakes social norms by which relationships are controlled, “law abiding citizens” become oppressed. In a liberal society that seeks to be free from the restrictions of law, the people become a law unto themselves (See Jr 10:23). When Divine law is rejected, society seeks to establish its own moral standards of conduct, and thus, in relation to the law of God, they become lawless.

The audience of Jesus in reference to the prophecy of Matthew 24 was specifically to the Jews. There was certainly lawlessness in the society of the Jewish insurrectionists as they rose up against the Roman Empire. It was this lawlessness that eventually led to the destruction of national Israel.

But in view of what James prophesied, there was great lawlessness among the Jews themselves concerning the Sinai law. For example, James mentioned lawlessness in reference to the exploitation of the poor farmers by the rich Sadducean elite: “Behold, the wages of the laborers who have mowed your fields, which you kept back by fraud, cry out against you” (Js 5:4). This lawlessness among the Jews themselves led to the rise of the rich Sadducean elite who exploited the poor farmers. The times for the consummation of national Israel in the last half of the first century were the same as the final years of both the northern kingdom of Israel in 722/21 B.C. and the southern kingdom in 586 B.C.

We must not forget that the Jews had lived in Palestine since 536 B.C. under an occupying foreign nation. They lived first under the occupation of the Babylonians, then the Medo-Persians, the Greeks, and finally the Romans. All went well until a lawless spirit of insurrection arose among the Jews in the first century. This spirit of lawlessness became so great that the occupying foreign power (Rome) determined to terminate the seat of Jewish rebellion.

- Frigid society: “The love of many will grow cold” (Mt 24:12). Imploding civilizations that are based on economic inequity, seek to exploit the labor force of society, just as James explained was the case in Israel at the time he wrote. Such societies become as the society of the northern kingdom of Israel when that civilization of Israel at that time came to an end. God said that “they [the rich elite] sold the righteous [poor] for silver and the poor for a pair of shoes. They pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor and pervert the way of the meek” (Am 2:6,7).

God was preparing the northern kingdom of Israel for its demise. He wanted the people to know exactly why He was bringing judgment upon them. As with the elite Sadducean Jews of the prophecy of Jesus, God brought judgment upon northern Israel because of those who exploited the poor:

Therefore, because you [rich elite] trample on the poor [farmer] and you take from him tribute of grain, and have built mansions of hewn stone, you will not dwell in them. You have planted pleasant vineyards, but you will not drink wine from them (Am 5:11).

The judgment that God unleashed on the elite of the last generation of the northern kingdom of Israel, was the same judgment He was going to unleash on the last generation of Israel about which Jesus prophesied. Amos recorded, “I will smite the winter house [of the rich elite] with the summer house. And the houses of ivory will perish, and the great houses will have an end” (Am 3:15).

In the last section of Jesus’ prophecy concerning the consummation of national Israel, Jesus made the statement of Matthew 24:14, which statement is often misunderstood. In the historical context of Jesus’ statements He had the consummation of national Israel in mind in reference to the fulfillment of the prophecies of both Daniel and Ezekiel.

The prophecy of Matthew 24 would be fulfilled within forty years from the time when Jesus made the prophecy. In order to spare Jewish Christians as much suffering as possible during the conflicts that led up to the final destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, Jesus wanted to sift out of national Israel all those who were children of God by faith. These were those who would believe in Jesus as the Messiah. In order to call out of Israel all those who would obey the gospel, the gospel had to be preached from synagogue to synagogue throughout the Roman Empire. All Jews had to be given an opportunity to obey the gospel in order to escape the coming consummation of Israel. In order to do this, Jesus promised, “And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached in all the world [of the Roman Empire] for a witness to all nations, and then will the end come [to national Israel]” (Mt 24:14). Those who believed and obeyed the gospel would also believe Jesus’ prophecy of Matthew 24.

The phrase “all the world” referred to all the world of the Roman Empire. It was all the world that would suffer from Rome’s wrath that she would pour out on rebellious Jews. The “end” would be the end of Israel, the consummation of all that a Jew was nationally. This end in time would be a tragedy for every Jew.

While in prison in Rome in A.D. 61, Paul wrote to the Colossians concerning “the hope of the gospel that you have heard, which was preached to every creature that is under heaven” (Cl 1:23). The fulfillment of Jesus’ promise in the prophecy of Matthew 24:14 had been fulfilled by the time Paul wrote to the Colossians in A.D. 61. In only a few years after Paul wrote that the gospel had been preached to every creature under heaven throughout the Roman Empire, Rome commenced her campaign to bring national Israel to an end. Paul’s statement in Colossians 1:23 was the Holy Spirit’s affirmation that Jesus’ prophecy of Matthew 24:14 had been fulfilled.

In the first consummation of Israel in the days of Amos, God warned the people through the prophets. Amos wrote, “Surely the Lord God will do nothing without first revealing His plans to His servants the prophets” (Am 3:7). And in reference to the end of national Israel in A.D. 70, this He did through Jesus and James. He warned the Jews to get out of Judaism through obedience to the gospel. And in getting out of Judaism, they would listen to the warning of Matthew 24 to get out of Jerusalem. Therefore, the warning to all those of Israel prior to the termination of national Israel in the first century, the words of Amos still rang loud in the ears of those who know the word of God:

Therefore, thus I will do to you, O [unbelieving] Israel. And because I will do this to you, prepare to meet your God, O Israel (Am 4:12).

Those who recognize the fall of civilizations, prepare for such by the renewal of their commitment to the unchanging Jesus Christ. When Christ becomes unfashionable, then the faithful renew their faith in the incarnational Son of God who gave His life that our existence will permeate any fallen civilization of this world.

The beautiful thing about being a Christian in this life is that Christians need not fear when civilizations either fall through military conflict, or fall within by a change in moral standards and systems of government. Jesus and His moral standards have existed unchanged throughout the fall of numerous civilizations over the past two thousand years. Civilizations come and go, but the Christian can trust in the following words of Jesus regardless of the rise and fall of civilizations.

“I am the Alpha and the Omega,” says the Lord God, “who is and who was and who is to come, the Almighty” (Rv 1:8).

“I am He who lives. And I was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore. And I have the keys of death and of Hades” (Rv 1:18).

The point is that we must be concerned about living the gospel before the world. Civilizations come and go, but the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ will continue on into eternity. In fact, we are anxiously awaiting the final act of the gospel, the final coming of Jesus.

SOCIAL SIGNALS

A young teenager is bullied in school. It is persistent, ruthless, and never seems to go away. It is nothing new. Bullying has been going on ever since there were young people on the face of the earth. Ishmael bullied Isaac (Gn 16), and bullying is wrong. The problem with bullying today is that its effects are far greater. The social cancer of bullying has gone into hyper-drive through social media. In a social environment where 50% of marriages end in divorce, the bullied have a weak support system at home with a single parent in which to receive reassurance.

Back when the vast majority of families were strong and bonded in America, young men could go home after a day of bullying in school and find security and solace in the comfort of their home. They could be reassured in the presence of a father who was their hero. They had an emotional sense that their father was better than any other father in the whole world. He could hunt a bear with a switch, and guard the home against any evil that might invade his castle. If the bullying at school became too intense, the bullied always knew that retreat could be found at home in the presence of a father who brought reassurance in what often became a cruel world.

Through a weekend of participation in their sons’ lives, fathers can help get the minds of their sons off the bullies long enough to regenerate them emotionally to face another five days of bullying in school. Such a home scenario is reassuring for teens who are trying to be accepted in a world that seems to feast on rejection. With all the stresses that face a young person in a modern world, a strong family has always been enough to offset even the most strenuous challenges that young people face in growing up.

But to a great extent, retreat to a home of emotional solitude is gone in many homes of the West. In the Western civilization of America, there was an average of one “school shooting” a week throughout 2017. It is an American anomaly. Nowhere in the rest of the world is such a tragic phenomenon occurring. Something, therefore, is uniquely wrong about the civilization of America that sets it apart as “different” from the rest of the world.

As we look to America, we stand aghast at such a phenomenon. Since such a social tragedy is not common around the world, and was not common in America a half century ago, then we must conclude that something in the America civilization has gone tragically wrong. Our overall conclusion is that such a social anomaly is a signal that the society has a sickness from within. This social sickness is being reflected in the deadly behavior of school shootings.

When a society is suffering from social evil, we have observed that the society is focusing on the effect more than the cause. In cases as school shootings, the obsession is over the effect to the point that the cause is simply ignored. TV ratings go up when the corporate news media obsesses on reporting such effects in order to keep our minds focused on the tragedy. As a result of our misdirected focus for the profits of the corporate news media, the general public bewitches whatever instrument was used to cause the evil. We assume that the user was psychotic. We have observed that a liberal society will almost always ignore the cause by obsessing over the effect.

When considering decades, if not a century of social degeneration, and from a biblical perspective, we must focus on the cause that would generate the effect of social evils. It is worthy to note, therefore, that former Senator Rick Santorum stated on an international news broadcast that about 80% of those young men who commit “school shootings” have grown up in families where there was no father figure. And there is the root cause for this evil effect of society.

Religious leaders have been alerting society for years across America that 50% of all marriages in America end in divorce. This 50% must be understood in view of the marriages that are officially registered with the county clerk. Some people have gone through serial marriages. The 50%, therefore, are marriages registered at the county court house that have ended in divorce. Half of the registered marriages end in divorce. The statistics reveal that the American society has a social problem in being unable to connect two people in marriage for life.

Consequently, “single parenthood” has become a normal social order of the American society. Young boys grow up being cheated of a father figure in the home because two parents have lost their love for one another (Remember Mt 24:12). What is deceptive is that the general society believes that it can get away with such a social dysfunction in marriage without reaping the evil effects.

In an agnostic/atheistic society where moral standards are constantly changing, society determines for itself what is to be considered “family.” So in contrast to God’s moral standards in reference to the family, single parenthood is considered a normal family. Add to this social dysfunction, the “marriage” between a man and a man, or a woman with a woman. Consider the adopted children that will come forth from these biblically defined dysfunctional unions in society. Western civilization is not finished in playing out the consequences of dysfunctional marital relationships. All of us today will be long gone before the last chapter of this sociological book is written.

When God’s parenthood plan is ignored, society will eventually pay the consequences. Unfortunately, if a society bases its moral norms on an agnostic/atheistic world view of evolutionary change, then “moralizing” by the religious community is considered to be the antiquated postulations of “another age.” We would say to those who promote dysfunctional unions that replace God’s plan for marriage and family, that their sins will eventually catch up with their descendants. And in reference to school shootings, the sins of single parent “families” have arisen to remind us that when the parents sin, the children pay the price.

Yes, bullying has always been around, and will be around for as long as there are young teenagers in society. But what has exacerbated the bullying that has led to an average of one school shooting a week in America is the obsessive use of social media among young people. Young people in America spend an average of at least four hours a day on a social media device. In the past when the last bell at school rang to conclude another day at school, the bullied young person could run home to the security of a strong father. But in many homes that opportunity no longer exists. The bullied run home, but he runs home with his smartphone, carrying with him after school hours all those Facebook posts and tweets of evil that state he is abnormal, bad, stupid, socially dysfunctional, and rejected by everybody. And because he often lives in a “single parent” home, such social tormenting may have existed before he even showed up at school in the first place. But now his social tormenting is compounded. He is reminded by his tormentors on social media 24-7 that he is an outcast. The social worker Justin Nutt wrote in a posted article, School Shootings and Possible Causes, the following:

In the digital age, a bully has the ability to torture and humiliate someone while in their presence as they always have, but in the modern era a bully can also do so on Facebook and Twitter for the world to see.

Eventually, the bullied becomes so frustrated that he acquires a weapon in order to release his pain on those who continually tweet him in the middle of the night that he is not accepted by anyone. The next thing the public hears are shots ringing out in some school hall. Nutt explained:

If a person feels the whole world knows what has been said about them, there could be a feeling that it will take just as large a show to solve the issues that were created.

Thoughts of a life being ruined forever, as teens often view things, can mean the only option is to lash out by attacking the bullies and those who laughed along, or in other cases, to commit suicide to end the pain.

We thus remind ourselves that civilizations fall from within. There are social diseases that society cannot overcome simply because the diseases have become the identity of the society. Bullying is not a social anomaly in the modern world. It has always existed. However, when a society takes away the father figure from the home, then the bullied have been deprived of one of the strongest reassurances to be emotionally reenergized in order to tackle another day of life at school. The absence of a father in the life of a bullied teenager is a recipe for social disaster.

When one grows up undisciplined, he will not discipline himself. In a single parent family, discipline has its limits. There is only so far a single mother can go before her teenage son claims his own self and goes into the world. Finding consolation in a mother by a bullied teenager has its limits. Once the home fails to bring solace, gangs are the other social structure that develops in societies where young teens can find protection from the pain of social rejection. The gang becomes the surrogate family for those who have grown up in homes without a father figure. And no one will bully a gang member. As the West deals with the MS-13 gangs, they need to remember that such gangs are the result of dysfunctional families.

In a socially democratic society that votes lawmakers into office who must make laws according to their voting constituency, the legislators can only make social “bandage laws” to correct social dysfunctions. By voting legislators into office, society deceives itself into thinking that their congressmen can make laws that would limit the instruments that are used in school shootings. It is assumed that laws against the instruments that were used to cause the effect will solve the real social cause of the problem. They do this because a liberal society cannot deal with the sin beneath the sin. It is the society itself that is harboring the sin. “Every imagination of the hearts of men are evil” when a society reflects evil within itself. The society is in a mode of self-destruction because its identity is now characterized by that which destroys civilizations from within.

When enough self-destructive moral norms are accepted by a society, and thus become the identity of the new society, then the old civilization has terminated because it is identified by the new social order. It is terminated because the remnant of the old social order could no longer preserve the continued existence of the old civilization.

“FALLEN! FALLEN IS BABYLON THE GREAT!”

In Revelation, John heralded throughout the corridors of time, “Fallen is Babylon the great, which made all the nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication” (Rv 14:8; see 17:5). And fallen she is.

Many have read through the speculations of our postulations with a thought of doubt concerning the state of “Western Babylon.” If the doubtful reader resides in the rural area of the West, then we can understand the apprehension by which he or she would be discouraged with the moral state of affairs of the West. The reason for this discouragement is that the rural West retains a great deal of the moral fiber upon which civilizations continue to exist. Nevertheless, the moral degradation of the cities of the West will eventually filter to the rural areas, and in particular during these days, throughout the world through social media. “Babylon” is bringing the world down through her worldwide influence.

In order to discover where the West is in reference to the inward moral decline, we would look to the entertainment industry. We would judge that Babylon has already morally fallen by what is now considered popular television and movie entertainment. In order to make our judgment, we would compare some award-winning TV series that captivated the audience of the West over a half century ago to what is popular today. In the generation of today, most will not be aware of these programs that we use to compare the past with the present. But in comparison to the past, what was popular in entertainment over a half century ago, and what is popular today on movie and TV screens is strikingly different.

For an initial example, in 1957 CBS ran the first episode of the series, Leave It To Beaver. The series ran until 1963. It was a series of TV shows that was based on the family wholesomeness of the 1950s and early 1960s. The characters were innocent of all the immorality that is so accepted and publicized today in the entertainment world. The biblical structure of the family was intact. Unfortunately, what happens with such a wholesome series is that when the viewing audience begins its moral decline, such series become unpopular, and subsequently, are discontinued. We would judge that the audience today would find this particular TV series quite boring.

But we need to move further back. There was also the I Love Lucy TV series that was broadcast by CBS from 1951 to 1957. In preparation to air the series, the producers debated as to whether they should cast the married couple (Lucy and Ricky) in bedroom scenes where the married couple would be lying in the same bed. The producers finally decided that in order to preserve the moral standards of the day, they would cast the bedroom scenes of the series with two beds instead of one. They wanted to shun any appearance of a male and female in the same bed, regardless of whether they were married.

And then our older generation remembers the Andy Griffith Show that was aired between 1960 and 1968. It too was a TV series that portrayed the innocence of a generation that is now lost. Interestingly, on cable TV today repeats of this series can still be seen. However, it is watched only by the aged generation that existed when the series was first aired.

The West is now into a new generation that is certainly based on a different moral standard than a half century ago. That which motivates the attention of the fallen generation of today are TV series as Two and A Half Men, that aired from 2003 to 2015. Then there is the Big Bang Theory that was first broadcast in 2007 and continues today, but with Penny and Leonard finally married after living in fornication together for over two years.

These series, and almost all like them that are aired today, portray the moral decline of Western civilization. With the production of each new TV series or movies, and unlike the producers of the lost generations of the past, the neo-liberal producers see how far they can go in portraying the dysfunctions of a morally fallen society. They have gone about as far as they can possibly go into immoral degradation.

Neither modern-day movie nor television entertainment is without what the post WW II generation considered moral degradation. The moral standards of Hollywood have been propagated throughout the world with the rebroadcasting of Western entertainment through satellite media. The entertainment industry of the West reveals that the morality of the West has fallen! In its fall, it has dragged the rest of the world into its immoral pit.

In those innocent days prior to WW II, the West sent their young men into war against a megalomaniac who was murdering a civilization of people in Western Europe. Through the death of hundreds of thousands of Western soldiers, who were guided by the moral standards of the Western civilization of years gone by, Nazi Germany was defeated and the attempted extermination of the Jews by that wicked regime was brought to an end. Throughout the entire WW II ordeal, the moral West finally put a stop to the genocide of the Jews, which by the time of the end of WW II had reached at least six million.

But six million is the number of unborn babies that are now murdered every six years through abortion in the West. There are about one million babies aborted every year. What has gone wrong with a moral generation that stopped the murder of millions in the early 1940s, but now carries on with a legalized murder of unborn babies of its own population today?

Adolf Eichmann was a German Lieutenant Colonel during WW II. He was one of the masterminds of the Holocaust that led to the murder of over six million people in death camps across Eastern Europe. After the war, Eichmann fled to South America. He eventually ended up hiding in Argentina. In 1960 he was captured by the Israeli Mossad, and secretly spirited away out of Argentina and to trial for his war crimes. He was found guilty and hanged in 1962 for his crimes against humanity.

When Eichmann was asked during his trial why he and others did what they did to over six million Jews, he stoically and unrepentantly responded, “It was the right thing to do at the time.”

There are people now marching in the streets of the West who are saying the same thing in reference to the murder of unborn babies. “It is the right thing to do.” They are protesting their right to have one million unborn babies murdered every year. We find it difficult to see a difference between the genocide of Nazi Germany and the genocide of innocent unborn babies today. The morality of the West has indeed fallen. Murder of unborn babies in the West is now the “right thing to do.”

We must never forget that within a fallen society those who are a part of the society rarely realize that they have morally fallen. When God is terminated in the minds of the fallen, then there is no limit to which the moral standards of the civilization will digress. Women can march with smiles on their faces in the streets while they hold up signs that read, “It’s my body I will do what I like.” These marchers will have long forgotten the moral standards of their ancestors of “another age.”

When God told Lot to get out of Sodom and Gomorrah, Lot left town for the mountains (Gn 14). However, on his way out of town, “his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt” (Gn 19:26). It was not that she simply looked over her shoulder to see what was happening to their home town. She was on her way back to “Walmart.” Though righteous Lot realized the wickedness of the society of Sodom and Gomorrah, Lot’s wife was comfortable living in the city of sin. Lot was headed for the mountains, but his wife was returning to the comforts of the city, regardless of the degradation of sin city.

When the population of a civilization becomes morally desensitized, the people express no consternation about the moral degradation of the society in which they live. Watching a continuous diet of immorality on movie and TV screens no longer causes any anguish in the spirit of a society of people who have been desensitized by the commonality of sin. Sodom and Gomorrah had truly fallen, and were at the time of Lot’s residence there to the point of no moral return. But what was in store for the residents of the cities was that they were unknowingly awaiting for fire and brimstone from heaven. The destruction of the cities of the plain was so complete that archaeologists today can only guess where the cities were originally located.

Western civilization is truly in a state of committing social suicide. Nevertheless, there is always a remnant of “righteous Noahs and Lots” who maintain the way of the Lord. There will always be a righteous Noah and his family who will board a boat and say good-bye to a civilization that has given itself over to agnostic/atheistic wickedness. As the moral decline of a civilization reaches epic proportions, the “faithful remnant” is voted out of office in a democratic society that is bent on moral suicide. Many decades ago prayer was voted out of schools in the West. And now, shots ring out in school hallways across the land. When a civilization loses its godly moral majority, it votes into power a new moral base whereon the imagination of men is only evil continually.

Epilogue

When Vice President Mike Pence was berated for his religious faith on the nationwide and highly viewed ABC television series, The View, we were again reminded that a neo-liberal social order has set into the society of the West. On the bright side, however, a minority faith-driven audience of over 40,000 people called in and complained to the producers. Joy Behar of The View, the host who made the derogatory remarks, had to personally call and apologized for her ridicule of the faith of a Western dignitary.

But it was too late. Behar’s words had already reverberated across the world, reminding us all that a large segment of Western society has lost its faith. Behar’s derogatory statements against a Vice President, who seeks to maintain a remnant faith in a civilization in spiritual collapse, only revealed that Western civilization as we formerly knew to be “Christian,” is in its final century.

This brings us to our knees in reference to the future of faith in a civilization that is nearing its end. To this present generation of faithful grandparents, we can only say what God said to Abraham in his final years when he was dwelling in the land of Palestine.

And you will go to your fathers in peace. You will be buried in a good old age. But in the fourth generation they [your descendants] will come here again, for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete (Gn 15:15,16).

The Amorites—could we now say, the Americanites—were morally progressing toward consummation as a civilization at the time Abraham was among them. The Amorites were on the road to a certain destiny of finality. However, they were not on this road because they were predestined by God to be there. On the contrary, it is always the responsibility of a morally suicidal civilization to realize that they are the cause of their own demise. God does not predestine civilizations to fall. He only knows and reveals the embedded sociological and moral reasons that bring about such falls.

God knows when a civilization is in demise, which demise will lead to the termination of the civilization. At the time Abraham was in Palestine during the days of the Amorites, the fall of the civilization of the Amorites was “not yet complete.” At the time, it was in the process of completing its demise. God wanted Abraham to recognize that the Amorite civilization was in the process of bringing itself to its own suicidal consummation. That time would not come for over four hundred years later when the children of Israel would come forth from Egyptian captivity in order to eradicate the Canaanites from the promised land.

God is patient with civilizations that are in decline. We must not misunderstand His patience. His patience does not mean He has forgotten wickedness and the destiny of a civilization that gives itself over to wickedness. God is patient with the wickedness of the world today, but the end is coming. Therefore, each one of us must remember that God ...

... is longsuffering toward you, not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night in which the heavens will pass away with a great noise and the elements will melt with fervent heat. The earth also and the works that are therein will be burned up (2 Pt 3:9,10).

When the “fourth generation” of Abraham’s seed returned to Palestine after the Egyptian captivity, they (the Israelites) would be God’s instrument by proxy to take out the wicked Amorite civilization, which at the time of the descendants’ return would have spread to all the Canaanite societies of Palestine. In the forewarning of the eventual consummation of the Canaanite civilization, God sought to warn the descendants of Abraham that they must eradicate the Canaanites from the land lest they themselves be infested with the social concepts of wickedness that bring civilizations down.

Of course we know the rest of this story. The descendants of Abraham, the Israelites, did not drive out all the Canaanites. Eventually, the wickedness of the Canaanites led Israel to her own demise as a civilization in the land of Palestine.

When the time in history came for the Canaanites to be taken out of the land of Palestine, we must keep in mind that there were some among the Canaanites who maintained faith in the God of Abraham. God even used a “faithful fornicator” to accomplish His mission to eradicate the wicked Canaanites from the land. Rahab the harlot lied to save the spies of Israel, but she lied in faith to send them safely back to the Israelite army (Js 2:25). She eventually became part of the Davidic lineage through which the Messiah and Savior came into the world.

One may be a resident of a civilization that is destined for doom, but this does not mean that he or she will go out with the demise of the civilization. The faithful must simply remain faithful, regardless of being surrounded by wickedness. We must not forget that righteous Noah was surrounded by a wicked world civilization during the one hundred years he prepared the ark. He and his family eventually floated to safety, but his contemporaries were taken away (See Mt 24:37-39).

The people of God today are not a military force to eradicate evil forcibly from the world. That is not the business of King Jesus and His church in this present world (Jn 18:36). However, with His mighty hosts, He will eventually be revealed from heaven in flaming fire in order to finalize all civilizations on earth (2 Th 1:6-9; see Jd 5-7,14,15). But until that last day, the people of God are destined to live in the world, but not be a part of the immorality of the world (1 Co 5:10). Until the day of final global consummation comes, God’s admonition to the faithful would be to buckle up and ride out a falling world until they hear a final trumpet call. Until that final call, the following are some thoughts to consider:

- We have been harsh on the corporate news media. In many cases our harshness was justified because much of the corporate news media has in these last times morphed into a liberal corporate news commentary on news events, rather than simply airing the news. Every news media today seems to have its own panel of commentators who explain this or that about the news. The problem with this system of media is that the particular bias of the corporation that controls the particular media outlet often voices its own biased opinions about the news events. When a society becomes divided, the news media often becomes partisan in the interpretation of the news. The era of David Brinkley and Chet Huntley are long gone (NBC Huntley-Brinkley Report, 1965–1970). We are in the era of a leading news anchor concluding with his or her stacked panel of either liberal or conservatives, who with a partisan bias laboriously, expound on the news of the day.

We say all this with some complaint, realizing at the same time that a free democratic society cannot exist without a free press. Unless there are zealous investigative reporters among us, and especially among the rulers who govern us, we cannot vote wisely in the elections. If we had a choice whether to live in a society that had no free press, and a society that has a biased press that in many ways has gone astray in just giving us the news, we would choose the latter. We will suffer through the panel of commentators simply because we seek to have among us honest investigative reporters who can sort through the fake news and give us the true story.

However, when a civilization with a corporate news media is in decline, viewers must with caution question what they read, see and hear. Civilizations in decline inherently become divided. In this modern world of corporate news organizations, the organizations report the news that caters to the majority of the society to which they broadcast. They thus enable the divided society for the sake of profit. Their total emphasis is to maintain high ratings in order to reap high profits for the majority viewers. In a truly divided society, therefore, the corporate news media generally takes the side of the majority, for it is with the majority that there are more viewers, and subsequently, more profits. When we grew up more than a half century ago our father always told us, “Boys, don’t believe half of what the newspapers report, and always question the other half.” Not bad advice, even to this day.

- We must understand that judgment eventually comes in time upon those civilizations that forsake the moral norms that preserve civilizations. Hiding one’s head in the sand is the last thing the faithful should do. In fact, those who hide their “spiritual” heads in the sand are part of the problem. There is no consternation within their soul to speak out against the moral condition of the society in which they live. However, if one recognizes that society is on the backside of existence, but “not yet complete” in its final demise, then there are things to do. It is a time to speak out about sin that is taking society into the pit of wickedness. It is a time to make that call to complain about arrogant TV hosts who rail at dignitaries on the communication media.

- The righteous must plead for a remnant. Sodom and Gomorrah, the cities of the plain during Abraham’s stay in Palestine, had socially reached their time of consummation (See Gn 10:19; 14:8). Their wickedness was complete. When Lot pitched his tent among these cities, they were at that time in their years of finality. “The men of Sodom were exceedingly wicked and sinners before the Lord” (Gn 13:13).

The outcry of wickedness of the cities of the plain was great before the Lord (Gn 18:2). When it was time to close the chapter on this civilization of sin, Abraham pled for the cities in asking those who were going to carry out the deed of destruction, “Will you also destroy the righteous with the wicked?” (Gn 18:23).

Abraham pled for the cities on behalf of the righteous remnant whom he supposed was still dwelling in the cities. But after all his pleading, only Lot and his family were salvaged from the total destruction of a civilization that was characterized by complete wickedness. We would be as Abraham, and so we would also plead for the civilization in which we dwell, believing that our present civilization “is not yet complete” in its demise, but is headed in that direction.

- During His ministry, Jesus knew the certainty of the termination of national Israel in the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. His following pronouncement over Jerusalem would certainly be the words of the righteous over a civilization in which they now live, but feel totally helpless to preserve:

O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, who kills the prophets and stones those who are sent to her. How often I wanted to gather your children together, even as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings, and you would not (Mt 23:37).

A falling civilization will always “kill the prophets” who cry out to turn society from certain consummation. Prayers will be offered. Proclamations will come forth from the hearts of the faithful. But no one will listen. The falling society will mock the faith of the faithful (See Mt 5:10,11). They will persecute with words those who would stand up and speak out for faith. The faithful, however, must be more persistent than Satan. Since Satan continually goes about seeking whom he may devour, then the faithful must also be going about seeking those whom they may detour from destruction through the preaching of the gospel.

The faithful of falling civilizations seek to gather society under their wings in order to preserve them. But the moral and social norms that cause the demise of civilizations are so embedded within society that the rebellious will despise their leaders (Jd 8) and rail at the faith of those who would lead them out of the certain termination to which they are moving.

Only the faithful understand that a society is morally fallen. Those who are content within the society to live contrary to spiritual matters, only show contempt for those who cry out against what will inevitably lead to the fall of a civilization.

Nevertheless, even to forty years before national Israel was consummated in A.D. 70, Jesus mourned over its demise to come. He did not pray that the end not come. He only prepared His Jewish disciples in Matthew 24 to prepare for the end. And such would be our ministry to every believer in every civilization that is nearing its “completion.” It is a time to prepare for the end, not a time to hide one’s head in the sand and say that there will be no end. Such head burying some did in deceiving themselves in the middle 60s in reference to the coming of Jesus in judgment on national Israel. Peter wrote to these self-deceived Jews:

Scoffers will come ... saying, “Where is the promise of His coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation” (2 Pt 3:3,4).

- In the final years of national Israel in A.D. 70, Jesus made a very sad statement in reference to the family relationships that would occur during the final years of that civilization: “And children will rise up against their parents and will cause them to be put to death” (Mt 10:21).

Though this statement was made by Jesus at the time He sent out the twelve apostles on a limited commission during His ministry, in the context of the statement, He moved far beyond the events they would experience in the few weeks of their preaching on this tour (See Mt 10:16-23). When Jesus spoke of the “end” in the context of the statement, He was speaking of the end of national Israel (See Mt 10:22). The historical context is the end of national Israel that would occur about forty years after Jesus made this statement.

What is significant is the family tension that would arise between those who would be parents and children at the time prior to the A.D. 70 consummation. At the time of the end of national Israel, the parents and grandparents, who originally lived and personally heard of these things directly from Jesus about forty years before, realized that the consummation was near. They had read the Old Testament prophets of Daniel and Ezekiel. Specifically, the Christian Jewish parents and grandparents believed the prophecy of Jesus that was recorded in Matthew 24.

The immediate parents believed in the faith of their fathers that led them to accept Jesus as the only Messiah. However, many of the children of these faithful parents forsook the faith of their parents and adopted the populace politics of the day. They believed in the self-proclaimed messiahs who were leading a rebellion against Rome. Family discussions around the dinner table, therefore, became tense, if not hostile. Children forsook the faith of their parents. The children no longer listened to the cries of their parents who realized that the end of Israel was near. The children ran after other self-proclaimed prophets who proclaimed that national Israel would survive the end about which they believed their parents foolishly proclaimed. As a result, many parents said good-bye forever to zealous children who picked up a sword in A.D. 70 and packed off to Jerusalem to fight in the resistance against Rome.

In the consummation of the civilization of Noah’s era, the consummation of the cities of the plain, and the final years of Israel in Palestine, we learn a very clear message: Civilizations that have embedded social norms that encourage social suicide and false religions always bring a civilization to its knees regardless of the faith of the parents. The false religiosity that prevailed before the end of all those civilizations was defined as wickedness, for in the behavior of the religious people, iniquity was played out in the consumerism of the day.

Since the love of money is always the foundation upon which wickedness is built (1 Tm 6:10), the behavior of those in a falling society is to gain a financial advantage over one’s fellow man. The parents handed their children a college education in order to be successful, but that success drove the children to sacrifice the faith of their parents on their way to financial success. The parents desire that their children have a better life turned around to devour the inheritance of faith that the parents wanted to pass on to their children.

In the “wicked materialism” of the West, and those societies throughout the world who would clone their behavior after such worldly desires, all behavior is centered around getting gain. The religion of consumerism has spread across the face of the earth in the name of “development.” Societies no longer want to be called “Third World,” or “developing countries.” They want a piece of the materialistic god of the West. In such a world economic environment, consumerism becomes the new religion. And for this reason, the children leave the faith of their parents in order to build themselves on the foundation of money.

There is a new god in town. As children are caught up in the materialism of the day, they forsake any faith that depends on God. Fasting, which is the outpouring of a people who seek to depend on God, is forgotten among most religions of the day. It is forgotten because the new god of consumerism replaces one’s need for a God who can help the believer prevail in times of need. If there are no times of need, then there is no need for a God who can help one through needful times.

In the final years of a civilization, those parents and grandparents who lived by faith will lose many of their own children to the new idol god of financial secu-city. When security in life moves from the God of heaven to the god of money, then there is no need for a God who would take us through hard times. The faith of the children, therefore, will vanish amidst the flow of capital throughout the civilization. Children will have more faith in their 401K and the stock market than in God who can take us through the collapse of civilizations. Parents simply need to understand and be prepared for this god of the West. They need to remember that the rich elite of Israel were taken into captivity—the stock market of the rich collapsed. The rich Sadducean elite of national Israel had zero bank accounts after A.D. 70.

Many of our children will be lost to the god of material prosperity in a society that exalts consumerism. They will fall aside to their material investments on their way to the top. In their society, the Bible will no longer be studied. There will be more Bible studies in homes. Bibles will gather dust. And then, Bibles will no longer be found in the homes of grand children who have long forgotten the God of their grandparents.

- The faithful must huddle close to the God of heaven. God has told us these things beforehand. He prepared the faithful of Israel for her consummation by telling the faithful through the prophets that the end would come. He told the people that their civilization was going to come to an end because the majority of the people had forsaken His moral and civil standards (Hs 4:6). Jesus also prepared His people for the end of national Israel in A.D. 70. “Behold, I have told you all things in advance” (Mt 24:25). These warnings were written for our learning. The Holy Spirit’s words in Romans 15:4 are as relevant today as they were when they were first inscribed:

For whatever things were written before [in the Old and New Testaments] were written for our learning, so that we through patience and encouragement of the Scriptures might have hope.

Book 78

In Search Of The Lost Love

Since we live in a very confusing world of religion, I thought it would be good to research again our motives as Christians, both in reference to our life-style, as well as our motivation to preach the gospel. This book will sometimes be uncomfortable when reading, for it will challenge our hearts in reference to our gospel life-style. Throughout our lives we must continually re-examine ourselves on this subject lest we end up with a lost love that plagued the Christians in Ephesus.

Since our faith is in our Lord Jesus Christ, the only source for challenging our motives in reference to our faith is the recorded life and message of Jesus in the Bible. We must never find ourselves being complacent in reference to our faith, or embarrassed by others whose motives for preaching the gospel are contrary to that which we read in the Bible.

It is not wrong to consider the zeal of others as a witness to the conviction that is produced by the gospel. However, we must be cautious concerning the motives that drive others. The motivation of people can vary drastically from one individual to another. We admire conviction, but our only source to determine true conviction is the word of God. We would caution ourselves about measuring our motivation by what others do. Some Corinthian disciples seemed to have involved themselves in such competition when they compared themselves with themselves (2 Co 10:11).

However, we find it difficult to question conviction when the end result is the proclamation of the gospel. Paul said the same in reference to some in Rome who preached the gospel, though their motives were wrong:

Some indeed preach Christ even from envy and strife, and some also from good will. The latter do so out of love, knowing that I am appointed for the defense of the gospel. The former preach Christ out of selfish ambition, not with pure motives ... (Ph 1:15-18).

Our desire is to preach Christ out of love with pure motives, not with selfish ambition. In this book I have sought to explain the driving force of the gospel of love that motivates one to do exceedingly above in our lives what he or she could ever imagine. When the power of the gospel works freely in our lives, we are always surprised by what we can do in the name of Jesus (Ep 3:20).

All of us seek to discover the gospel power that moved the early believers to be so zealous in a world of misguided religiosity. I firmly believe that the Holy Spirit had a specific purpose for recording the impact the gospel had on the lives of the early disciples. He wanted us to have a record of gospel-obedient examples in order that we can look into the lives of the first disciples for victories in reference to living the gospel. Those early gospel-driven disciples turned the world upside down with the power of the gospel. I believe we can do the same today (At 17:6).

When Paul wrote, “Be imitators of me even as I also am of Christ,” he put a condition on his example (1 Co 11:1). That condition was “even as” he followed Christ. For us today, this means that we must always look past the examples of misguided religionists who surround us in order to discover the gospel power that moved Paul and others in the first century into all their known world. The Lord Jesus Christ was revealed in the flesh in order to leave us a gospel example of love by which we could judge the behavior of every man, as well as examine our own motives (See 2 Co 13:5). And so, we judge the behavior of gospel-driven people by what we see in Christ.

This may sound simple. But because we live in a world of such diverse beliefs in reference to what is generally classified—but erroneously—under the label of “Christianity,” we must be careful. People have been captivated by a host of diversions away from being motivated by the gospel. Many have simply substituted “another gospel” as the motivation for their efforts to proclaim Jesus, just as other misguided religionists in the first century (See Gl 1:6-9).

One of the most tempting motivations to follow Jesus is what has become known today as the “prosperity gospel.” This is nothing new, for Satan tempted Jesus with the same promise that is also made by false prophets today: “All these things I will give You,” Satan promised Jesus, “if You will fall down and worship me” (Mt 4:9).

Promises of riches have come forth from the mouths of thousands of financial prophets throughout the world of religion. This is the preaching of another gospel. Those who have been duped into believing that Christianity is an investment scheme are moved by a narcissistic lust for the things of this world. Such a motivation is the exact opposite of the motivation of the gospel. In one statement, the Holy Spirit corrected the deception of the financial prophets: “If you were raised with Christ [through obedience of the gospel], seek those things that are above ... not on things on the earth” (Cl 3:1,2).

Gospel is about what we can give, not what we can get. The mind that was in Christ was about giving up the riches of heaven for the poverty of this world (Ph 2:5-8). This is what Jesus did, and this is the mind that Paul said we should have. It is as the widow who gave her last two coins. Jesus established her legacy with the words, “She out of her poverty has put in all the livelihood that she had” (Lk 21:4).

There are millions in the world today who are trapped in the bondage of those who promise the riches of this world. But they need to join with Jesus in His gospel sacrifice in order to be delivered from the bondage of false hopes.

The stirring of guilt has also become “another gospel” that has gone forth from the mouths of those who seek the bounty of filled collection plates, or the satisfaction of well-performed religious rites. But this is misplaced guilt. Guilt is certainly involved in our motivation to respond to the grace of God. However, this is guilt that takes place in our hearts before we are obedient to the gospel, not after. One reason for the revelation of the gospel was to relieve us of our guilt over sins. Jesus came to set us free from ourselves and religion. Guilt on the part of the Christian can never be a correct motivation to proclaim the guilt-delivering message of the gospel. Gratitude always replaces guilt when one obeys the gospel. And it is because Jesus has delivered us from the guilt of sin that we are moved into all the world with the message of a guilt-free faith for those who are in the bondage of religion.

All the preceding motivational standards of religion must always be separated from true Christianity. I pray that the confusion of religiosity that has generated motivations wrapped up in religion will in some way be unpacked in the chapters that follow. There are all sorts of false motivations for faith that are entangled in religious behavior. I have sought in this book to dig through these false motives that often hinder us in our efforts to unleash the power of the gospel in our lives. If we can honestly dig past religion and reach into the inner most parts of our own hearts, then possibly this book has accomplished its purpose to help us discover the true motivation that should characterize gospel-driven people.

By the end of the book, I will eventually come to the Holy Spirit's examples of diverted motives for being a Christian. The seven churches of Asia are the Spirit's examples of what can unfortunately develop in our hearts after years in the faith. If we find ourselves somewhere among the fellowship of the seven churches, particularly the disciples in Ephesus, then we are in trouble. If we find ourselves among the Ephesian disciples, we may have lost our primary motivation for being a Christian.

The final conclusion to this book is to discover the true motivation of the gospel. This is the only motivation that should drive our faith and lives. Any other motive for the Christian is a diversion away from the power of the gospel of Jesus Christ. Any diversion away from the prime motivation of the gospel in the life of the Christian always leads the Christian away from God.

Those motivations that define religion are always a diversion. They sustain the feeling of guilt as we struggle to live according to "another gospel" we have created after our own traditions. In fact, one can determine if his or her motivation for faith is true if the burden of guilt has been lifted when he or she comes from the waters of baptism in obedience to the gospel.

The purpose of this book, therefore, is to restore in our lives the pure motivational power of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The power of the gospel is the defining difference between religion and Christianity. Once we discover this power, then our lives as Christians will be restored with that refreshing original appeal that brought us to the cross, grave and resurrection with Jesus. The Christian life is a walk of thanksgiving to God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit for all that was done through the Son's incarnational offering at the cross. We do not through our own self-righteous religiosity seek to spoil all that Jesus accomplished for us at the cross. We must release the power of His life into ours in order to enjoy His peace that surpasses any peace that can be delivered by any religion of this world. It will be then that ...

... the peace of God that surpasses all understanding will keep your hearts and minds in Christ Jesus (Ph 4:7).

If we would define God as love—the Bible so states—then we must arrive at a necessary conclusion in reference to God's intervention (transcendence) into that which He created. The existence of a god who would be as cold and indifferent as space would be a logical contradiction. If god were cold and indifferent, then the first problem with the existence of this god would be that there would be no impetus for creating that which is defined by emotion. The fact that we are emotional beings who are blessed with the innate motivation to love presupposes that we originated from that which at least had the limits of our own emotional character. If god were cold and indifferent, and we were the product of such a being, then certainly we would also be cold and indifferent.

But we are not cold and indifferent. We are emotional. We love. It would not be logical, therefore, to assume that a cold and indifferent god would create something that was of a higher emotional character than himself. On the contrary, we would conclude that in his creation, he would of necessity create that which would be inferior to what or who he is as the creator. God could not create something better than Himself. God cannot even create another God. But here we are with the ability to love. And since we love—though handicapped with limits to our love—then we are driven to conclude that it is God who brought us into existence. We are not the product of some cosmic god we have created after our own imagination. We also assume that this creating God loves beyond the limits of our love that is inferior to His love.

This reasoning excites our imagination with wonder concerning who and what this God would be. We do have at least one necessary conclusion: Since we love, then we of necessity presuppose that our Creator is love. And since we must confess that our love is flawed, then we must conclude that His love is far above the love we can express for one another.

This brings us to another necessary conclusion: We are because He is, and thus, we love because we are the expression of His love. Our existence drives us to conclude that He exists, for love cannot spontaneously generate out of cold and indifferent matter.

Our existence as loving beings, therefore, is the first “proof” of His existence. And since love cannot exist alone in eternity, then we had to be brought into existence. His love, therefore, was the prime motivation for our existence, for eternal love had to find expression in creating that which would return love. Therefore, we conclude that He exists because we as loving creatures are the product of His existence. On the other hand, we would all be atheists in reference to believing in a cold and indifferent entity being the “creator” of that which was supposedly greater than the creator himself.

(All this is what makes the philosophy of evolution so preposterous. Evolutionary philosophy makes matter in motion the creator of something—us—that is greater than unloving matter itself. For this reason, this philosophy is inherently atheistic in reference to the God of love about whom the Bible speaks.)

Now that we are here, there was the necessity of that which would predicate the “Eternal Lover” transcending what He created. Think of this for a moment. Our existence is based on one conclusion in reference to why we are here. If our Creator created, then we must assume that He created us for eternal dwelling with Him in eternity. After all, what foolishness it would have been on the part of God to create individuals who would have only a few years of existence? God would be fiendish if He created those who would have only a brief taste of existence, and then vanish into an abyss of nothingness after our last breath. How could this God be love if He only desired a few years of our loving existence?

Because God desired to fill His eternal house with residents, He created within us a spirit that had eternal potential. This is a logical conclusion in reference to a God we have defined as love. But if we have eternal potential, then there must be a road map, that as free-moral beings, we can use to find our way into His presence. And this would assume ... necessitate ... that in His presence of eternal light, we must have light within us wherein we voluntarily submit to who He is. There would be no room for rebels in eternity. (The last free-moral rebels who were formerly there were kicked out.) Since sin is the problem of rebels, then there had to be a fix for sin.

And thus, there was the necessity for a transcendent intervention on the part of our Creator into our environment in order to deal with the problem of rebels who would seek to go their own way, which would be away from their Creator. In order to offer a fix sin, the One who was responsible for creation of necessity had to make a journey into the bowels of His creation in order to reveal the love of the Creator. He had to go on a mission of love in order to take those whom He loved back into eternity.

Since it was the original purpose of the Creator to bring the created into His presence for eternity, the transcendent invasion of the Creator had to be of such a nature that honest rebels would respond to the awesomeness of true love, the love that originated their very existence. This transcendent invasion we call the gospel!

Because we exist, the gospel is a logical necessity. If there were no gospel invasion, then we are back to a cold and indifferent “entity” that we suppose exists in cold space. But this is a logical contradiction in reference to the fact that we have the ability to love one another. The gospel is evidence of a transcendent God who loves us. Our love necessitated that He exists, and that His love for us is greater than we could ever love one another. Therefore, His love for us demanded that He transcend our existence for which He is responsible.

We need to make sure that we are on the same page when we are using the word “gospel.” This word is used in the religious world so frequently by those who know little Bible, but seek to portray that they know the gospel. The best some can preach about the matter is to say that the gospel is “good news.” And such the word means. But the gospel is good news about what? We use the word “what,” but the gospel is both “what” and “who.” It involves something that was done by Someone who transcended into the realm in which we dwell.

Some hold up the Bible and cry out, “You must obey this gospel,” thinking that the Bible is the gospel. They are wrong. The gospel is not obedience to a rule book. It is not ink and paper. Some cry out, “Believe on Jesus. He is the gospel!” These folks are right, but often fall short of understanding the totality of the gospel. Jesus was certainly the One through whom the gospel was revealed, but He alone was not all the eternal good news that was revealed through Him. Behind Him was a loving Father of grace who sent His only begotten Son into the world. It was the Father, Son and Holy Spirit working together as one in order to implement the gospel plan of salvation for us. Jesus, therefore, was not working alone. Neither was He simply a good teacher of Israel. If He were only a good rabbi, then the message of the gospel that He revealed to us would only be the words of some religious sage of history, as is characteristic of Islam, Buddhism and Confucianism.

One is also somewhat legalistic in teaching that one must “hear,” “believe,” “repent,” “confess,” and “be baptized.” Although this message led many to “reenact” the gospel, the message failed to put all emphasis on the gospel. It was affirmed that hear–believe–repent–confess–be baptized was the gospel, to which one must render obedience in order to be saved. In preaching such steps to conversion, we were somewhat lacking in fully understanding and presenting the gospel as the primary motive for obedience to the gospel.

We preached this for many years, but these legal instructions were not the gospel. We were preaching instructions surrounding the gospel, but not the gospel itself. We legally convinced people to hear, believe, repent, confess and be baptized often without ever mentioning the incarnational sacrifice of a loving God who sent His only begotten Son into an unloving world. We emphasized the response to the gospel, but not the total gospel itself. This was not how Peter the apostle revealed the gospel on Pentecost.

Fifty years ago someone wrote that when he approached those who had not obeyed the gospel that he used the book of Romans to teach the gospel. Romans is God’s book on grace, and thus, the preacher who was using the book of Romans to preach the gospel was on track. But we would say that there is more to the gospel than grace alone. Grace is an action that is unleashed in order to offer mercy for our crimes against God. Mercy implements grace, and thus, as in the Old Testament, God’s loving-kindness (grace) was constantly revealed through His patience with Israel and their wayward ways.

The translators’ manufactured the English word “loving-kindness.” Nevertheless, the word moves us in the right direction. It moves us toward God’s motive and action toward all humanity in the eventual offer of the blood of His incarnate Son (See Rm 3:24,25). The word “loving-kindness” moves us to the heart of a loving God who of necessity must be merciful, and thus in His mercy, offer grace. Though illustrated numerous times throughout the history of Israel, loving-kindness (grace) was released from heaven in order to forgive the sins of those who found themselves separated from God (Is 59:2).

Of necessity, loving-kindness had to originate from a God of love. When we seek to understand the gospel, we must first understand the nature of God. Gospel is an act of love, and thus the origin of the gospel of necessity had to come from a God who is defined as love. No fiendish or unjust god could ever be the origin of the gospel. For this reason, the gospel is something totally unique with Christianity. In their invention of religion, no religious teacher would ever have formulated a gospel action on behalf of man as is explained in the Bible.

Gospel and a fiendish or unjust god would be a logical contradiction. A God who “so loved the world” could never be fiendish, or vindictive. A God who would eternally be made in the likeness of those whom He created could never be unmerciful. Therefore, in order to understand the nature of the gospel, one must understand the nature of the One from whom the gospel originated.

These prerequisites to understand the gospel move us to that historical day two thousand years ago in which the gospel was first announced to humanity. Before we get to that day, we have always wondered why Jesus appeared after His resurrection to two men on a lonely road to Emmaus (Lk 24:13-29). We would assume that He wanted to help us understand that the gospel that was about to be announced a few weeks later went beyond His crucifixion and resurrection.

After some discussion on the road, over a meal Jesus eventually revealed Himself to the two sojourners. They came to realize that His presence with them assumed His resurrection, but they still had no understanding of the purpose of the cross. During the walk, the two men confessed that Jesus was to them only “a prophet mighty in deed and word” (Lk 24:19). They, and many in Israel, “were hoping that it was He who was going to redeem Israel” (Lk 24:21). As the apostles, they too had nationalistic hopes in Jesus as a national redeemer from Roman oppression (At 1:6). But they were all wrong. They still did not understand the meaning of the cross and significance of the resurrection. They had not yet experienced the ascension.

After witnessing the crucifixion, the two men on the road to Emmaus, as well as everyone else, still did not connect the dots between all the prophecies and the One who stood resurrected before them. All of them still had to go through “prophecy school” in order to understand Jesus’ link to what the prophecies said He would be. Prior to His ascension to reign, Jesus said to the apostles,

“These are the words that I spoke to you while I was still with you, that all things must be fulfilled that were written in the law of Moses and the Prophets and the Psalms, concerning Me.” Then He opened their understanding so that they might understand the Scriptures (Lk 24:44,45).

But they still had no idea what the gospel was. We believe Jesus made the appearance to the two men on the road to Emmaus in order to help us understand that the event of the cross was not the gospel. The gospel was not defined by the historical event of the death and resurrection of Jesus. It would take more revelation from the Father in order for the early witnesses of the resurrection to conclude that truly the God of love had revealed His heart to all men through the cross for the salvation of all who would believe on the crucified Jesus. Before the marvelous day of Pentecost, both the event of the cross and resurrection were only historical events that brought joy to hearts, but did not explain the gospel of grace that the events revealed.

The historical event of the crucifixion was not initially an explanation of the gospel of redemption. Neither did the resurrection confirm the power of the gospel. Thousands of people had been crucified by the Romans before Jesus. But all these crucifixions were simply executions, as thought all those who initially witnessed the crucifixion (“execution”) of Jesus. But by the power of His resurrection, the supposed “execution” of the Son of God was confirmed to be more than an execution (Rm 1:4,5). However, no one connected the events surrounding the crucifixion and resurrection with God’s eternal redemption plan. They did not until Peter and the apostles connected all the prophecies on the day of Pentecost with the cross that demonstrated the love of God.

Nevertheless, for us who now know the rest of the story, the cross revealed the total humanity of the One who sacrificed His existence in the form of God in order to be “made in the likeness of men” (Ph 2:6,7). For those immediate witnesses, this would be explained a little over six weeks later on Pentecost after the apostles and two men on the road to Emmaus had many sleepless nights.

THE GOSPEL CORE

The Holy Spirit knew that there would eventually come the skepticism of the Gnostics the latter part of the first century, which theology would be formalized gnosticism in the second century. Since God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all, the Gnostics erroneously assumed that the revelation of God through Jesus Christ meant that Jesus Christ was only a phantom. There could be no such thing as an incarnation because God could have no contact with evil flesh. Those who would teach such would be of those about whom John later wrote:

“For many deceivers have gone out into the world who do not confess that Jesus Christ is coming in the flesh” (2 Jn 7). They would not confess that Jesus Christ is now what He was after the incarnational resurrection.

Jesus’ final coming in the flesh of man is foundational in defining the gospel. There could have been no cross if He had not first come in the flesh. The Gnostics, therefore, denied the gospel by denying the eternal incarnational sacrifice of the Son of God. The Gnostic’s denial encourages us to reaffirm the prerequisite for the truth of the gospel. There could have been no gospel if there were truly no incarnation, which incarnation was in some way eternal, for He is coming in the flesh, into which flesh we will become like He now is (1 Jn 3:2).

We must conclude that the gospel (good news) was first revealed through the incarnation of the transcendent God who came into the physical world of our existence:

A. An unending incarnational existence:

Now we have come to a necessity that explains the superlative, “God so loved the world” (Jn 3:16). The revelation of the gospel began on earth with an unending incarnational birth in Bethlehem that will continue to the final coming of Jesus in the flesh of a glorious body (1 Jn 3:2). The incarnation would continue even into eternity wherein Jesus will dwell among His brethren in the presence of God. The gospel necessitates the incarnation of the One who was originally in eternity in the form of God (Jn 1:1,2,14). If Jesus were only a man, then there would be no such thing as the gospel. If there were no incarnation, then there would have been no offering. His sacrificial offering necessitated His incarnation in the flesh of man. So, the Gnostics were wrong.

B. Eternal (sufficient) atoning sacrifice:

Since it was not logical or possible that created animals could possibly atone for sins against the eternal God (Hb 10:1-4), then there had to be a volunteer from God to repair the damage our sin created in our fellowship with God. That which was in the form of God, the Son, had to make the eternal gospel journey from the presence of God to our presence on earth, and eventually to a sacrificial cross (See Ph 2:5-8). There was no other way.

We must conclude that the incarnation of the Son of God moves our understanding of the gospel beyond the cross alone. The fact that God the Son gave up being in the form of God in the spirit assumes the suffering that all of us in the flesh confront throughout our own lives. His suffering in the flesh began in a manger in Bethlehem and extended to the first driven nails through His flesh on the cross. When we speak of the incarnation, therefore, we understand that the sacrifice was more than the cross. This explains what John meant when he identified the deceiver as the one who denied the incarnation. We thus understand that the gospel sacrifice of the incarnation went far beyond His few hours on the cross.

His was an extreme love for us in that He was willing to be eternally incarnate in the flesh in order to transition us from our present flesh into that gloriously transformed flesh in which He now exists (See Ph 3:21; 1 Jn 3:2). (For more research on this subject, consult Book 73, chapters 1-3, The Gospel of God's Heart, Biblical Research Library, africainter-national.org.)

Comprehending the incarnational journey of the Son of God from the form of God in the spirit to the flesh of man is most difficult to comprehend (Ph 2:5-11). In fact, from a human perspective it is incomprehensible, for we are not God. But the more we understand our sin, and our inability to live without sin, the more we begin to catch a small glimmer of hope in understanding the awesome love of God.

Understanding that the eternal God who existed in spirit would contemplate venturing out of eternal, spirit dwelling into our sin infested world is stunning. It is overwhelming. It is humbling. It knocks all pretentiousness out of our souls. It moves our hearts to the declarative question, “Wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from the body of this death?” (Rm 7:24).

In the preceding question, it was as if Paul—the self-confessed chief of sinners—could now understand the revelation of the Spirit that poured forth from the tip of his fingers on a quill while he inscribed the inspired words of a manuscript to the Romans. We assume that his hands were quivering in thanksgiving as he inscribed these thoughts. A tear may have smudged the ink as he followed with an outburst of gratitude: “I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord” (Rm 7:25).

The heart that is not emotionally overwhelmed by the eternal incarnational coming of the Son of God into the flesh of man is certainly a heart that is beyond submission. It is a heart that has disqualified itself from dwelling in the eternal presence of the God of sacrificial love. It is a heart that does not know God.

C. The resurrectional ascension and reign:

The resurrection of Jesus was necessary to validate the purpose of the cross. The cross would have no power if there were no hope of eternal living for all those who would fall prostrate before the incarnational offering of the Son of God. The resurrection proved Jesus to be the Son of God (Rm 1:4,5). It also proved that those who obey the gospel will have life eternal as a result of their obedience to the gospel for the remission of sins (At 2:38).

The ascension was necessary in order to prove that the supposed resuscitated Jesus did not wander off into obscurity and die, as some Gnostics of the second century claimed. Reigning at the right hand of God, required the ascension, and ascension required the resurrection from the dead. All of this is good news. It is gospel.

The cross alone would be meaningless if it were not for the resurrection. The resurrection could be questioned without the ascension. And the ascension would be meaningless without somewhere for Jesus to be in reference to our existence in the midst of Satan here on earth. This is all gospel, for the sacrifice of the incarnate Son of God solved our reconciliation with God for eternity. His resurrection solved our fatalism in believing that this world is all there is. The ascension solved our wonder as to where He went. And His reign solves our anxiety problem that no matter what transpires in this life, Jesus is still King of kings and Lord of lords with authority over all things (Mt 28:18; 1 Tm 6:15). This is great news! This is gospel!

And thus, we are brought into Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost feast of A.D. 30 where all the dots between prophecy and fulfillment were connected, and the reality of an ascension and reign were proclaimed by twelve Spirit-inspired men. It was on this Pentecost that the totality of the gospel was revealed through the apostles upon whom the Holy Spirit came with the sound of a mighty wind, and finally, the revelation that the gospel was more than an execution by Roman soldiers.

What was preached on Pentecost, and the response of the people, explain the power the gospel can have over the lives of honest faith-oriented people. What happened on that day helps us separate the gospel from religion, for there were in Jerusalem on that occasion the most faithful religionists of the world. We must follow closely the message and response on that day lest we allow our religion to confuse us concerning the very heart of the gospel.

All of us must confess that we have some self-sanctifying religiosity in our hearts. Unless we confess up to this fact, the gospel will never work its full power in transforming our lives. When we think we can do it on our own, the motivating power of the grace of God is severely handicapped. We must spiritually struggle, therefore, to allow the gospel of grace to penetrate deep into our religiosity in order to touch the inner sanctuary of our hearts. If we do not, then religion will continue to reign in a self-righteous heart where Jesus seeks to reign without any competition of our own religiosity.

Men can live as pagan/heathen/unbelievers, that characterizes most of the world. Or they can live a religious life that defines almost everyone else. But then we have the opportunity of living the gospel. On the Passover/Pentecost feast of Acts 2 there were religionists in town who had perfected religiosity to a precise systematic theology that was unmatched with any other religion throughout the world at the time. Paul, who lived the religion, defined the faith as Judaism, or the “Jews’ religion” (Gl 1:13).

On the Pentecost of A.D. 30 there were also in town some idolatrous unbelievers. Roman soldiers were there, many of whom were idolaters who followed after Roman religion. But the vast majority of the multitudes were Judeo-religionists who had journeyed from the far corners of the Roman world in order to attend the Passover/Pentecost feast (At 2:5). About 3,000 faithful Jewish religionists had journeyed to Jerusalem under the banner of Judaism. When the feast was over, they returned home as gospel-transformed disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The gospel penetrated the hearts of about 3,000 dedicated religionists on Pentecost. Therefore, when honest and sincere people are confronted with the power of the gospel, change happens. Even an extreme religionist as Saul of Tarsus, who was engrossed in Judaism, can give way to the power of the gospel (See Ph 3:3-5; 1 Tm 1:13).

Religiosity can open the door for the gospel. But we must understand that the gospel of grace must eventually peel away all our pretentious self-righteous religiosity. The power of the gospel cannot fully be realized in our lives until Jesus reigns as King of our hearts.

THE GOSPEL CONNECTION

Something happened on that memorial Pentecost of A.D. 30 that separates religion from gospel. After the Holy Spirit had connected all the dots in the minds of the apostles through the baptism of the Holy Spirit, they were ready for the world (At 2:1-4). Even after Jesus had graduated them from His final “school of prophecy,” the Spirit had to connect the eternal incarnation of the Son, to the eternal offering, resurrection, ascension, and reign of the Son of God to the right hand of God. It was then that they were ready to stand up and go to work before the multitudes (At 2:14).

It may have been about midday when Peter finally stood up with the eleven and unpacked the gospel with only a few words. He first revealed that all the rushing “wind storm” that had transpired at the beginning of the day was actually prophesied (At 2:14-21). And then he got down to gospel business in the reign of Jesus who was now both Lord and Christ.

Jesus of Nazareth was miraculously proved to be the One sent from God. He was miraculously validated to be the Christ of Israel. However, the confirming miracles that validated His Messiahship were not the gospel (At 2:22; Jn 3:2). Neither was the gospel the coming of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles at the beginning of the day, for it was the mission of the Spirit to glorify the Son, not Himself (Jn 16:14).

Those who exalt miracles and the Holy Spirit invariably minimize the power of the gospel. Their obsession with miracles and the Spirit diverts their attention away from the power of the incarnational gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. Instead of exalting and focusing on the resurrectional ascension and reign of the incarnate Son of God, many obsess over those beliefs or ministries that are important, but not primary. Instead of focusing on the power of the gospel, they are searching for some power in the Holy Spirit to somehow confirm their own faith. We must never forget that the power to both save and transform lives is in the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

It takes no diploma in theology to know enough about the work of the Holy Spirit to conclude that in His work in our lives, He would never seek to displace or minimize the transforming power of the gospel of the Son of God. If He did, then He would fail in His work to glorify the Son (Jn 16:14). Gospel-living Christians must always keep in mind that the Holy Spirit will do His work regardless of our understanding thereof. Though we may not understand all of the Spirit’s ministry for the saints, one thing is definitely clear: The Holy Spirit would never do anything to divert our attention away from the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we would claim that the Spirit must insert in our lives more power than the gospel, then we have asserted that the power of the gospel to transform lives is limited. It was never Jesus’ intention to send the Spirit in order to subsidize the power of the life-transforming gospel.

The personal ministries that later came into the organic function of the church was not the message of the apostles on Pentecost. Later discussions in the epistles that emphasized corrections in dysfunctional behavior between the disciples was not the message. When churches become sectarian, and thus competitive for members, they often use their uniqueness as a message to “convert” others to their particular sect. But the uniqueness that later characterized many autonomous groups of Christianity was not the message of Peter and the apostles. That which cuts religious people of faith to the heart was the message of the gospel of King Jesus. This was the apostles’ message to the Pentecost audience.

We cannot overemphasize this point for many have used the epistles to construct a systematic theology that has become their identity, and subsequently, their evangelistic “gospel” message. Their supposed doctrinal purity is used to approach other religious people in order to convert them to one’s own particular sect. A theological message has thus replaced gospel preaching.

The crucifixion of God’s gospel Messenger in the flesh was not a subpoint of the apostles’ message. Because the cross was in the eternal plan of God, it was the core of the gospel message (At 2:23). “But God raised Him up,” was the confirming proof that Jesus Christ was the One about whom the prophets had spoken. And not only the resurrection, but there was an ascension to the throne of David in fulfillment of promises to David that One would reign upon his throne of authority (At 2:25-32). And then Peter revealed more: “This Jesus God has raised up, ... being exalted at the right hand of God” (At 2:32,33). “Therefore, let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ” (At 2:36).

We must keep in mind the spiritual situation of those who heard this first announcement of the gospel. These were the “elite” of the representatives of the Jews’ religion. They knew their Old Testaments better than most people today. But when Peter was making these statements about the Man whom God had miraculously proved to be the One who fulfilled over three hundred Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah/Christ of Israel, they were overwhelmed. They were stunned.

Isaiah 53, Psalm 22, and a host of other prophecies concerning the Suffering Servant of Isaiah became reality. They did not need to return to their synagogues after Pentecost in order that a Rabbi read again to them the picture that God had painted for Israel throughout 1,400 years of history. They could quote all the prophecies by memory, for they were all as the two men on the road to Emmaus. The One that God said He would send was beyond the misguided hope of a restoration of national Israel. He was the One who “was wounded for our transgressions. He was bruised for our iniquities. The chastisement of our peace was upon Him. And with His stripes we are healed” (Is 53:5).

The Jews’ murderous tragedy was turned to grief because they realized that they had become servants of Satan to lay the stripes on the back of the Suffering Servant by delivering Him over to the Romans for crucifixion. There were certainly tears of grief as they mourned over their participation of laying the stripes on the One who was sent to restore them again to an eternal fellowship with the God they had worshiped since before the days of Abraham.

“Now when they heard this, they were cut to the heart”
(At 2:37).

This is the emotional impact that the gospel should have on every sincere heart. If it does not, then one either does not understand the gospel, or he understands, but with a hardened heart, walks away. In walking away he has judged himself unfit for eternal dwelling in the presence of the loving God who gave His Son for them. He does not, therefore, know God.

We must be clear on this point. If the incarnational appearance in this world of the Son of God does not touch one’s heart, then he or she is untouchable. The gospel is the pearl of great price, and if one refuses to understand the preciousness of the incarnational God, then it is not profitable to continually cast this pearl before those who have no interest in things beyond this world. This a fact of evangelistic gospel living that every disciple must understand. Our friends who do not recognize the pearl of great prize are not candidates for eternal life.

WRONG RESPONSES

In order to understand what cut to the heart of the religious people of faith on Pentecost, we must understand what the focus was of the message that was presented. Something that they heard mournfully moved them to respond to the apostolic messengers with the question, “Men and brethren, what will we do?” (At 2:37).

It is interesting to note that they did not respond with the question, “What should we do?” There was desperation in their question as to what would deliver them out of their predicament of having participated in the crucifixion of the One for whom they and their fathers had waited for centuries. They realized that they were the instruments through whom Satan had worked to have the heel of the Seed of woman bruised (Gn 3:15). Though Peter explained that their actions were in harmony with the predetermined plan of God to take His Son to the sacrificial cross, they realized that according to prophecy they went wrong in aiding and abetting the crucifixion of an innocent man. But why did they mournfully respond in such a manner to the point that about 3,000 obeyed the gospel on that some day?

In answer to this question, we are encouraged to go forward in time about thirty years to another similar “Bible class” in Rome. But before we go there, consider Luke’s historical statement of what happened immediately after Peter’s statement that they repent and be baptized: “And with many other words he [Peter] testified and exhorted, saying, ‘Save yourselves from this perverse generation’” (At 2:40).

We can assume that there could not have been “many other words” since we would have to include on this same day the actual baptism of about 3,000 people. What we infer from the statement is that the apostles spoke more on the subject of the prophets in reference to the fulfillment of the prophecies of the Man from Galilee. And because they had crucified the One who would deliver them out of this world, Peter reaffirmed that Jesus was the only way out.

We assume this from the words “testified” and “exhorted.” Peter’s testimony was that this Jesus, who was proved to be from God both through miraculous wonders and His resurrection, was indeed the fulfillment of all Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah. Convincing the multitude that Jesus was the fulfillment of all prophecies concerning the Messiah was Peter’s means by which he exhorted the people to obey the gospel in order to escape the perverseness of this world.

Peter reminded the people that the “promise [of the Savior] is to you [Jews] and to your children, and to all [the world of Gentiles] who are afar off, as many as the Lord our God will call to Himself [through the gospel - 2 Th 2:14]” (At 2:39). They were the perverse generation from which they could be delivered in fulfillment of the promise.

Many years after the Pentecost event, Paul went forth into all the world in order to call both Jews and Gentiles unto God through his preaching of the gospel. Acts 28:23-28 is a similar occasion to that which transpired in the Pentecost of Acts 2, but the location was in Rome about thirty years later. Luke recorded of the occasion:

And when they [the Jews] had appointed him [Paul] a day, many came to him at his lodging, to whom he explained and testified of the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the Law of Moses and the Prophets, from morning until evening.

The occasion of Paul's "explaining" and "testifying" was similar to that of Pentecost in Acts 2. With the Jews who assembled before him in Rome, Paul did the same as the apostles in reference to what they knew of the Old Testament prophecies. Paul did not present a doctrinal discourse on the "New Testament church." His resource was the Law of Moses and the Prophets. From these two resources he explained how the prophecies pointed to the ascension of the "One like unto the Son of Man" ascending unto the Ancient of Days, whereupon there was given Him dominion, glory and kingdom reign (Dn 2:44; 7:13,14). On the occasion of this all-day meeting Paul certainly emphasized the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53, and the One who cried out in agony about being forsaken (Ps 22). All his discussion was in reference to "persuading them concerning Jesus" as the One about whom the prophets spoke (At 28:23).

Paul's discussions with the Jews of Rome centered around Jesus being the fulfillment of all prophecies of the Messiah in order to prove that Jesus was the One. Peter's exhortation to the Pentecost audience thirty years before was for the same purpose. And during His final days with His disciples between the resurrection and ascension, Jesus schooled the remaining eleven apostles in the fact that He was the fulfillment of all that was written in the law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms concerning Him (Lk 24:44).

And upon consideration of the people who were in Jerusalem at the time, Peter's reference to the "perverse generation" may refer directly to the perverse religious generation of the Jews. We often want the reference to refer to the "perverse Romans" among them. But we must not forget that it was the "perverse religionists" who used the Romans to crucify our Savior. It was a murderous religion by which they were deceived by the leaders thereof to turn Jesus over to the Romans. It was indeed a perverse religion with blind leaders who led the blind to cry out, "Crucify Him!"

The focus of Jesus, Peter and Paul was to direct our attention to who Jesus was and what was prophesied that He would be for the world. They did not confuse those to whom they spoke concerning teachings of the "true church." They simply preached gospel in prophecy. Their teaching was not centered around prophecies concerning the "end of times," but prophecy that an end of the prophecies in the Lord Jesus Christ in time.

Those whose message is primarily about end-of-times speculation in reference to those who live today have missed the gospel that was prophesied by the prophets. They excite people about their future fantasies in order to encourage people to come to Jesus because of fear. They have thus missed the gospel of love about which the prophets in the Old Testament spoke. They miss the loving-kindness (grace) of God that was illustrated in God's patience with Israel in order to bring the Messiah into the world.

Because Jesus, Peter and Paul applied the Old Testament prophecies to Jesus as the Messiah, we can understand better Jesus' ministry of teaching in reference to the gospel that He was revealing during His earthly ministry. As the Messiah, He was the origin of the gospel, as well as the One who would implement in the world the gospel through His death, resurrection and ascension. Notice what Jesus said to His audiences: "For if you do not believe that I am He, you will die in your sins" (Jn 8:24). "When you have lifted up the Son of Man, then you will know that I am He" (Jn 8:28). "Now I tell you before it comes, so that when it comes to pass you may believe that I am He" (Jn 13:19).

So John concluded his "gospel of John" concerning why he recorded the signs that confirmed Jesus to be the One: "These are written so that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ [Messiah], the Son of God, and that believing you might have life through His name" (Jn 20:31).

Now we should understand that when idolatrous people in the first century initially asked what they must do to be saved, the answer to their question was obvious: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you and your household will be saved" (At 16:31). John said to "the people that they should believe on Him who would come after him, that is, on Jesus" (At 19:4). Believing on Jesus was only the beginning of one's journey into Christ. If one stopped at a simple, unresponsive faith, then he would remain spiritually dead in his sins.

The beginning of one's obedience to the gospel starts with the One who revealed and enacted the gospel. Believing on Jesus did not make one a disciple without obedience to the gospel. It only gave one a right to become a child of God. "But as many as received [believed on] Him, to them He gave the right to become the children of God, even to those who believe in His name" (Jn 1:12). "Having the right" does not make one a child of God. Belief only gives one the right to continue on the road to God's righteousness that is in Christ. Belief should encourage one to look further down the road to what God instructs concerning our opportunity to become His child.

THE RIGHT CUT

What disturbs us today is that the message of many religious leaders throughout the world has shifted from gospel to the promotion of those things that promote religion. If included, the gospel has been relegated to an “invitation” at the end of an oration on social relationships or doctrinal purity. Since it is assumed that the Bible is specifically about us, then from Genesis to Revelation the content of the word of God is used primarily to address dysfunctional relationships, whether in family, between friends, or in our communities.

The Bible certainly speaks on such matters, but we must not forget that the entire Bible is first about Jesus and the gospel. It is God’s road map to explain how He brought His Son into the world because He so loved the world. Upon initial obedience to the gospel, the Bible is about continuing gospel living throughout our lives.

We use the Bible to correct our behavior in reference to our obedience to the gospel. We must continually remind ourselves that the Bible focuses on encouraging us to walk according to that which we have obeyed. Paul explained this in the following words: “As you have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk in Him” (Cl 2:6). “If you then were raised with Christ, seek those things that are above, where Christ is sitting at the right hand of God” (Cl 3:1). “Therefore, if you died with Christ from the elementary principles of the world, why, as if you were living in the world, do you submit yourselves to [religious] ordinances?” (Cl 2:20).

In many cases, our message has changed because our focus has been diverted from Jesus to ourselves. It has changed from focusing on Jesus to focusing on our own special needs. And in our confrontation with sectarian religion, the message has changed from Jesus and the gospel to winning doctrinal arguments with those with whom we disagree.

In view of these changes, therefore, we feel that the following points should be considered, for these points clarify the message of the apostles to the Pentecost audience. About 3,000 people were cut to the heart on that Pentecost. Unfortunately, we often assume that something other than the gospel moved the people to respond to the message of the apostles.

CRY FREEDOM

The Pentecost audience was not cut to the heart because they realized that they were following a legal system of law that God no longer considered valid.

It is true that the Sinai law was nailed to the cross (Cl 2:14). Christians are dead to the Sinai law through their obedience to the gospel (Rm 7:1-4). They are dead to the old law and covenant simply because in His coming, Jesus introduced a new covenant and law (Hb 9:15; 10:5-9; 12:24).

We must not forget that those whom the apostles addressed on Pentecost were caught up in something different than the Sinai law. They were in bondage to the Jews’ religion. The original Sinai law had been blanketed with a host of traditions. So many traditions had been added to the Sinai law that its original intent was obscured by those who rejected the law in order to keep their traditions (Mk 7:1-9). The address of the apostles to their audience, therefore, was an address to traditional religionists, specifically, the religion of the Jews (Gl 1:14).

If we suppose that the Pentecost audience was moved by the preaching of another system of religious law, then we have missed the point of the gospel of grace. Honest people of faith under the Sinai law knew that it was impossible to keep law perfectly in order to self-justify oneself before God (See Gl 2:16). Those who stood before the apostles had for centuries involved themselves in a religious legal system of law-keeping that had digressed into self-righteous sanctification. They supposed that they could keep the law perfectly if they added numerous other religious rites to the Sinai law. The Sinai law, plus all the added religious rites, composed the Jews’ religion, or Judaism. This was actually the very system of religion that drove these honest, but frustrated people of faith, to the gospel of freedom that was preached by the apostles.

In reference to some who were tempted to return to a religious system of law, sin and death, Paul asked them a question and answered it perfectly: “Therefore, why then the [Sinai] law? It was added because of trans- gressions until the Seed should come to whom the promise was made” (Gl 3:19). But when the Seed (Jesus) came, the necessity for perfect law-keeping was gone. Grace displaced self-righteous religion. Those who understand this are not tempted to turn Christianity into a system of self-righteous religion.

When honest and sincere people are confronted with law, law provokes mourning only over one’s inability to keep it perfectly. The Sinai law thus drove the Pentecost audience to grace because they understood that their attempts to keep law perfectly did not produce any satisfaction of being justified before God. Their obedience was always imperfect because we are all lawbreakers (Rm 3:9,10,23).

But there was more to the gospel than one’s self-realization of being a lawbreaker. The gospel of grace was not another legal system of law that would continue to frustrate those who sincerely wanted to be close to God, but were barred from such because of law and sin. The atonement of the cross was God’s signal to His creation that we could fulfill the intended purpose for which we were created. The cross was a restored union (fellowship) between God and man for eternity.

The gospel was a message from the heart of God through His only begotten Son in order that the “tree of life” once again be restored to a world from which we were driven (See Gn 3:22-24). On Pentecost, the audience realized that they had, through the crucifixion, actually crucified their opportunity for eternal life. Since the One they had crucified was the Messiah who revealed the heart of God, all those Old Testament prophetic descriptions of the Suffering Servant of God struck them directly in their hearts. Their being “cut to the heart” was more than feeling guilty over crucifying an innocent man. They realized that the innocent man was the Man.

The apostles did not preach another system of law, but freedom from sin through the crucified heart of God. They preached freedom through the gospel of Jesus by which all religionists can be delivered from sin. And once delivered, about twenty years after the Pentecost message, Paul reminded all former Jewish religionists, “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1).

FREEDOM FROM LEGALISM

The Pentecost audience was not cut to the heart because of a legal command to be baptized.

It is certainly right to teach that one must be baptized for the remission of sins. We could refer to numerous passages throughout the New Testament that record commands and cases of those who were baptized (Mt 28:19,20; Mk 16:15,16). But the motivation to respond in obedience to the gospel through baptism, was not the apostles’ initial message that cut to the heart the audience on Pentecost. In our zeal to encourage people to be baptized for remission of sins—that is necessary—we have sometimes overlooked that which should cut one to the heart in order that he or she be motivated to be immersed into Christ. In Peter’s message, there was “cutting” before there was mention of baptism.

Baptism (obedience to the gospel) was the only answer to the problem the Pentecost audience had just realized. If they had initially heard all that was to be included in the preaching of Jesus, then certainly they would have taken the initiative that the Ethiopian eunuch did when he heard the same preaching of Jesus, “See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized?” (At 8:36).

Preaching the message of the gospel includes how one must connect with the cleansing blood of the cross. However, obedience in baptism is not the primary motivation. The gospel of Jesus is the sinner’s primary motivation. Therefore, if one does not call for water upon hearing the gospel, then he or she has either not understood the gospel, or he or she has understood, but walked away from the heart of God.

On the Pentecost occasion of Acts 2, Peter said nothing about baptism in the initial message that cut the audience to the heart. If we suppose that a legal command to be baptized should cut one to the heart, then we have subsidized with a legal command the power of the gospel message. Peter did not mention the command to obey the gospel (baptism) until he had preached the gospel. The command to repent and be baptized followed the message of the gospel that cut them to the heart, but was not the gospel. The fact that about 3,000 were cut to the heart by the gospel proved that their obedience to the gospel was genuine (At 2:41).

When sincere people respond to the gospel of grace, they are not looking for another legal system of law to obey. With the Pentecost audience, law was the problem. Law revealed their inability to keep law perfectly, and thus, they were in sin. It is for this reason that the religious legalist misses the point in reference to baptism. Baptism is a necessary response to the gospel of grace. When the Pentecost repentant asked, “What will we do,” they wanted answers from God. If the answer to repent and be baptized was a law from the apostles’ religious ingenuity, then it would have been the construction of another legal system of religion to which we must conform. But the fact that they accepted “repent and be baptized” as instructions from God, they responded to God, not men.

But why is the gospel message inseparably linked to baptism in obedience to the gospel? Paul made the connection in Romans 3: “Do we then make void law through faith? Certainly not! On the contrary, we establish law” (Rm 3:31). If one’s faith in the gospel leads to the cutting of the heart, then the evidence of the “cutting” is one’s obedience to the gospel in baptism. If there is no call for water, then the one who has heard the gospel is either hardened, or simply too immature to truly understand the sacrificial offering of the incarnate Son of God on the cross of Calvary. If the situation is the latter, then he or she is not at the age of accountability. (We must be careful about baptizing young people who are too immature to understand the gospel of the incarnational offering of the Son of God.)

Those who are moved by faith to ask, “What will we do,” are not looking for another law-keeping system by which they can legally self-justify themselves before God. Neither are they looking for another system of self-righteous religious traditionalism wherein they could possibly self-sanctify themselves in obedience to religious rites and ceremonies (See Rm 10:1-3).

Self-sanctifying law-keeping religion was the background of the Pentecost audience. Upon their arrival to Jerusalem for the feast, it was all they knew in order to please God. When the apostles preached the gospel of grace, they were probably somewhat confused, if not overwhelmed. They had tried law-keeping and that failed. The message of the gospel, therefore, moved them to ask for instructions from God, not man. They were not looking for another legal system of law, for their inability to keep the Jews’ law perfectly had moved them by faith to look for another way. This is the appeal of the gospel. Therefore, when God responds with “repent and be baptized,” gospel-repentant people who have been cut to the heart by the gospel establish God’s will in their lives through their obedience to the gospel in baptism.

Because baptism (obedience to the gospel) was from God, then it was not only for remission of sins, but also for freedom from law. It was not another law, obedience to which produced an assumed legal self-sanctifying remission of sins. In obedience to the gospel that sets us free from religion (traditional laws of men), one’s obedience also sets one free from both sin and that which is the occasion for sin ... law. It is in obedience to the gospel (baptism) that one connects with the blood of Jesus, and thus is rendered forgiveness of sins by God.

If baptism were just another law to be obeyed, then the one being baptized would be legally working for his own remission of sins. His legal obedience to be baptized would be an effort on his part to keep law in order to be set free from the necessity of keeping law perfectly. But because baptism is the correct response to the gospel. The action of baptism is a signal of faith in Christ, and thus, the blood of Christ goes to work in the sinner’s life at the point of baptism.

Baptism is not a work. The only work involved in one’s baptism is God’s work to forgive the baptized believer all his or her sins. This is the foundational meaning of what the Holy Spirit later revealed in writing to those Christians in Rome: “For sin will not have dominion over you, for you are not under law, but under grace [gospel]” (Rm 6:14). One is baptized, not to be under law, but under grace. In obedience to the gospel in baptism one is freed from law that brings death, for in baptism one connects with the grace of God.

We previously stated that there has often been a change of emphasis in the preaching of the word of God to unbelievers in these modern times. We have mentioned some major diversions that have sidetracked some from the gospel. We could list a host of subjects that people promote today in order to sidetrack people from obedience to the gospel. Some promote ceremonial legalities or vibrant concert assemblies as the main attraction. Some have been very clever to present their assemblies as a Hollywood attraction in order to inspire people to come to Jesus. The apostles used none of these promotional gimmicks.

Some have asserted that they have the right form for the Lord’s Supper during an assembly. On Pentecost, the apostles mentioned nothing concerning the Supper. But if we promote the Supper as a ceremonial law of assembly, then our observance of the Supper becomes self-contradictory. It becomes such if we promote a self-sanctifying observance that must be legally performed as law. If we celebrate the Supper in such a manner, then we are legally observing it according to our own self-imposed law. But because the Supper is about celebrating our freedom from law and sin that we have received through the gospel of Jesus, then in the Supper we celebrate freedom from law and sin because of the gospel of freedom. We must remember that on Pentecost the apostles said nothing about the Supper in order to cut the people to the heart. After their obedience to the gospel, the early Christians were moved to observe the Supper in order to remember Jesus who opened the door into the gospel.

In their initial presentation of the gospel, the apostles said nothing about the Holy Spirit. In fact, lest the Holy Spirit steal the show on the Pentecost occasion, He showed up on the apostles before the preaching began. And in order that there be no confusion concerning those upon whom He came, there appeared “tongues as of fire” that indicated each apostle whom He baptized with the truth of the gospel (At 2:3). Therefore, the apostles’ initial gospel message was not a promise to be baptized in the Holy Spirit, or to speak in tongues (languages) as they did when they were baptized in the Spirit at the beginning of the day. Only after the mournful response to the preaching of the gospel was there any reference made to the Holy Spirit. Peter’s promise was that those who were cut to the heart would receive the “gift of the Holy Spirit” when they were baptized (At 2:38). The work of the Spirit on this occasion was in view of what Jesus, during His ministry, had spoken concerning the work of the Spirit: “He will glorify Me” (Jn 16:14). It was never the work of the Holy Spirit to cut people to the heart. This was the gospel business of Jesus, not the Spirit.

There were no churches to join on Pentecost, so the people were not given the option of “joining the church of their choice.” There was no name of the church under which the audience could call themselves. There were no outlines on “church doctrine” to pass out to the people. There was no “church house” where they were to show up on the Sunday after. Since they were visitors to Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost feast, most of the people had no friends in Jerusalem who could usher them to the “front pew.”

The people responded only to the gospel, and in obedience to this gospel God added them to new friends (At 2:47). Their common fellowship thereafter was centered around Jesus. And thus, we are reminded of what John wrote thirty years later to another audience on a different occasion:

That which was from the beginning, that we have heard, that we have seen with our eyes, that we have looked upon and our hands have handled, we proclaim concerning the Word of Life (1 Jn 1:1).

And that was the message thirty years before on the Pentecost of A.D. 30. That simple revelation was enough to cut people to the heart. It is still enough to convict hearts today when the gospel is preached around the world.

RESPONSIVE FAITH

The problem we have in the religious world today is that people often respond to Jesus with the wrong motives, or for the wrong purposes. The result is that wrong motives and purposes produce wrong results. It is as Simon the sorcerer. He was baptized as others in the city of Samaria. But his motives for coming into the fellowship of the saints were wrong, for he thought that he could regain his pompous position in the community by having others come to him in order that he lay his hands on them to receive the Holy Spirit (At 8:19,20).

When we promote church heritage or “pastoral positions” as a motivation to join the church of one’s particular choice, then the heritage of the religious group is perpetuated and the gospel becomes an inconsequential motivation. When there is a new recruit solicited with success, new convert classes are taught in order to bring the new converts into conformity to the doctrines that perpetuate each particular religious sect. Traditions that identify the heritage of the group, not the gospel, become the foundation for the existence of each particular religious group. And since the heritage of each religious sect is perpetuated through the leaders who supervise the flock, then there is competition for leadership within each group as in the case of Simon. If Simon had his way, he would have willingly established the “Church of Simon” in Samaria.

When a legal system of theology becomes the identity of any particular religious group, then legal systems of doctrine become the message of the group. People then preach church and not gospel. Since the “identity” of the group is legally based, then the gospel is lost as the primary motivation among the members. Legalities are subsequently preached in order to bring people into conformity with “church law.” Law, not gospel, thus becomes the foundation upon which each particular religious group is built and defined. Arguments in the group are often centered around law, not Jesus Christ. And for this reason, “issues” become very important within legally-defined sects.

And then there are those groups who seek to build their religion on Jesus, but they cheapen the gospel through a simple confession that Jesus is “their personal Savior.” They forget that it is the gospel that generates faith, as it did with those on Pentecost. And when faith is generated by the gospel, then obedience naturally follows when one acknowledges the heart of God through the offering of His incarnate Son. We must not forget that the Son of God introduced the gospel of grace through His incarnational offering. Since He was God in the flesh, He made available through the cross all that God has for us in order to bring us into eternity with Him.

John wrote in order “that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you might have life” (Jn 20:31). There is a subjunctive in this statement that people often miss. John recorded the miracles that confirmed Jesus to be the Christ and Son of God. The purpose for recording this miraculous confirmation was to produce belief in the minds of the readers. The result was that those who believed might have eternal life. The passage does not say that they will have eternal life if they simply believe. The word “might” assumes that there are some conditions to be fulfilled in order that one have eternal life.

This was the case on Pentecost. The people were led to believe in Jesus because of the preaching of the gospel that was revealed through Jesus who was “a Man approved by God among you by miracles and wonders and signs that God did through Him in your midst” (At 2:22). However, the people felt no security in their initial belief that Jesus was actually Lord and Christ. As a result of their belief, they were cut to the heart and asked what to do in order that they might find a solution for their rejection of Jesus. Their belief produced mourning, not relief. When the gospel produces belief, then people must be instructed what to do in order to find relief for their mourning over sin. In the case of Pentecost, the people were instructed to repent and be baptized for the forgiveness of their sins (At 2:38). In this obedience to the gospel they were baptized into Christ where there is eternal life (2 Tm 2:10). Belief produced remorse over sins, but obedience to the gospel in baptism produced relief from sin.

A Philippian jailor was once inspired by the gospel living of two disciples in a Roman dungeon, the most unlikely place for two people to be singing gospel praises to God (At 16:25). But when the jailor was shaken by an earthquake, he asked the two gospel-obedient disciples, “Sirs, what must I do to be saved?” (At 16:30). So what would be the first thing an idolatrous religionist be told to do to be saved? He had already heard about Jesus through the teaching of the gospel through song (See Ep 5:19). So the two evangelists instructed, “Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and you and your household will be saved” (At 16:30).

Belief is the foundation upon which one identifies that he understands that salvation depends on the Lord Jesus Christ. The jailor was not taught a system of theology in order to be saved. He was not asked to memorize a list of scriptures. He was not instructed in “scriptural assemblies.” Neither was he given an outline of doctrine of the “true church.” The gospel was the center of his belief, and thus the motivation that provoked Him to respond to the Lord Jesus Christ. And so that same hour of the night his belief was turned into action as God through the Lord Jesus Christ went into action for him at the cross (At 16:33). If we assume that belief in the gospel is sufficient for one to be saved apart from obedience to the gospel, then the belief is cheap. It is as James said ... a dead faith! (Js 2:26).

Jesus would say the following to those “believers” who do not the will of the Father: “Then Jesus said to those Jews who believed in Him, ‘If you continue in My word, then you are truly My disciples. And you will know the truth [of the gospel], and the truth [of the gospel] will make you free’” (Jn 8:31,32). It is not belief alone that sets one free. It is the gospel. It is obedience to the gospel that inspires us to continue in the word of God. In obedience to the gospel in baptism one is set free from sin in order to begin a new gospel life in Christ.

If one would seek to trust in his own belief, without obedience, then his salvation is based on himself, not the gospel. Belief is from within an individual. Gospel is something that was done for us two thousand years ago. For this reason, cheap belief cannot be substituted for obedience to the gospel in reference to our salvation. It cannot because “faith only” cannot be an easy way out of joining with Jesus on the cross, in the tomb, and in a resurrection that we might walk with Him in newness of life (See Rm 6:3-6).

GOSPEL VERSUS SELF

When people hear and obey the gospel of Jesus, they do not respond with hopes of getting something, but in getting rid of something. And that which they seek to rid themselves of is self and sin. In answer to the people on Pentecost being cut to the heart because the message of the gospel that convicted them, there was only one answer that Peter could give. They had to relinquish themselves to the sin-washing blood of Jesus (At 2:38). This was the answer that Ananias gave to Saul when he too was convicted by the loving heart of God for him through Jesus: “And now why are you waiting? Arise and be baptized and wash away your sins, calling on the name of the Lord” (At 22:16).

Those who seek to come to Jesus with narcissistic (self-centered) attitudes will never find the cross of self-sacrifice. The self-oriented person has a difficult time accepting the selfless Jesus on the cross. The religious narcissist is like the Pharisee who “stood and prayed thus with himself, ‘God, I thank You that I am not as other men ...’” (Lk 18:11). Those who are cut to the heart because they have realized the futility of their own self-righteous religiosity will be as the tax collector who revealed his contrite spirit by not standing forward with a presumptuous attitude. The one who has been cut to the heart with the gospel will respond to the gospel while beating his chest, and saying, “God be merciful to me a sinner!” (Lk 18:13).

There was a great deal of chest beating on the day of Pentecost, for the gospel beats out of us our presumptuous self-righteousness. Self-righteousness moves us to think that we can see. It makes us feel comfortable in our religiosity. When Jesus spoke of the religious leaders of Israel, the Pharisees, He identified them as we fail to define ourselves in our self-deception of religion: “They are blind leaders of the blind” (Mt 15:14). The problem with the self-righteous is that “they being ignorant of God’s righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God” (Rm 10:3).

The problem with religion is that it always blinds one to his or her need for the sanctification of the gospel blood that flows from the cross. When one feels self-sanctified in his own religious performances, he feels little need for the sanctification of the gospel. But of the blind, Jesus continued, “Woe to you blind guides ... fools and blind men” (Mt 23:16,17). When we think we can find our own way, the gospel says no way.

We must never forget that religion blinds the religionists, and the one who is a blind religious leader, continues to lead his blinded followers to destruction (Lk

6:39). The blinded are so led because they do not have a love for the truth of the gospel (2 Th 2:10-12). Religion inspires one to think that he spiritually sees, but he is actually blinded by his own self-righteous religiosity. Religion distorts our spectacles through which we seek to see clearly the gospel of Jesus.

The gospel makes the honest and sincere realize that he or she is blinded in self-righteous religiosity. Gospel digs deep into our hearts in order to convict us of our total inability to make ourselves right before God. What Peter preached on the day of Pentecost opened the eyes of those honest religionists who for all their lives thought that they could see through their legal Jewish religion. But when they were confronted with the gospel of the sacrificed incarnate Son of God, the truth was revealed that they were struggling in the futility of religious self-justification according to law and religious traditions of Judaism. They then realized their struggle and the burden of Judaism. Their only response could be, “What will we do?”

The Pentecost audience realized that they needed to do something, for they finally understood that their own self-sanctifying Judaism could not give them freedom from sin and bring them into fellowship with God. In fact, Peter’s message of the gospel revealed that it was adherence to their religious leaders that encouraged them to crucify the Hope of Israel. They realized that for too long they had followed the way of the religious leaders when they should have been following the way of God.

The gospel makes us realize that the more intense we practice the rites of our religion, the further we move away from God. In order to protect the religion of their heritage (Judaism), the people to whom Peter and the apostles spoke on Pentecost were about six weeks before, driven by their religious leaders to crucify the One whom they considered to be a rebel against Judaism. But the very One who was sent by God into the world to show the way to freedom from their futile efforts of self-sanctifying religiosity, and to bring them again into fellowship with the God of love, was crucified at their will. We can only imagine the shock that went through their souls as they stood there that day convicted of their crime against their only hope of being delivered from themselves.

FREEDOM FOR CAPTIVES

Gospel makes one realize the predicament of our own religious inability. It took the Holy Spirit two books of inspired instruction to bring the Jewish Christians out of the quagmire of their former religion of self-justification through works. In Romans He focused on our need for grace. “For if by the offense of one many died, much more the grace of God and the gift by grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, abounded to many” (Rm 5:15). “And if by grace [we are saved], then it is no more by works [of self-righteous religion]” (Rm 11:6).

In Galatians the Holy Spirit focused on the futility of religious self-justification. In both books (Romans and Galatians), the gospel was the only answer to man’s dilemma of being unable to be reconciled before God. At the time the books were written, some tried to bring into their gospel living their self-sanctifying works. But in doing so, they ended up with a mixture of religion that was more dangerous than idolatrous paganism. It was thus “another gospel” wherein some Judaizing teachers thought they would graft together law-keeping circumcision and other religious rites, with the true gospel of freedom in Christ. In doing so they thought that they could enjoy the benefits of the gospel of grace, but at the same time, carry on with some of the self-sanctifying traditions of their religious heritage (See Gl 1:6-9). But the Holy Spirit concluded the end of their efforts with the words, “You have been severed from Christ, you who seek to be justified by law. You have fallen from grace” (Gl 5:4).

And herein is the curse of religion. There are religious people throughout the world today who teach the gospel of Jesus, but stack on the gospel a host of religious rites, divisive names and titles, religious heritages, and ceremonies. All such religious law-keeping burdens are stacked under a favorite name to identify each particular sect. The result is that adherents to each religion are led about by the blind religious leaders who are schooled in the rites of each autonomous sect. Seminaries prepare diploma-certified gatekeepers to perpetuate the religion while all the adherents march to the tune of being faithful to the unique heritage of skilled pulpiteers.

It can only be the preaching of the simple gospel of the cross, resurrection, ascension and reign of King Jesus that will deliver us from the bondage of our own religiosity. The gospel of Christ produces only Christians, not some favorite brand of Christian. It may be comfortable to live in the security of the religion of one’s heritage, but those on the Pentecost Sunday of Acts 2 realized that the Jews’ religion of their heritage was a futile attempt of self-sanctification before God. They realized that their religion needed to be swept away through the light of the gospel of Jesus who paid the price for all of us in order that we be redeemed once again into the fellowship of a loving God.

When we finally understand the gospel of the God who “so loved the world through His Son,” then we will easily fill our souls with more of Him and less of ourselves. It is the gospel that opens the door for us to fall in love with God, because He first loved us. And when we fall in love with God through the gospel of Jesus, then it is only natural to fall in love with the lost whom we seek to bring into the fellowship of the God of love. When we see sincere and honest people in the bondage of religion we are driven to them with the gospel of liberation. It is for this reason that those who are not seeking to preach the love of God to the lost, have lost their love of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. True gospel-obedient believers can identify those who are in the bondage of religion. Subsequently, true gospel-obedient disciples of Jesus are driven by love to set the captives free. Such was the mission of Jesus: “When He ascended on high, He led captivity captive ...” (Ep 4:8).

Chapter 11

GOSPEL RELATIONSHIPS

There is a vast difference between the relational fellowship of the saints of God and those of a religious social club. The revelation of this difference lies at the heart of 1 John 1:3:

That which [the incarnational Son of God] we have seen and heard we declare to you so that you also may have fellowship with us, and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ.

This is the biblical definition of our relationship with God and with one another. John prefaced this statement with the declaration of the incarnational Word:

For the life was manifested and we have seen and bear witness and show to you that eternal life that was with the Father and was manifested to us (1 Jn 1:2).

John wanted to focus the attention of his readers on the “incarnational Word” with which he had commenced his epistle:

That which was from the beginning, that we have heard, that we have seen with our eyes, that we have looked [Gr., gazed] upon and our hands have handled, we proclaim concerning the Word of Life (1 Jn 1:1).

A more clear statement in any language could not have been made that explains the fellowship (relationship) of the saints with God and one another. The saints’ relationship with one another is a fellowship that is based on the gospel fact that “in the beginning was the Word ... and the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us” (Jn 1:1,14). And since all the saints have obeyed the gospel of this incarnate Word, then He, not ourselves, is always the foundation of our relationships with one another. There can be no other better foundation for true Christian relationships.

Christians are drawn together because of their common obedience to the incarnational offering of the Word of Life on the cross, His burial for our hope, resurrection, and His present reign over all things. Connection (fellowship) with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit through our common obedience to this gospel is what establishes our relationship with God and one another. Our obedience to the gospel of the incarnational Son of God is the impetus, the foundation, the eternal bond of fellowship that we have with the eternal Word of Life, and thus, the guarantee of living forever in His presence. The Christians’ relationships with one another is far beyond the relationship of friendship.

We hear a great deal today about relationships in the religious world. Religions throughout the world have invented every possible stimulus to produce relationships among the members of their respective churches. We have heard on numerous occasions the statement that “Christianity is about relationships.” And, it is. However, are the relationships of religion truly based on the incarnational and resurrected Word of Life that the members have obeyed in their burial and resurrection with the Word of Life? Or, are they manufactured relationships through relational encounters of the members with one another through food, parties and games in order to enhance friendships?

If our relationships with one another are not first based on our obedience to the gospel of the Word of Life, then we will become a religious social club when we come together in those meetings in which we seek to produce friendships. If our relationships are simply fabricated and maintained by the art of human relational fun and games, then the gospel soon passes from being the primary purpose for which we come together with one another. We must remember that the relationships that gospel-obedient Christians have with one another goes far beyond friendships. There is something much deeper in the relationships of gospel-obedient disciples than having “good buddies,” or being faithful in attendance at the local church social club.

The bond of the relationships that gospel-obedient disciples have with one another is not initially based on their friendships with one another. John clarified that we have a relationship (fellowship) with one another because of our common obedience to the gospel of the Word of Life. Paul explained that “by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body” (1 Co 12:13). And because baptized disciples are members of one body, they organically function as a body of relational members (See 1 Co 12:15-27).

Cult members have strong relationships with one another. They are driven together because of their great respect for, or fear of, the leader of the cult. Religions often lean toward cultism in the sense that the “pastor” is the attraction of the hour of assembly and center of reference for the faith of the members. Assemblies that are generated and maintained around a dynamic personality can never be the relational fellowship that is so natural with gospel-obedient saints.

Gospel-obedient saints are drawn to one another because of their common obedience of the gospel of the Word of Life. They are relational before they show up at any assembly that is designed to promote relationships. In other words, the relationships that Christians have with one another are divinely generated, not humanly manufactured. If one simply wants to be a co-religionist with other religionists in a common religious social club, then he can simply “join the church of his choice.” But when one joins himself to Jesus through obedience to the gospel, he is added by God to a family of gospel-obedient disciples (At 2:47).

Religionists assemble in order to experience either a relational or experiential event that would enhance their relationships with one another. But gospel-obedient saints come together in assembly because they have established a relationship (fellowship) with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit through their obedience to the gospel.

They were baptized in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit into a covenant relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Mt 28:19). Their motivation for assembly, therefore, is not to establish a greater relationship (fellowship) with one another and God, but to celebrate the fact that they already have a gospel-obedient relationship with one another and God because they have all been baptized into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Their individual addition to the body of members has brought them into a relationship of all gospel-obedient members of the family of God.

It is for this reason that we question the assembly of those who have come together with little desire to celebrate the gospel through the Lord's Supper. By this we mean that those who assemble on the first day of the week and fail to partake of the communal (fellowship) Supper of the incarnational Word of Life, have either forgotten, or never established the purpose for which the saints assemble in the first place. If we assemble without the Supper, then we are simply renewing our friendships with one another. Our assembly has become no different than the assembly of the local "Rotary Club," but in a religious atmosphere. If our purpose is simply to come together with the saints in order to reestablish our relationships, then we have become a religious social club that can celebrate nothing greater than our friendship with one another. If we have come together to fulfill our narcissistic desire to enjoy a Sunday-morning entertainment event, then we have failed to come together for the purpose of honoring the incarnational Son who came in the flesh in order to establish our covenant relationship with Him.

Saints who come together simply to reestablish relationships, experience an emotional event, or simply out of obedience to law, have not yet understood the purpose for the saints' assembly. If they have lost their way in this matter, then they are not drawn in attendance to the Table of the Lord. Their assembly simply becomes an attendance to a Hollywood experience. If Jesus does not take center stage for our assemblies, then our assemblies have become narcissistic productions in order that we "get something out of the Sunday morning event." Those who fail to show up at the Table of the gospel have identified themselves to have lost their motivation by the gospel of Jesus.

The early disciples came together in a relational manner in order to experience together the celebration of the Word of Life. It was this Word that the early apostles handled, touched and gazed upon. Because of their relationship (fellowship) with the Father through the incarnational Son, the saints came together to remember and celebrate the incarnational sacrifice and risen Word who came down out of heaven into this world in order to take us out of this world into heaven. The saints in Ephesus remembered and celebrated this gospel event every first day of the week in a fellowship meal that surrounded the Supper of the Lord (At 20:7).

The "breaking of bread" among the early disciples was a fellowship meal that they enjoyed with one another in their remembrance of the blood and body of the Lord. The Holy Spirit reminded the Corinthian saints that their participation in the feast was a relational (fellowship) experience.

The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not the fellowship of the blood of Christ? The bread that we break, is it not the fellowship of the body of Christ? (1 Co 10:16).

Because of their lack of consideration for one another, the Corinthians started to marginalize, or corrupt the Lord's Supper during this love feast. They turned the "breaking of bread" into a drunken occasion wherein they revealed their inconsiderate relationships for one another. Because their assemblies digressed into pleasing themselves (narcissism), they were not able to celebrate the Lord's Supper that should have revealed their fellowship with the Lord and one another (See 1 Co 11:20,21). In other words, their dysfunctional relationships with one another in assembly revealed that they had a dysfunctional relationship with the One who should always be the center of attraction for every assembly. They had lost their way for coming together for a love feast that should have been an expression of their love for one another (See 1 Co 11-14).

When we produce attractions to stimulate attendance, then our assemblies have moved away from a clear focus on the gospel. When people are not motivated in life by the gospel of Life, something other than the gospel must be the stimulus for them to attend the religious assemblies.

Gospel-obedient saints come together in assembly in order to celebrate the reason why they have a common bond with one another. It is because they have fellowship with one another through their common obedience to the gospel that they come together in assembly. Every Christian has a relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit because of his or her obedience to the gospel (Rm 6:3-6). And because this relationship has been established by obedience to the gospel, they have a relationship with one another before and after any assemblies.

Christians can come together because they are good friends. But their relationships with one another in friendship never has priority over their friendship with Jesus through their obedience to the gospel. In fact, the friendship (relationship) of Christians is based on Jesus, not simply on a relational acquaintance they might have with one another as neighbors in a community.

Those religious groups that minimized the observance of the Lord's Supper in their assemblies have lost their way, if indeed they ever knew the way to a gospel covenant relationship with the Father, Son and Holy Spirit through baptism into Christ. Because they have not focused on obedience to the gospel, their assemblies have often become narcissistic Hollywood productions, religious parties as the situation in Corinth, or simply the observance of ceremonial rituals that bring some comfort to those who are ridden with guilt.

Unless the gospel is preached and obeyed, assemblies will always be religious ceremonial exercises or concert experiences. Unless the gospel of the incarnational Son of God is restored as the center of reference for assembly, the attendees will never realize the worshipful experience that results from an assembly that is focused totally on the resurrected and reigning Son of God who first brought them together in their common obedience to the gospel. They will never understand that Christians are about Christ, not about themselves. Their assemblies are center around Christ.

ATTACKING THE GOSPEL

If a Christian forsakes, or distorts in any way any part of the gospel, then he has delivered a death blow to the very heart of the existence of Christianity. If he remains religious in his attack, then he has turned away from being Christian to being a self-sanctifying religionist. If any part of the gospel message is either questioned, or denied, or disobeyed, then one leaves or distorts the very purpose for which the Son of God came into the world to reveal the gospel—to seek and to save the lost (Lk 19:10). If such attacks are made against the heart of the gospel, then one will lose his way as a disciple of the Son of God. In fact, he will simply cease being a disciple of the One who revealed the gospel to the world.

The Holy Spirit knew that such an apostasy would happen among some Christians in various areas of the world throughout history. He thus prepared some specific recorded cases in the New Testament where there were attacks made against the heart of the gospel. He recorded why and how some would lose their way, and thus cease to be witnesses in their communities that Jesus was the Christ and Son of the living God (See Mt 16:16-18).

While the apostles were still alive, there were some Christians who cut away part of the core of the gospel message. They were “saying that the resurrection is already past” (2 Tm 2:18). And by promoting this teaching, “they overthrow the faith of some” (2 Tm 2:18). The denial of the resurrection was one reason why Paul was on his way to Corinth. He was headed to the city in order to cut out of the fellowship of the church of God those who became arrogant and who attacked the gospel by denying the resurrection (See 2 Co 1:23; 10:1-18; 13:2,10).

There were those among the Corinthians who believed that the dead would not be resurrected. But if this were true, then why, Paul argues, would we ever be baptized in order to bury the old dead man of sin (1 Co 15:29)? Why would one be baptized to bury the old man of sin, if we in the future will not be raised to join Christ in eternal life (See Rm 6:3-6).

It was not coincidental, therefore, that Paul began 1 Corinthians 15—the New Testament chapter on the resurrection—with a brief definition of the heart of the gospel:

For I delivered to you first of all that which I also received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures, and that He was buried, and that He rose again on the third day according to the Scriptures (1 Co 15:3,4).

In obedience to the gospel, we connect with the atoning blood of Jesus when we are crucified with Him in repentance before being buried with Him in the waters of baptism (Rm 6:4). We are subsequently raised with Him in order to walk in newness of life (Rm 6:4). Therefore, “if we have been united together in the likeness of His [Christ's] death [in baptism], we will also be in the likeness of His resurrection” (Rm 6:5). We connect with the future resurrection when Jesus comes again when we are raised with Christ from the waters of baptism.

If one denies the resurrection in the end, then he has denied the reason we are buried and raised with Christ in the present. If one denies this part in our obedience to the gospel, then he has denied the totality of the gospel! Why would the Son of God ever leave the comforts of eternity in heaven in order to die on an “old rugged cross” for our sins if there were no resurrection in the future? Why would one even be raised from the grave of water with Jesus if there were no such thing as a resurrection from the dead?

One is a Christian because he or she has followed Jesus to the cross, and from a grave of water, to the promise of a bodily resurrection in the future by being raised with Jesus from the waters of baptism. In this response to the gospel of Jesus, one has obeyed the gospel. It is for this reason that Christians are encouraged, motivated and compelled to both obey and preach the gospel to others (See 1 Pt 4:17).

When we bring into doubt any part of the message of the gospel, or response to it, then we deny the reality of the gospel. We have left the motivation of our first love, and thus, our motivation to seek and save the lost! Any doubt or denial of the resurrection of both Jesus, and ourselves in the future, cuts the heart out of the gospel. Christians are believers to be pitied for their faith if there is no resurrection of the body when Jesus comes again (1 Co 15:19). If there is no bodily resurrection when Jesus comes, then we lose our motivation to take the message of the gospel into all the world (See Mk 16:15,16).

We thus preach and obey the “gospel connection” (baptism) of Jesus as necessary in order to enjoy the coming resurrection from the dead. We are not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus’ atoning death and bodily resurrection (Rm 1:16). Neither are we ashamed of proclaiming the mandate of the Holy Scriptures that one must connect with the gospel of Jesus through immersion into Jesus’ death, burial and resurrection. If we would be ashamed of this connection, then we would reveal to the world that we actually have little faith in the power of Jesus’ atoning death and bodily resurrection.

We must never lead ourselves to believe that the power unto salvation is simply in our own belief in the gospel. Neither is our salvation in a legal action of baptism in water. The power unto salvation is the gospel of Jesus’ atoning sacrifice and resurrection (1 Co 1:18). When we are responsive to the gospel by baptism into Christ, then we connect with the atoning death of Jesus in order that our sins be washed away (At 22:16). It is through this obedient connection that we are raised with Him in anticipation of the resurrection of the dead when He comes again (See Jn 5:28,29). In order to connect with the power of the gospel, therefore, one must go to the cross, grave, and then experience a resurrection with Jesus when we come forth from the waters of baptism.

LOSING THE OBJECTIVE

In another book before the writing of the book of Revelation (1 John), the apostle John prepared us for the correct interpretation of the historical “fall” of the disciples in Ephesus that he recorded in Revelation 2:1-7. But first listen to these words from the epistle of 1 John:

In this the love of God was manifested to us, that God sent His only begotten Son into the world so that we might live through Him. In this is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us and sent His Son to be the atoning sacrifice for our sins (1 Jn 4:9,10).

This is gospel! God demonstrated “His love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rm 5:8). He did this because “He so loved the world” (Jn 3:16). God’s gospel love for us generates in our hearts the same response toward those who have not heard and obeyed the gospel. As God demonstrated His love toward us who were lost, we must demonstrate our love for the lost by either personally taking or sending the gospel to them. As God moved beyond “staying in heaven” in His love for us, we must move beyond our comfort zones in order that others will somehow hear and obey the gospel the gospel.

Because we so love the souls of others, we are moved out of our comfort zones in order to share the gospel with the lost. It was God revealing His heart for us through Jesus that motivates our hearts to go to the lost. John wrote in the context of 1 John 4, “We love because He first loved us” (1 Jn 4:19). In other words, we love the lost because our Father first loved us in our state of condemnation in sin (Rm 5:8). Because of this love, we are motivated to preach the gospel to the lost. Because God in His love for us sent to us the gospel message through His Son, we seek in missions to send the gospel message to others because of our love for them.

God revealed His heart of love for us through the sacrificial atonement of the cross in order that we might abide in His love after our resurrection from baptism to walk in newness of life. There could never have been a more glorious message of hope for mankind. We are motivated to love the lost because we have been loved at the cross. Preaching the gospel to the lost, therefore, is our first love! It is for this reason that those who are not evangelistic toward the lost, or do not support the gospel in missions to the lost, have lost their love for the souls of the lost. They have left their first love of the gospel that was poured out for them from the heart of God. Since their hearts have grown cold in reference to lost souls, they have lost their motivation to preach the gospel of love to the world. They are no longer excited about sowing the seed of the kingdom, because they have lost their excitement about the spiritual needs of the lost.

There is more to the lack of an evangelistic spirit than simply not doing evangelism. It is a problem of the heart. Those who have no heart for evangelism can be evangelistic out of law and duty. They can be such out of duty to fulfill a “law of preaching the gospel to the lost.” But obedience to law in reference to being evangelistic betrays one’s heart. It reveals that the gospel is not the motivation of one’s heart to love the lost.

The gospel-motivated disciple is evangelistic. He does not do evangelism out of duty. He is evangelistic simply because he cannot be any other way. He is evangelistic by life-style. The love of God that dwells in his heart explodes with the joy of the gospel message because he walks in gratitude for his own salvation. It is for this reason that those who are not evangelistic have a heart problem. They have lost their love for the lost because they have lost their appreciation for the loving grace of God that came into their lives through their obedience to the gospel. Therefore, in order to restore an evangelistic spirit among the believers, we must focus on the gospel of grace that was evangelistically manifested toward us through the incarnational offering of Jesus. This is the mind of Christ (See Ph 2:5-11).

LOSING OUT ON LOVE

The Christians in Ephesus lost their love for the lost. As the lost to whom God had demonstrated His love through the cross, the first generation of disciples in Ephesus initially responded to the gospel of love. But as the years went by they eventually lost the gospel motivating love to preach the gospel to the lost. By the time Revelation was written by John, they had become faithful religionists who carried on with their “Christian” heritage, but the very core of their existence as Christians passed away. They left their gospel-motivated faith and went back into a works-oriented faith of self-sanctification.

In the beginning of the gospel in Ephesus, the first converts started out with a big bang of evangelistic enthusiasm. The gospel seriously moved them to obedience of the gospel. However, at least thirty years later their children lost this vibrant love of the gospel. From Acts 19 to the writing of the book of Revelation at the end of the first century, something went tragically wrong between their beginning and imminent ending as the lampstand for our Lord in Ephesus.

The historical setting of the Ephesian disciples at the time of the writing of Revelation may help in understanding where they went wrong. We must understand first that there were groups of disciples meeting in homes throughout the area of Ephesus. Regardless of where they were assembling on Sunday morning, they were still the one united church of Ephesus (Rv 2:1). Their assemblies did not identify them as the church of Ephesus. For this reason, Jesus did not address them according to some supposed dynamic assemblies by which they compared the assembly of one group with another. Their problem was collective as the saints in all of Ephesus. This may answer some of the reasons why they went collectively wrong. In their house fellowships they became so engaged with themselves that they forgot the lost. They ignored the rest of Asia and the world beyond.

We need to go back to their beginning in order to understand their imminent ending at the time John wrote. At the end of his second mission journey, Paul had picked up Aquila and Priscilla in Corinth and dropped them off in Ephesus on his way to Jerusalem (At 18:1-3,18,19). Ephesus was subsequently given an injection of gospel-obedient and evangelistically-oriented leadership to counter the religious idolaters of the culture.

When Paul returned to the city on his third mission journey about a year later, he initially contacted about twelve disciples who were meeting in their homes. Since they knew only the baptism of John, we would assume that they had been meeting faithfully in their homes from the time of the ministry of John the Baptist that occurred over twenty-five years before Paul encountered them on this third mission visit (At 19:1-7). Their ability to remain as disciples of John for so long in a society of idolatry may give us some insight into how strongly they had bonded with one another as a group. In fact, they may have bonded so strongly that they felt comfortable with themselves, and thus, felt no desire to reach outside their group with what knowledge they had of the Messiah.

While in Ephesus on his third mission trip, Paul went to work. He taught in the synagogue of the Jews for three months. He reasoned daily in the school of Tyrannus for two years (At 19:9,10). In all, he worked in the city for about three years (At 20:31). His leadership in teaching inspired the disciples to be mission-minded, for “all those who dwelt in Asia heard the [gospel] word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks” (At 19:10).

The result of the evangelistic preaching of the gospel by Paul, Aquila and Priscilla, and later Apollos, was overwhelming. The local Jews finally understood the heart of God that was revealed through the Messiah—who was, they came to realize, the Son of God. And the Greeks, they burned their foolish fetishes and religious magic books (At 19:19). “Fear fell on them all and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified” (At 19:17). The gospel message produced fear in the hearts of those religionists who came “confessing and disclosing their practices” (At 19:18). This fear was both a motive for their own obedience, as well as the stimulus for their missions into all Asia. They were motivated to sow the gospel seed of the kingdom in all Asia because they realized that there was no salvation outside Christ (At 4:12). They realized that people must obey the gospel in order to wash away their sins (At 22:16). And in order for people to obey the gospel, they must preach the gospel.

We can only imagine the evangelistic fervor of every disciple in Ephesus in those early days who joined with the evangelistic outreach of the early leaders to preach the gospel both in Ephesus and all Asia. The houses of Christians throughout the region of Ephesus were filled with former idolatrous worshipers who obeyed the gospel. The gospel was preached, and the gospel was obeyed as every river in and around Ephesus rippled with waves from men and women going down into the water in order to bury old dead men.

Resurrections from water were the occasion of rejoicing as Christians throughout the area witnessed the fruit of the preaching of the gospel. Former faithful Jews who had maintained their allegiance to God through Moses, responded in obedience to the gospel of the incarnate Son of God. The disciples also loved their idolatrous neighbors, and subsequently, they preached the message of the gospel to them. The gospel message moved them to preach the gospel to an entire city and all Asia. It was a glorious time in the history of the church as the gospel found receptive hearts in Ephesus, and then spread into all Asia. In those early days of their history as new Christians, their first love came to life and was revealed in every body of water surrounding Ephesus. They truly emulated the heart of God who so loved the world that He sent His Son into the world with the message of the gospel (Jn 3:16).

But as the years went by, “church heritage” eventually kicked in and enthusiasm cooled. The influence of the works-oriented religion of Judaism seemed to have taken the children of the first converts into a spirit of works-oriented religiosity. We do not know all the details, but something went very wrong over a period of at least thirty years from the dynamic beginning in Acts 19 to the time when the Eternal Judge pronounced the judgment words of Revelation 2:4: “*Nevertheless, I have this against you, that you have left your first love.” Tragic!

The Ephesians started out as gospel-motivated disciples meeting in their homes throughout the region of Ephesus. They also moved in missions even beyond their borders to all Asia. But the flaming fire that first burned in their hearts turned into a lost love in the latter end of their existence as the “church of Ephesus.”

The parents failed to pass on to their children a heritage of dedicated missions. It seems that they were content to fellowship with themselves in the confines of their own homes while the rest of the world remained lost. We have seen the same today as attendees sit comfortably in their own church sanctuaries singing “send the light,” when all they are doing is “sittin’ tight.”

Nevertheless, the Ephesians were doing some good things among themselves in order to continue their heritage as the church. We must not forget that Jesus addressed them in Revelation 2 as the “church of Ephesus” (Rv 2:1). They could still be considered the church of Christ, but only on one condition: “Remember from where you have fallen, and repent and do the first works” (Rv 2:5). If they did not repent and restore, Jesus proclaimed, “*I will come to you quickly and will remove your lampstand out of its place—unless you repent” (Rv 2:5). They could continue to enthrall themselves with themselves with works for themselves, but their influence for the gospel light of Jesus in Ephesus would naturally be extinguished if they did not repent and restore the first works. We must always remember that a church house full of assembled religionists will always continue long after the lampstand is removed. Even if their works-oriented faith gives them a great name in the city, they will be considered a “dead horse church” if they do not revive their love for the gospel, and the lost to whom the gospel must be preached.

The Ephesian disciples had “fallen,” and in order to be identified as the church in the future who represented the Son of God, they had to return to the days when the gospel of the love of God burned hot in their souls. They had to restore the first works. They had to remember and resurrect their former gospel-motivated evangelistic works, and once again restore their mission outreach to the world.

After His complements for their existing “works-based church programs,” Jesus pronounced His judgment. He knew their existing legal-based works, labor and patience. They had persevered through persecution in the past and been patient to maintain their identity with Christ in the present (Rv 2:2,3). Without failing, they carried on with their works-based programs in the name of Jesus (Rv 2:4). However, it seems that over the years they established a system of legal-oriented, and thus self-sanctifying religious works for Jesus’ “name’s sake.” It seems that they were caught up in their works-oriented programs to the point that they forgot the purpose of their Founder, to seek and to save the lost.

When Jesus commanded, “do the first works,” He did not mean to establish more legal-oriented good-work programs for themselves. He meant that they needed to do their first evangelistic works that led directly to the saving of the lost. He meant that they needed to do their former mission outreach to their neighbors, to all Asia, and the world.

Their behavior indicated that they had forgotten the motivation of the core of their faith. They continued to work in the name of Jesus, but they left the very heart of what brought them into existence as disciples of Jesus many years before. They “left,” or “lost” their first love. They left their gospel motivation, replacing it with self-sanctifying legal works that focused on themselves. As a result, they may have simply digressed into an assembly-oriented churchianity wherein they were content with themselves.

The first thing that we must do when we realize that we have lost our first love for the souls of men, is to confess the fact that we are no longer evangelistic. We are no longer representing Jesus and the gospel in our community. We are no longer preaching the gospel both locally, and in missions, to “all Asia.”

Churches that have no local evangelistic zeal have lost their first love. If they have no local evangelistic zeal, then certainly they have no concern for preaching the gospel to the world. These are churches that Jesus would exhort by saying that they need to repent and restore the first gospel-based faith that would move them first into their own community, and also to “all Asia.” Ephesus needed to remember that lampstands can always be removed. If there is no preaching of the gospel light of Jesus in our community, then the light of the gospel lampstand has gone out.

GOSPEL MOTIVATION

If 1 John 4:19 is any commentary on Revelation 2:4—where Jesus rebuked the Ephesian disciples for losing their first love—the love that they left was their gospel love for the lost that was motivated by God’s gospel love for them (See Rm 5:8). They forsook their personal evangelistic outreach locally, and subsequently, their mission outreach to all Asia. They were no longer a center from which the gospel was preached to the world. In comparison to the problem that prevailed in Ephesus, it is easy to identify similar “Ephesian churches” today who focus on themselves through dynamic local programs for themselves, but they have forgotten the rest of the world. We must never forget how subtle it is to move from a gospel-based faith to a works-based religiosity. The move is subtle because we find satisfaction in the self-sanctification of our many programs of work.

The point is that the many programs of ministry must continue, but when churches leave the gospel motivation of God’s love for the lost, they turn to defending their heritage of a works-based faith in order to justify their identity as an active church. Any church that is self-absorbed in its own works-oriented programs ceases being mission-minded. They have forgotten that self-assurance as the church of God is sustained when we are doing God’s business. And God’s business is to seek and to save the lost (Lk 19:10). It seems that the Ephesian disciples had somehow diverted their attention away from the prime objective of doing God’s business to seek and to save the lost.

Such churches, as Ephesus, often resort to “good works” in order to busy themselves with themselves. In doing so they often seek to justify their lack of evangelistic outreach to their communities and to the world. On more than one occasion we have heard church leaders say, “We must first build up our local base, and then we will be able to preach the gospel to other areas.”

When churches are in decline, it is a common motivation to focus on developing more dynamic assemblies to “save our children.” Or, we hire an “entertainment minister” to keep our children busy with themselves. Or, we develop a dynamic Bible school program for ourselves, or more entertaining assemblies. Unfortunately, the introversion of focusing on ourselves leads to our continued decline. If we wake up one day and look back thirty years in our history, and see that we are the same today in numbers that we were then, then we know that we are in trouble. Though we may be the same in numbers locally, we must ask ourselves if we have started another “Ephesian movement” somewhere else in the world. If we have not, then we are truly a “dead horse church.” If the present behavior of the Ephesian church at the time of Jesus’ judgment in Revelation 2 continued, the church in Ephesus would eventually go out of existence. And it did.

“Ephesian churches” who have lost their first love often satisfy themselves to be self-sanctified before God through their many local works for themselves. They make themselves feel comfortable through dynamic works that are focused on themselves, but ignore the very purpose of why Jesus came into the world—to seek and to save those who are lost (Lk 19:10). Churches can often be so caught up in their own orchestrated assemblies, Bible school programs, Christian schools, etc. that they forget their prime mission, that is to seek and to save the lost.

We often become as Jesus judged the disciples in Pergamum, “You hold fast to My name and have not denied My faith” (Rv 2:13). But then they condoned wayward behavior as fornication that compromised the truth of gospel living. Subsequently, in the community it was as Jesus pronounced judgment on the disciples in Sardis: “I know your works [your dynamic inward focused programs], that you have a name that you live, but you are dead” (Rv 3:1). The pronouncement by Jesus, “but you are dead,” should send chills through the souls of Christians who think they are alive through their many works. Ephesus, Pergamum and Sardis had formerly been gospel-living churches in their communities and in all Asia. But by the time Jesus made His judgment of them in Revelation, they all were in need of repentance. They were “active churches” that were all in need of restoration because they left their first love.

When we find ourselves judgmental of others because of their lack of works-based programs, then we know that we have become as the self-sanctifying older brother in the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32). We are quick to judge others dead by the standard of our supposed faithfulness through our many works. While the younger wayward brother repented in remorse, we exalt ourselves to be self-righteous in our works-based faith of supposedly staying faithful to God.

We must always remember that an “active church” is not necessarily an evangelistic or mission-minded church. If no one is obeying the gospel either locally, or through mission-supported works into “all Asia,” then an “active church” will think that it is alive, when actually it is dead. Works-oriented churches are often as the Sardis church: “I know your works,” Jesus judged, “that you have a name that you live, but you are dead” (Rv 3:1).

We can perform many self-sanctifying works to make ourselves feel good about ourselves. However, if we have lost our way evangelistically, then Jesus would judge us to be dead disciples because the gospel is not being lived and preached and souls saved through obedience to the gospel locally and “all Asia.” If we are not loving local people into Christ as God loved us into His grace through His Son, then we are dead. We have forsaken the core motivation of the gospel message of the incarnate Son of God. We have in apostasy moved from being gospel-motivated Christians to works-oriented religionists who would justify immoral life-styles and gospel outreach through our own self-sanctifying works.

LOSING ONE ANOTHER

Herein possibly lies the paramount danger of the modern church. We know that the Ephesian disciples left their first love, but we are not told why or how. Maybe some speculation at this point would help. At least their history from beginning to imminent demise might aid us in understanding that we too can be found to have lost our first love.

If we assume the late date for the writing of the book of Revelation, this would place the state of spiritual affairs of the Ephesian disciples to exist sometime in the last part of the first century. If Revelation were written around A.D. 96, then those who were members of the body of Christ at that time were about forty years removed from those exciting days of evangelism that are recorded in Acts 18 & 19, which days existed with Paul's visit to the city in the latter 50s. Therefore, Jesus' address that they had left their first love was directed to the children, and possibly grandchildren, of those who were the fathers of their faith in the area of Ephesus, which fathers were the first converts.

In our speculations of the possible cause of their leaving their first love, we must not forget the other five churches of Asia that Jesus addressed who had other problems. Only the church in Philadelphia escaped any judgment by Jesus in reference to life-style problems from which they needed to repent (See Rv 3:7-12).

Because the other churches of Asia suffered from spiritual problems from which they needed to repent, we might conclude that the "mother church" of Ephesus, from which the other churches possibly came into existence when the gospel went forth into all Asia during Paul's three-year stay in Ephesus, failed in their "all Asia" responsibility to lead the way in living the gospel of Jesus.

It is apparent that the disciples in Ephesus suffered from a loss of love for the lost. It may have been that the house fellowships became autonomous from one another to the point that they fell out of love with the whole church of Ephesus. They failed to live the gospel in order to keep immorality out of their lives. The origin of the problem could have been with the parents. The children of these parents, who at the time John wrote, composed the saints who were living in Ephesus. We could assume that the parents who were first converted during the Acts 19 evangelistic euphoria, many of whom were dead at the time John wrote, did not pass on to their children the zeal of their original evangelistic spirit. Or possibly, by the time of the existence of the church in Ephesus the latter part of the first century, the church was composed of older members who had lost the zeal of their youth.

If this church followed the pattern of many churches in reference to their growth, they had an exciting period of growth in the first decade of their existence in Acts 19. But as time passed, growth slowed, and thus, the children of the early pioneers grew up in a "church atmosphere" wherein the evangelistic enthusiasm of the first years of the existence of the church had cooled. Forty years later when Revelation 2 was written, the generation that existed at the time had left the first love of the early church in Ephesus.

But there may have been other scenarios that caused their stagnant growth by the time John penned the words of Revelation. When Paul made his last visit through the area of Ephesus and called the leaders of the church of Ephesus together in Miletus, he reminded them, "Therefore watch, and remember that for a period of three years I did not cease to warn everyone night and day with tears" (At 20:31).

Paul realized that something serious was coming in the history of the church of Ephesus, something about which they needed to be warned. The members who were alive at the time of the writing of Revelation 2 certainly could not blame those who initiated the establishment of the church in Ephesus. Their forefathers had been warned that they could end up where they were spiritually at the time John wrote. They needed, therefore, to take ownership of their own loss of the first love upon which the church of Ephesus was built.

It is interesting to notice where Paul said their fall would originate. In the verse preceding Paul's statement on the Acts 20 visit, he prophesied, "From your own selves will men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away the disciples after themselves" (At 20:30). Paul did not reveal the "perverse things" that would be spoken. However, one thing was clear, and that was that narcissistic leaders would seek to establish autonomous groups after themselves. They would speak those "perverse things" that would lead to the rise of independent, autonomous churches in the area of Ephesus who would have little to do with one another. "Pastors" (shepherds) would claim a portion of the flock, and subsequently reign over them with autocratic lordship.

If this were indeed the case, then we must remember that the church in Ephesus was initially started with the members meeting in different homes throughout the city. At that time they were the one united church of Ephesus, though they assembled in the homes of the members throughout the city. They were the one multiple-assembly church of Ephesus. At the time John wrote, Jesus even addressed them still as the one church of Ephesus in Revelation 2:1.

Jesus viewed the disciples in Ephesus from heaven down, whereas by the time John wrote the members viewed the church in Ephesus from the bottom up, that is, from their autonomous behavior of being independent from one another. Nevertheless, though the members were meeting in different homes at the time Jesus addressed them in Revelation 2, He still viewed them as His one body in Ephesus, regardless of whose house in which each member sat on Sunday morning.

By A.D. 61,62, when Paul wrote the epistle to Ephesians, something was at this time starting to present itself as divisive. What he prophesied in the Miletus meeting of Acts 20 was coming to pass by the time he wrote the Ephesian letter. We see this in Paul's exhortation to the members of the church in Ephesus at the time he wrote the Ephesian letter: "... walk worthy of the calling with which you were called ... being eager to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.... There is one [universal] body" (Ep 4:1,3,4).

At the time of the writing of the letter to the Ephesian church in A.D. 60,61, Paul saw the fulfillment of his prophecy that they would separate from one another into their own autonomous groups as he stated in Acts 20:30. Some commentators believe that this is possibly the meaning of their lost love by the time Jesus addressed them in Revelation 2:4. They had ceased "forbearing one another in love" (Ep 4:2), and subsequently divided into autonomous groups that became anonymous from one another.

This could have been possible because the city of Ephesus was a city of at least a quarter million people. It would be easy in such a city for the disciples to lose contact with one another. After all, the twelve disciples that Paul found a year later when he returned to the city after leaving Aquila and Priscilla in the city, were unknown to Priscilla and Aquila (At 19:1,2). The couple were in the city approximate one year while Paul was gone, but still had no contact with the twelve disciples in order to instruct them further in gospel as they had instructed Apollos. Being separated from one another as groups would have been easy where there was a lack of communication. However, we would not assume that their loss of communication with one another predicated their loss of love for one another. They were simply a limited number of disciples in a large metropolitan area.

We could assume, however, that two problems would eventually prevail after Paul left the Acts 20 meeting with the elders in Miletus. These problems would produce the autonomous groups from among the numerous house fellowships throughout the region of Ephesus. First, those who would promote this autonomy would be narcissistic in seeking others to follow them. The "perverse things" were spoken by individual personalities who sought to surround themselves with disciples who would exalt them as their leader. It would have been the same as the problem among the house fellowships throughout the province of Achaia. Paul wrote of that situation, "... each one of you says, 'I am of Paul,' and 'I am of Apollos,' and 'I am of Cephas' ..." (1 Co 1:12). Paul's corrective response to this denominating of the body into autonomous groups was, "Is Christ divided?" (1 Co 1:13). We would assume, therefore, that Paul's prophecy in the Miletus meeting of Acts 20 was that there would be divisions into autonomous groups in the area of Ephesus. His prophecy had actually come to fulfillment by the time John wrote Revelation about forty years later.

The second problem for the division into autonomous groups revealed the narcissistic personalities of those who sought their own house church group they could control through lordship intimidation. This was illustrated by the behavior of Diotrephes. Diotrephes separated unto himself an autonomous group in this way because he loved to be first, just as Paul had prophesied that some shepherds (pastors) would assemble the disciples under their own control (See 3 Jn 9,10). Peter revealed the same spirit of lordship when he wrote to the disciples in the middle 60s who were "in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia [where Ephesus was located] and Bithynia" (1 Pt 1:1; 5:1-4).

It would be correct to say that the very exhortation to avoid lordship leadership about which Paul, Peter and John forewarned, had come to pass by the time Revelation was written. The disciples had lost their "first love" for one another by splitting into autonomous groups who called themselves after their respective "pastor." And in splitting into autonomous groups they lost their collective evangelistic outreach as one church.

When Jesus said that there would be no lordship leadership among His disciples, many of the early leaders failed to heed this warning (See Mk 10:42,43). Because they sought to be lords of the flock, they drew disciples away after themselves into autonomous house churches. The leaders loved to be preeminent among the disciples, and thus they became lords of their own autonomous flocks. We would assume that any leader who would seek to establish autonomous groups of disciples after themselves would be speaking "perverse things" to accomplish the denominationalism of the universal body of Christ.

Chapter 17

COMMON GOSPEL MISSION

When lordship leaders seek to be first among the disciples, they pass on the same spirit of lordship to young leaders who follow them. Since Paul's prophecy that some in the church in Ephesus would eventually becomes denominational with different autonomous groups throughout the region of Ephesus, we could assume that there was at least some competition between the autonomous groups. Such was certainly happening when John wrote of Diotrephes in 3 John 9,10.

We might even assume that when 3 John was written, John could have been in the region of Ephesus, which he was at the end of his life in exile on the island of Patmos off the coast of Ephesus (Rv 1:9). If indeed Diotrephes lived in the area of Ephesus, then this would certainly explain the character and behavior of those leaders about whom Paul prophesied would draw away disciples after themselves. Diotrephes could have been one of those shepherds. John wrote to Gaius of the behavior of Diotrephes, and thus explained the divisive environment of the house fellowships in his area when Diotrephes drew away disciples after himself:

Therefore, if I [John] come I will remember his deeds that he does, unjustly accusing us [the apostles and evangelists] with malicious words [“perverse things”]. And not content with that, he himself does not receive the brethren [evangelists], and forbids those who would. And he casts them out of the church [his assembly] (3 Jn 10).

If this was indeed the relationship among some of the brethren in Ephesus, then we can certainly understand why the disciples left their first love. When there is much dissension among the brethren, the brethren have little desire to work together in order to preach the gospel to the world. This is exactly what Diotrephes was promoting. He was discouraging his group over which he exercised dominance, to join any efforts to support cooperatively the traveling evangelists.

When the church in any region become independent autonomous groups, the resources of the members is restricted to the needs of the members themselves. The unfortunate consequence of several autonomous groups within a particular region is that they grow away from one another, and thus their focus turns on themselves and what works they can do for themselves to preserve their existence. In their introverted autonomy, they often find it difficult to work in financial fellowship as autonomous groups in order to send forth evangelists into the world (See Rm 10:14,15). Members in autonomous churches find it difficult to understand the organic function of the universal body of Christ. In heaven, Jesus views His body working together throughout the world as one body.

One of the dysfunctional behavioral practices of Diotrephes was not to receive the traveling evangelists. He wanted to shut down any evangelists, including the apostle John himself, from visiting the group, or groups, over which he exercised lordship. John referred to this behavior as evil (3 Jn 11).

As opposed to the mission-supporting work of Gaius (3 Jn 1-8), Diotrephes' behavior was contrary to the love of God to seek and to save the lost. If indeed Diotrephes lived in the area of Ephesus at the time John wrote the book of Revelation, then we can understand why there were problems among the Ephesian brethren concerning both their loss of love for one another as autonomous groups, as well as their diversion from loving the lost in all the world.

One of Satan's greatest weapons he uses against the church of our Lord is to encourage leaders to separate from one another by speaking “perverse things” (“malicious words”) about one another. He encourages such slander in order to discourage the members of the body from being the one universal body of Christ that universally functions as one.

When the church in any region is organically dysfunctional by the separating of members into autonomous groups that speak against one another, then the members have little interest to work together to preach the gospel to the lost. They become obsessed with their own individual programs to the exclusion of the universal body. Though in their own autonomous groups they may service their own needs with dynamic works, they often grow cold in their interest of world evangelism by their obsession with themselves. They will turn from converting the lost through the preaching of the gospel to preaching church in order to convert people into their own autonomous groups, or activate the disciples to become involved in a local “church program.” This seems to be what the problem was with the churches of Asia. Jesus complemented them in reference to their active works, but they were active in works to the exclusion of concentrating on gospel living and evangelism.

What happens in such scenarios is the case that was illustrated by Gaius. Gaius, as an individual, was mission-minded. He continued to do well in receiving and financially supporting the preaching of the gospel through traveling evangelists (3 Jn 3-8). John encouraged Gaius with the words, “Beloved, you do faithfully whatever you do for the brethren [visiting evangelists] and strangers” (3 Jn 5).

Because Gaius was in a situation where Diotrephes discouraged those groups over which he exercised control to cooperatively join in supporting the evangelists, John encouraged Gaius, “You will do well to support them [the evangelists] on their journey in a manner worthy of God” (3 Jn 6).

Diotrephes, on the contrary, hindered the missions in which Gaius was involved. He sought to discourage anyone in his autonomous group, or groups, from supporting those who had gone forth for the sake of Jesus' name. He evidently wanted to keep all the contributions at home in order to focus it on the needs of the local group over which he had preeminence.

Churches that are in a stagnant state of non-growth may content themselves with works among themselves, but they will never feel good about themselves until they repent and restore their good work of reaching out to their lost neighbors. Their repentance, however, must go far beyond their neighborhoods. In order to restore their self-esteem as disciples of the Son of God who left heaven for them, they must restore their missions to the world. As a united group of disciples they must have confidence in themselves that they can bring all the world into Christ if they seek to take Christ into all the world.

We have found that Christians that have no mission outreach do not feel good about themselves. If they do feel good about themselves without any mission outreach, then they have contented themselves with self-sanctifying good works for themselves. They have thus lost their way. They have lost their first love. They think they are alive, but they are dead in reference to preaching the gospel to the world.

THE LIVING DEAD CHURCH

Once upon a time, people kept strolling by this particular young man and saying to him, "Get off that horse!" Day after day, people kept instructing the young man with the same advice: "Get off that horse." And then one gentleman came by and said, "Get off that horse. It's dead!" What the young man needed was some advice as to why he needed to get off that dead horse. It was dead!

And so it is with some churches. They are long past dead. As the church in Sardis, they are dead horse churches that are going nowhere unless they repent. No matter how much one whacks on a dead horse church, it will not move. Death gives no response. Sometimes a church has been dead for so long that people have grown accustomed to the smell of death, and thus think it is quite alive. But no matter how much one individual keeps beating the dead horse church, it will not move. It is simply dead!

Dead horse churches are easy to identify. They can be identified by the fact that they have forgotten the mission of their Founder. Jesus identified His mission with the statement, "For the Son of Man has come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Lk 19:10). When a church is not preaching the gospel and baptizing people, it has lost its mission. It is a dead horse church.

Now we must be fair. The body of members of a dead horse church may be in an area where receptivity of the gospel is long gone. The members are riding out the storm of spiritual death in a community that has long ago grown cold to the gospel. However, being in such a predicament does not mean that a group has to be a dead horse church. If the church is actively supporting the preaching of the gospel in other regions of "all Asia" and the world, then it is not a dead horse church. The members are as Gaius who did not forget the mission of his Master. He financially supported evangelists who (1) "went forth for the sake of the Name" of Jesus. (2) He supported such gospel preachers because they did not take up contributions from the unbelievers in order to support themselves. (3) Therefore, Gaius financially supported such evangelists in order that he might be a fellow worker for the truth (3 Jn 7,8).

If a church is located in an unreceptive area, but is still supporting missions, then it is not a dead horse church. It is quite alive because the members have not forgotten the mission of their Master. But if the church is not preaching the gospel and baptizing anyone at home, or supporting the preaching of the gospel to other regions, then it is a dead horse church.

Dead horse churches have lost their way because they have lost their first love. And in the context of the Ephesian church, and in view of the phenomenal growth the members of this church had in their beginning, by the time John wrote the book of Revelation, they had become a dead horse church. They had left their first love (Rv 2:4). It was a time in their history, therefore, for them to "remember from where you have fallen, and repent and do the first works" (Rv 2:5). Dead horse churches must always repent. If they do not, then they are not a church of the Christ who came to this world to seek and to save the lost. They do not have the mind of Christ who left heaven on a mission to the cross for their sake (Ph 2:5-11). They are dead in reference to the work for which Jesus came into the world.

Some churches have been dead for so long that they do not sense the stench of death that surrounds them. These are often legal-oriented churches who have convinced themselves that if they perform a meritorious ceremony of worship every Sunday morning, then they are self-sanctified before God because of the legal performance of their assemblies. They have thus deceived themselves into thinking that they are “legally” alive through their self-righteous ceremonies of perfect law-keeping. But if people are not obeying the gospel, or the members are not reaching out in some way to the world with the gospel, then they are a dead horse church.

The worst case scenario is when a dead horse church deceives itself into thinking that it is alive. This was the church in Sardis. Remember what Jesus said of this church? “I know your works, that you have a name that you live, but you are dead” (Rv 3:1). Sardis was a walking dead church. They had movement that gave the pretense of being alive, but they were still a walking dead church.

Some churches think they are alive by having energetic assemblies from which people go forth exhorted and floating on an emotional cloud until the next appointed concert. But in their emotional euphoria no one is being baptized into the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus. None of the members are financially supporting the preaching of the gospel to the world. This is a church that thinks it is alive because of their theatrical performances every Sunday morning, or works-based faith in doing many “religious works” (See Mt 7:21-23). But it is a dead horse church, for it is not seeking and saving the lost through the preaching of the gospel. It has lost its way and forgotten the mission of its Founder to seek and to save those who are lost.

So what would Jesus advise a dead horse church? Simple. “Be watchful and strengthen the things that remain, that are ready to die, for I have not found your works completed before God” (Rv 3:2). There is hope for dead horse churches only if the members strengthen those things that still have some life in them. But if they do not strengthen those living parts, then they will continue on death row. Though those things are at the brink of death, every effort must be made to bring life back into even a whisper of breath in order that the church not die. If a dead horse church cannot be resuscitated through the power of the gospel, then it is gone. “Get off that horse!” The Holy Spirit would exhort, “Awake [be resuscitated] you who sleep and arise from the dead, and Christ will give you light” (Ep 5:14). But if a dead horse church is going nowhere, then one should continue doing what he or she should evangelistically do regardless of any opposition from a Diotrephes. Gaius sought the encouragement of John, and John advised Gaius to connect with Demetrius who would encourage him (3 Jn 12). If a restoration to focus on the gospel will not resuscitate a walking dead church, then it is truly dead, though there may be some staggering movement in the body.

A vibrant body of believers in Nigeria once determined not to be a “movement of dead horse churches,” which is actually an oxymoron. There is no such thing as a movement of dead horse churches. Dead horse churches move nowhere.

So this evangelistically-oriented group financially supported a Nigerian evangelist to move to Cape Town, South Africa. Within five years the evangelist had four groups established in four different areas of the Cape Peninsula. The members were thriving. People were being baptized and 150 workers of the four groups assembled regularly to inspire love and evangelistic outreach in the four targeted regions of Cape Town. In their sixth year, the missionary who was first sent from Nigeria worked on immigrating to either Cyprus or Canada in order to do the same. These folks had simply determined not to be dead horse churches.

If a dead horse church wakes up one day and reads Revelation 2:1-7, then the members need to read the warning of Jesus in Revelation 2:5:

Therefore, remember from where you have fallen, and repent and do the first works, or else I will come to you quickly and will remove your lampstand out of its place—unless you repent.

Chapter 19

KNOWING GOD

2 Thessalonians 1:8,9 is a most intriguing statement by the Holy Spirit in reference to the final coming of Jesus. Through the hand of Paul the Spirit revealed a very important concept in reference to the final judgment that Jesus will hand out when He comes again with His holy angels. It is not difficult to identify the specifics of the events surrounding the final coming. But what is significant is the identity of those who “will be pun- ished with everlasting destruction away from the presence of the Lord and away from the glory of His power” (2 Th 1:9). Notice in verse 8 those who will suffer this final calamity: “... those who do not know God and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.”

At first glance we might assume that there are two groups who will suffer the destruction of the judgment of the coming King. We might be tempted to interpret that the statement means that those who do not know God would be a specific group. This would certainly be true. And then the second group would be those who do not obey the gospel. But when considered in the context who God is, and our relationship with Him through obedience to the gospel, there can be only one group. This is the group of those who do not obey the gospel of the God who so loved the world. They do not obey because they never discover the heart of God who gave His only begotten Son.

The lengthy compound sentence of 2 Thessalonians 1 actually identifies those who had the opportunity to know the God of love. Their limited or unresponsive belief did not motivate them to obey the gospel of this God. These would be those who do not really know the God of love of the Bible. Therefore, in the context of the gospel message of love of this God, they do not obey the sacrificial death of the incarnate Son of God in order to experience the resurrection unto life.

Their refusal to obey the gospel reveals that they do not know the heart of God as it was revealed through the cross and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, they are not able to dwell for eternity in the presence of the God who so loved the world that He sacrificed His only begotten Son (Jn 3:16). They are not candidates for dwelling in a realm of love because on earth they revealed that they were not of a loving character.

A. The loving presence of God:

“He who does not love does not know God, for God is love” (1 Jn 4:8). This will be the eternal environment wherein the loving will dwell. In order to prove His nature before all men, John revealed that “the love of God was manifested to us, that God sent His only begotten Son into the world so that we might live through Him” (1 Jn 4:9). Love defines the presence of God into which all those who love God are destined to reside. If one is not of a nature of love, then certainly he or she forfeits the right to dwell in an eternal environment of love.

So John the apostle of love continued to explain, “Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another” (1 Jn 4:11). The deduction is obvious. “We love because He first loved us” (1 Jn 4:19). If we do not love, then certainly we do not know the God of love. Now notice carefully John’s definition of the presence of God about which Paul wrote in 2 Thessalonians 1:6-9: “And we have known and believed the love that God has for us. God is love, and he who dwells in love dwells in God and God in him” (1 Jn 4:16). Dwelling in the presence of the God of love, therefore, begins even before the final judgment. Love in our lives on earth qualifies us to dwell in the eternal presence of the God of love.

When Paul spoke of those who would be banished from the presence God, he was speaking of those who do not know, or obey, the God of love. Again, unloving people have forfeited their right to dwell eternally in the presence of love. And for this reason, John is as harsh as Paul when it comes to identifying with the love of God:

If anyone says, “I love God,” and hates his brother, he is a liar, for he who does not love his brother whom he has seen, cannot love God whom he has not seen (1 Jn 4:20).

If one cannot lovingly dwell in the presence of his needy brother whom he sees, then certainly he has given up his right to dwell in the presence of the God of love for eternity. Understanding this point opens the door into what Paul was revealing in 2 Thessalonians 1:6-9.

B. Knowing the God of love:

Those who do not know the God of love, are not candidates to dwell in the presence of God for eternity. They certainly will not respond to the gospel message of love that was revealed through the Son of God, through whom God so loved the world. This brings us to the mission of Jesus on earth, which mission included two things He wanted to accomplish: (1) Jesus wanted to reveal the God of love to the world. (2) He wanted to reveal the gospel through which those who would come to know the God of love would be motivated to connect with Him.

For these reasons John recorded the early ministry of Jesus. There is more to what John wrote in John 20:31 than simply an apologetic of who Jesus was. Jesus was certainly miraculously proved to be the Son of God. But there was more to the ministry of Jesus than proving that He was a miracle worker and great teacher. That which was more was meant to motivate within those who really believed who He was, and to respond to His gospel message. He was that message of love, and He called on all men to believe that He was the revelation of the God of love. He was God's gospel message into the world in order to move people unto obedience of the gospel.

Jesus' mission to reveal the God of love began with the revelation of what John later explained in more detail in 1 John 4. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son" (Jn 3:16). This is the God whom Jesus sought to reveal, and the God of the gospel we must know. If one truly knows the love that motivated God to send His only begotten Son into the world, then he will respond to the gospel that the God of grace offered to the world. We can state the point in simple, but precise terms: if one does not know the love of God, he or she will not be baptized into the death, burial and resurrection of God's love through Jesus. But if one truly knows the God of love, then certainly he or she will obey the gospel of love. There will be no argument about whether "baptism is necessary for salvation." There will be only obedience from the heart in response to the heart of God.

This thought is similar to the transformation of the heart of Israel that God worked through the national captivity of Israel. When the time came for Israel's returned from captivity, their hearts had been changed from rebellion in idolatry to submission. Before the day of their captivity, however, God prophesied of the changed heart that they would experience:

And I will give them a heart to know Me, that I am the Lord. And they will be My people and I will be their God. For they will return to Me with their whole heart (Jr 24:7).

Jesus came into the world to reveal the heart of God. He "was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (Jn 1:1). We would correctly assume, therefore, that "God in the flesh" (Jn 1:14) would reveal the God who remained in the spirit. The objective of the incarnation, therefore, was to reveal to the world the nature of the God who is spirit (Jn 4:24). Jesus came into the world as a revelation of the "world" in which He existed before His incarnation. But in reference to those who first received this revelation in the physical world, there was a problem. God was in the world through Jesus, but "the world did not know Him" (Jn 1:10). The world did not understand the One who walked among those who were of the nature of the world. Because many of those who were in the world were of worldly behavior, it was not possible for them to understand the nature of the God of love.

When John was baptizing in the wilderness, he said to those who were sent to him by the Pharisees, "There stands One among you whom you do not know" (Jn 1:26). It was not simply that they did not know of Him, but that they, because of their worldly spirit, would not know the loving nature of Him. Jesus once said to some worldly minded religionists, "But I know you, that you do not have the love of God in you" (Jn 5:42). Since this statement was made at the beginning of Jesus' ministry, He immediately identified those who would have a difficult time accepting Him as a representative from God. However, those who were not of the spirit of this world would eventually come to know Him, that He was the Christ, the Son of the living God of love (Mt 16:16).

When Nicodemus came to Jesus in the night, the light was coming on in his mind concerning who Jesus was. "'Rabbi,' Nicodemus stated, 'we know that You are a teacher come from God, for no one can do these signs that You do unless God is with him'" (Jn 3:2).

At the time Nicodemus came to Jesus, many others were beginning to realize that Jesus was more than a man. They were beginning to know the love of the God from whom He came. His mission into this world was not only to reveal the gospel, but also to reveal the God of love who sent the gospel into the world through Jesus. Jesus was both a revelation of the God of love, but also the bearer of the gospel. The revelation of the God of love through Jesus was to motivate people unto obedience of the gospel that Jesus revealed. Those who would know God through Jesus would obey the gospel.

C. Revelation of and obedience to the gospel:

In the final days of His ministry, Jesus lifted His eyes to heaven and prayed, "And this is life eternal, that they might know You, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom You have sent" (Jn 17:3). And herein is revealed the connection between the ministry of Jesus in His revelation of the gospel, and the God of love who sent the Messenger. Paul had revealed that those who do not obey the gospel will not reside in eternal life in the presence of God. In the preceding statement, Jesus said that eternal life is to know God and Jesus whom He has sent. The only conclusion is that in order to have eternal life one must be moved by who God is, and subsequently, desire to obey the God of love in order to eternally live in His presence. Knowing the God of love who was revealed through the incarnation of the Son in the flesh, therefore, should motivate one to obey the gospel that was revealed through the cross and resurrection.

Jesus came into this world, but many of the religious leaders at the time did not know Him because He represented in the flesh the loving God of heaven. At one time when Jesus was in the temple, He cried out to the multitudes who were gathered there, “*You both know Me and you know where I am from. And I have not come on My own, but He who sent Me is true, whom you do not know” (Jn 7:28). They knew of Jesus the man, but they did not know the Father who sent His Son into the world. The religious leaders did not know the God of love. John explained the reason for this:

*And this is the condemnation, that light has come into the world and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil. For everyone who does evil hates the light, and does not come to the light lest his deeds should be exposed (Jn 3:19,20).

Jesus was the light that came into the world (Jn 8:12). But if those of darkness came into the light, they would have to confess that their deeds were evil. And in reference to religious leaders, those leaders who do not know the Light of God will continue in their evil religious ways of darkness. False prophets will always turn away from the God of love simply because they do not desire that their evil religious practices that are followed by thousands, be exposed as evil to their gullible followers.

This explains what Paul meant in 2 Thessalonians 1:8,9 in reference to those who “do not know God.” If they loved the light of the love of God that was revealed through Jesus, then they would obey the gospel light of Jesus who revealed the light. But because they hated the Light, they refused to obey the gospel. What Paul was saying in the revelation of 2 Thessalonians 1 was that those who refuse to obey the gospel reveal that they seek to walk in the darkness of their own worldly ways. They could know of God, but they would not know God. The proof that one truly knows God is revealed in his or her obedience to the gospel. It is the same thought that Jesus stated in reference to false religious prophets:

Many will say to Me in that day, “Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Your name, cast out demons in Your name, and performed many wonderful works in Your name?” And then I will declare to them, “I never knew you. Depart from Me you who practice lawlessness.” (Mt 7:22,23).

These were religious people about whom Jesus spoke. They did all the glorious self-sanctifying religious works, but they refused to do “the will of My Father who is in heaven” (Mt 7:21). Every religious charlatan should seriously consider these words. Jesus spoke of religious people who would not do the will of the Father in obedience to the gospel in baptism because they did not know the heart of the God who sacrificed His own Son. They are thus as the Samaritans. Jesus said of them, “You worship what you do not know. We know what we worship, for salvation is from the Jews” (Jn 4:22).

There are many religious prophets among us today about whom Jesus would say as He said to the Pharisees, “You neither know Me, nor My Father. If you had known Me, you would have known My Father also” (Jn 8:19). If they had known the heart of God, then they would have responded to the Son of God who was the light of God in their midst. Therefore, those who obey the gospel are acknowledging that they know the one true and living God of love. And because of their obedience to the gospel, they are set free. Consider this when reading the words of Jesus in John 8:32: “And you will know the truth [of the gospel], and the truth [of the gospel] will make you free [from sin]. Is this not the same declaration that Jesus made in Mark 16:16, but in different words? “He who believes [the truth of the gospel] and is baptized will be saved. But he who does not believe [the truth of the gospel] will be condemned.”

“THAT SILLY CROSS”

“Unlike Jesus, I don’t need a silly cross to save my people. I believe I’m the messiah of our time, I’m gonna save this nation like Jesus saved Christians. Except, I’ll be able to save you without some silly cross.”

So said the leader of one of the prominent political parties in South Africa. Such blasphemous statements remind us of the circumstances surrounding Herod when he allowed the people to say of him, “The voice of a god and not a man” (At 12:22). And then the Holy Spirit reported on the result of Herod’s arrogant behavior: “And immediately an angel of the Lord smote him because he did not give God the glory. And he was eaten by worms and died” (At 12:23).

In response to the preceding statement of the South African politician, Dr. Jan Venter wrote in the Farmer's Weekly, the century-old weekly publication of South Africa, "Leaders who claim godlike qualities often face disastrous ends" (FW, April 13, 2018). Such a disastrous end came upon Herod. We have witnessed throughout history the same end of similar self-proclaimed demagogues.

God established governing authorities for the sake of the people of a nation. Therefore, "let every soul [of a nation] be subject to the governing authorities. For there is no authority except from God. The authorities that exist are ordained by God" (Rm 13:1). God ordained government, not specific government officials.

When some authorities called the apostles Peter and John into their council chambers and commanded them not to speak in the name of Jesus, the apostles responded, "Whether it is right in the sight of God to give heed to you more than to God, you judge. For we cannot but speak the things that we have seen and heard" (At 4:19,20). If ever our religious leaders of a country move into the political wings of government, and make statements as that which was voiced by the preceding opportunistic South African politician or Herod, then it is time to take a stand for the gospel.

Satan does not idly lurk quietly in a dim street alley awaiting for some unsuspecting innocent to wander where lions roar. He more often covertly rises in the ranks of leadership, whether in religion or government in order to enact antichrist laws that reflect their denial of the gospel. Before indifferent Christians finally realize that the "governing authorities" are commanding us "not to speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus," it is sometimes too late. Before the indifferent realize it, they have lost their freedom.

When Islam swept across North Africa in the eighth century, this antichrist religion swept Christianity off that part of the continent. When the atheistic communist regime of Mao se Tung rose to power in China, he too did religious house cleaning and sought to sweep the gospel out of China. It is not the work of Satan that is the problem. He is only doing his business. The problem is indifferent Christians who have lost their first love. Ephesus has for two thousand years reminded us that if we lose our first love, we are gone as the church.

In one of our neighboring countries to the north of us, some secular politicians have begun to affect the churches of the nation. One example was the banning of land to be sold to religious groups for the construction of church buildings in the capital city. Another example occurred in our country of residence. When anyone buys food from any of the major food suppliers, he or she unknowingly pays the Halaal price to a Muslim imam who must bless the food. This is a violation of any constitution that guarantees freedom of religion. Christians in South Africa are not free from this ransom price that must be paid to the Muslim faith when they purchase food at any of the large food stores. The problem is ignorance of the law on the part of the general public who mostly know nothing of this practice by the Muslims in free-market enterprises within a democracy. The rest of the citizenship of the country keep themselves in darkness by their own indifference. When Christians cease preaching the light of the gospel, darkness reigns.

Satan often works himself in by way of the back door. Those Christians who are indifferent—which indifference they pass off as being forbearing and patient (Rv 2:9)—will always find themselves at the mercy of the devices of Satan. Because of the motivation of the gospel, Christianity is a "militant" faith, but not with guns and suicide bombers. It is through a persistent stand for the truth of the gospel that enables Christians to be the preservative of society.

When Jesus said, "Be wise as serpents and harmless as doves," He did not mean "indifferent as serpents," and "idle as doves" (Mt 10:16). Those metaphors would make no sense. We must not forget that Jesus used the metaphor "wise as serpents," not "wise as Solomon." Serpents have a bite, and that bite has venom. A serpent will certainly be patient. He will not strike unless threatened. But if threatened, he will strike with a venomous bite. The gospel is a venomous strike against the darkness of evil.

It is quite interesting that Jesus would use the behavior of a serpent in reference to those who follow Him. Unfortunately, many of Jesus' disciples today forget what Jesus said to His immediate followers: "Do not think that I came to bring peace on the earth. I did not come to bring peace, but a sword" (Mt 10:34). We never hear the subject of "Christian serpents" preached. We feel that most indifferent Christians have no desire to bite back with the truth of the gospel when threatened ... ever.

But when the truth of the gospel is threatened, Christians must be reminded that it is time to swing the sword of the Spirit in standing up for the gospel. When political "messiahs" arrogantly blaspheme the cross by which we are saved, it is time to stand forth with the truth of the gospel.

Epilogue INTO THE STREETS

When we lived and preached the gospel in the West Indies in the early 70s, Saturday was a special day of evangelism. We remember going to the local street markets on Saturday morning, standing up on two Coke cases stacked upon one another, and with a microphone in hand, preaching the gospel to those who were busy in the market buying food for the week. The people seemed like they were not listening as they scurried about making their purchases. But they were. We had tracts available. Sometimes we handed them out to the people, and at other times the people would simply come over to the “Coke Crate Preacher” and pick up what they needed for the week.

Those were the days when people in the West Indies were zealous to hear the message of the gospel. In those days we could “clap” (knock) at ten houses in a particular community, and if the people were home, nine would invite us in to study the Bible. There was receptivity and a desire to hear the gospel preached on street corners, in the markets, and where ever there was an audience. That receptivity may have cooled in many parts of the world, but that does not mean that our evangelistic spirit must also cool.

For example, we were emotionally overwhelmed one day by an anomaly where we now live in a large urban center in Africa. It is a suburban part of the city where people seem to be so busy. We too were busy people on one particular day. In our hurry to go here and there, we had a fortunate encounter that reminded us of those days forty-five years before when we stood up on a Coke crate to preach the gospel in market places of the West Indies.

We were scurrying about our business in town on this eventful day. All we did seemed so frustratingly urgent. We zealously flew from one store to another, picking up those material items that would eventually burn in the great cataclysmic fire at the last trumpet. All those things seemed so important at the time. We had no time for people, only for those who collected our money at the register after we had feverishly rummaged through a host of options on the store shelves. It was all so important, so urgent ... and so meaningless.

In our rush out of one shopping mall, and destined for another store, a glimpse out of our eyes caught this elderly couple on the sidewalk in the hot sun in front of the shopping mall. The aged man had on his tie and looked presentable for what the couple were doing. His wife in her feebleness sat faithfully by his side on the street in a camping chair. Her cane lay beside her as she looked up through dim eyes with a neck brace to stabilize her weak muscles. There they were together in a common mission to do their part in preaching the gospel. It was a vision of faithfulness that would surely reap the pronouncement in the end, “Well done My good and faithful servants.”

Both of the mid-sixty saints weakly stood before inquiring people who were discussing one-on-one with them what the two faithfuls had in their feeble hands and on their warm hearts. There were no banners. No “end-of-time” signs. There were only Bibles, God’s word. There was the source of the gospel message held in the tender grasp of these messengers, and to the best of their ability, they stood alone there to represent their Savior with precious words from the word of God about the gospel of Jesus. It was a picture that shocked us into spiritual reality, and reminded us of our senseless rush to fill a garage full of bonfire kindling for the last day.

The old couple pointed with arthritic fingers to favorite passages that would bring hope to the inquisitive visitors who had taken time out of their busy rush from store to store to buy, as we did, what at the time now seemed to be so worthless in comparison to their message. He stood there in the heat of the sun with a pleasant smile on his face giving hope to some earthly wanderer. Likewise, she, faithfully by his side in the camp chair, did the same as some searchers stooped to their knees in order to hear the precious words that flowed forth from her wrinkled lips. It was a glorious sight that burned a photographic image on our minds that will be there forever.

We gazed in wonder and pondered what causes old people to do things as this. They both could have been in the security of their own home in the comfort of easy chairs, wasting their minds away viewing some senseless television show. But there they were in the heat of the day. As you certainly should be doing as you read of this spectacle of dedication, we questioned our own commitment to the cause of preaching Jesus every day and everywhere. We find it difficult to recover from the sight of the ministry of these two dedicated angels of light who both witnessed by their lives, and taught by their lips, the precious message of the gospel of Jesus.

What faith did this elderly couple have in order to be so overwhelmingly committed? There they were, struggling on the streets of the upper financial class of Durbanville, South Africa doing what they could to preach Jesus to a passing crowd of the “walking dead.” We could witness their faith. It was a faith that did not content itself to camp in some beautiful church house on padded pews on Sunday morning, and then sign the preaching of the gospel off with a closing prayer. It was not a faith that found contentment in a cocooned fellowship of fellow religionists at a love feast. These two gospel-driven souls may have been a part of such, but their faith carried them far beyond church-house doors, beyond sanctuaries, and beyond even the security of their own fellowship of believers. Theirs was not a “church-house religion” that contented itself with ceremonial religiosity.

They were there on that street as a testimony that the gospel must be preached to every creature in all the world. Because of their physical feebleness, they could not go far into all the world. Nevertheless, they could go to a sidewalk just outside a shopping mall in their home town. The gospel of God’s heart had moved them out of their comfort zone and before the lives of those who were scurrying about buying flammable material for the great bonfire to come.

In our own scurry to purchase kindling for the same fire, we consider our own commitment to proclaim the gospel to a world that is rushing past us. We sometimes question whether we are allowing the full power of the gospel to reach into the inner most confines of our hearts in order to drive us to make all necessary sacrifices that must be made to preach Jesus to the world. Gospel living is not something we do. It must be something we are. Sometimes it takes a Coke crate or street corner to determine if we have not lost our first love.

Gospel Restoration

This is a life-changing book, not because of any literary design on the part of the author, but because of the subject of the book. Other authors have written on the same subject for two thousand years. I have tried in my own words, for my own spiritual renewal, to refocus on the power of the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. You are thus receiving in literary form my own personal adventure into the incarnational existence of the Son of God. Many years ago He began the transformation process of my life, which process is still incomplete. It is my prayer that this book will in some way renew your faith, and aid in your own spiritual transformation into the image of Christ.

The incarnational journey of the Son of God from heaven into the hearts of millions throughout the centuries has changed the world. I have tried in this book to in some way rehearse the beautiful advent of the Son of God from heaven and into our hearts. Though we struggle to understand how God can become man, our finite understanding is enough to stimulate a paradigm shift in both thinking and behavior. In my personal studies I have sought in some way to comprehend the incarnational advent of God into the flesh of man for the purpose of taking me to His original home of existence.

The writing of this book has been personal. It has been personal in that I believe every Christian must study the subject of this book thoroughly in order to reaffirm one's faith, and thus continue to grow in the grace and knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ.

I have found that there are some very dedicated people who are ministering to the needs of others as the Son of God ministered to us. They have sometimes not been able to identify why they are who they are. It is my prayer that the subject of this book will bring to light their inner motivation. They work in response to the heart of God. These gospel workers just work because they have to. This is the power of living the gospel. Throughout the pages of this book I have sought to identify why so many saints unselfishly labor to fulfill the needs of others because their spiritual needs were fulfilled by the incarnate Son of God.

Christianity is unique in reference to the motivation of the gospel. There is no other faith among the religious inventions of men that compares with the dynamic of the gospel message. The God of heaven is love, and when people of this world emulate the love of God through His Son, there is something within the hearts of the motivated that is beyond the words of men. Only the gospel of the invasion of God into this world could answer the question as to why Christians behave as they do.

It is my prayer, therefore, that this book will in some way bring together all the beauty of the gospel. If it does, then you can in some way understand why you are the way you are in your tireless labors for others. Your incarnational living of the gospel exemplifies before the world the message of our Savior that is far more powerful than words.

In 2004 Mel Gibson released the movie, The Passion of the Christ, which he directed, and was written by himself and Benedict Fitzgerald. It had a phenomenal impact on the hearts of people around the world. Production cost was a meager thirty million dollars, but box office sales went way over six hundred million. It was indeed a box office hit.

We remember seeing the movie. It was indeed an emotionally penetrating portrayal of the passion of the Lord Jesus Christ as He was taken to the cross after being horribly beaten by Roman soldiers. Gibson's crucifixion scene stunned the audience. We remember walking out of the theater speechless. The audience was stone silent because of the emotional trauma that they too had experienced. It was as if each one of us in the audience had been standing right there in the crowd two thousand years ago when glass or bone-tipped leather scourges lashed across the incarnate flesh of our Lord. It was as if we had the sensation to wipe the splattered blood of Jesus from our own bodies.

Blood flowed as a ravaged body of Jesus fell to the ground on His way to the cross. We almost yearned that death would soon come to the crucified Jesus as His body tore against spikes that were driven through His flesh. By the end of the crucifixion scene, all of us sought relief from the horror of the moment. We had agonized with Him in His torture as His fleshy temple gave up the spirit. It was a movie scene none of us wanted to ever experience again. It was too real. But that was the way it was when the cruelty of the Romans was unleashed on a condemned victim who was headed for execution on a cross.

The remembrance of the cross at the Lord's Supper has never been the same since. All of us have this mental image that Gibson sought to intentionally leave imprinted on our minds. Though we saw the movie over fifteen years ago, we still cannot forget the image of the crucifixion. When the bread of the Supper and fruit of the vine pass before us during the memorial moment of the week, we can envision the blood-soaked body of Jesus on the cross. We cannot forget. We feel almost uncomfortable with the fact that that was the way it truly was in those days. That was the suffering that was inflicted upon Him. And then a tear comes to our eye when we recall that He knowingly submitted to all that suffering in order that we be with Him and the Father for eternity.

The images that Gibson seared into our memory, however, sometimes lead us to forget something that is far beyond that cruel scene of the crucifixion. The "cross scene" was not the whole story. At the time Jesus was suffering on the cross, something was transpiring in the heavenly realm that had been awaiting inscription on human history since that first bite of the forbidden fruit in the garden of Eden. The cross was only the revelation of something greater, something more endearing that would permeate history and transition all of us into an eternal bliss where there will be no more suffering. At the cross, gospel was revealed to humanity. At the resurrection, hope was restored. It was as Peter many years wrote of the resurrection experience:

Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to His abundant mercy has begotten us again to a living hope through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead (1 Pt 1:3).

THE GOSPEL REVEALED

When we speak of things concerning the cross, nothing has changed from the world's perspective of the cross since the days when Paul inscribed the words, "But we preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling block and to Gentiles foolishness" (1 Co 1:23). The cross was in view when it was said of Jesus when He was first presented at the temple by His parents, "Behold, this child is destined for the fall and rise of many in Israel" (Lk 2:34). To the vast majority of the Jews, they stumbled over the cross in the sense that it was difficult for them to accept a crucified Messiah.

By the time of the initial revelations of the gospel through Jesus, the Jews had established for themselves a system of self-righteousness by which they believed that they could sanctify themselves of sin before God. They were as Paul describes them, "For I testify of them [the self-righteous Jews] that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge" (Rm 10:2). Their zeal to maintain their own self-righteousness before God was useless in view of the fact that it is not possible for one to justify himself before God through perfect obedience to works of law (Gl 2:16). The Jews persisted in their lack of knowledge of this fact. So Paul continued to explain their problem with the righteousness of God that was revealed at the cross.

For they being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God (Rm 10:3).

When Jesus was on the cross, He was “the end of law for righteousness to everyone who believes” (Rm 10:4). For this reason, therefore, the Jews stumbled over the cross because they were so self-absorbed in their supposed self-justifying religion. Paul said of them, “But Israel, who followed after the law of righteousness, has not attained to the law” (Rm 9:31). So we would ask why this was so. Paul answered, “Because they [the Jews] did not seek it by faith, but as if it were by works [of law]. For they stumbled over the stumbling stone [of Jesus and the cross]” (Rm 9:32). This is exactly what had been prophesied by Isaiah: “Behold, I lay in Zion a stumbling stone and a rock of offense, and whoever believes in Him will not be ashamed” (Rm 9:33; see Is 8:14; 28:16). And so Paul and thousands of others in the first century were not ashamed of this gospel that was revealed on the cross (Rm 1:16).

Because the Jews were so self-absorbed in their own self-righteousness, they could not see beyond the actual humiliation of One who was crucified on a cross by Roman soldiers. When Jesus uttered from the cross, “Father forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing,” He was revealing the problem of the Jews at the time (Lk 23:34). If they had truly known what was transpiring behind the curtain of the flesh and blood on the cross, then they would later have rejoiced over the cross.

Instead, because they could not see beyond the cross of crucifixion, the cross became the stumbling block over which most religious Jews stumbled. They were simply willing to carry on with their own self-righteousness through supposed law-keeping and meritorious deeds.

We too are not that innocent in reference to “empirical theology.” When we sit at the Lord’s Supper and remember, is it not that we often focus our minds only on the actual suffering and crucifixion of Jesus? When there are those who speak before the Supper, do they not speak only of the suffering of Jesus on the cross? We go into detail concerning His agony, His shedding of blood, nails tearing through His flesh, and finally, His giving up His last breath. We almost take all the joy of celebration out of the Lord’s Supper by making it a funeral dirge of sadness. In doing so we forget the rest of the gospel because of our weekly moments when we attend the funeral of the Supper. We deny ourselves an opportunity for rejoicing by focusing only on the suffering of Jesus in the flesh on the cross.

We believe that the cross was a momentary event of history in the mission of Jesus to reveal something overwhelmingly marvelous that was taking place at the time He was suffering on the cross. Because the early disciples did not realize this at the time, they went fishing after the crucifixion (Jn 21:3). The two witnesses from Emmaus simply went back home (Lk 24:13-29). But the cross itself represented something far beyond the cross itself. From God’s point of view, eternity was taking place in the few hours Jesus was suffering on the cross. Our full understanding of eternity will not be realized until a final trumpet is heard from heaven. It will then be our time for eternal comprehension. It will be then that we will fully understand the totality of the gospel, of which the cross was only one event.

THE INCARNATIONAL GOSPEL

If we can in some way comprehend the magnitude of the subject of the next three chapters, it will completely transform our lives. However, because we are of this world, and of the flesh, it may be difficult. But if we can in some way work our minds around the reality of the incarnation of God into the flesh of man, and we truly believe what we discover, then we will never be the same again.

We would begin with an example. I was about three thousand kilometers away from home ministering, teaching on gospel living to a dedicated group of religious leaders. I had been invited by a local church leader who had called several leaders together for the meeting that night. After the meeting, the local church leader asked me to stay with him and his wife for the night. So I did.

It was a very small house with children and grandchildren here and there. The children graciously heated up some water so I could take a wash-cloth-bath after the 7-hour drive I had just completed in order to arrive at the location of the meeting. The good brother and his wife said that I must sleep in their bed, which, against my protest, I graciously did. The wife slept in a small bed with about four children and grandchildren swarmed around her, some sleeping on the floor. I was unaware of where the good brother slept until the next morning.

When I awoke at 4:00<sup>am</sup> to continue my way to the next gospel workshop, I discovered that the good brother had slept outside in his old car in order to make room for me to have the comfort of his own bed. This was incarnational living. Why do Christians do things as this?

“Incarnation” is a word that can be literally applied to God only. God is spirit (Jn 4:24), and only God can incarnate into the flesh of man. And in this, the gospel revelation began in the manger of a barn in a small village of Bethlehem a little over two thousand years ago. However, before Bethlehem, the apostle John wanted us to understand that the Bethlehem birth did not constitute just another citizen to be registered with the Roman census. John carried our imagination back into the enclave of heaven. “In the beginning was the Word,” revealed John, “and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was in the beginning with God” (Jn 1:1,2). Before the Word came into the world, there was existence in the realm of heaven. Before creation, He was one with God.

And then incarnation happened. “And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us” (Jn 1:14). What is impossible for us to understand fully was raised in the arms of Joseph from a manager of hay in a barn in Bethlehem. Only God, not Mary or Joseph, could have ever understood what had just happened when Mary cried out in birth pains, and the Son of God was released into the world.

“Son” means origin, and thus, the Son of God in the flesh originated with a cry from the flesh of woman, and would eventually end on earth with a cry from the Son Himself on a cross when He would leave this world (Lk 23:46). But between the two cries, something wonderful happened. The good news of the gospel began in a manger. The last chapter is yet to be revealed with the blow of the last trumpet from heaven.

After an initial thirty years in the flesh, the Son of God, who was given birth into the world in the flesh of man, began His journey to the suffering of the cross. At the very beginning of His ministry, sincere men began to realize that something was different about this One Mary and Joseph had named Jesus. Nicodemus came to Him in the night and said, “Rabbi, we know that You are a teacher from God, for no one can do these signs that You do unless God is with him” (Jn 3:2).

Though Nicodemus did not understand the full implications of what he stated in the words, “from God,” he would eventually. As all the disciples, he would understand that Jesus was not just a good Rabbi from Nazareth. He was God in the flesh. He was the only begotten One who had ventured out of the corridors of heaven into the flesh of man (Jn 3:16).

This Jesus of Nazareth was first known as Rabbi, but the revelation of who He actually was would go far beyond His manhood and knowledge in teaching the law. He was first the man Jesus, and then Rabbi/Teacher (Jn 1:38). He would then be proclaimed to be the Christ (Messiah) of Israel (Jn 1:41). The disciples harbored this faith in Him until the last few days before the cross (At 1:6).

But then His humanity was reaffirmed when He bled and died on the cross. The cross signaled the last of His humanity in flesh and blood as the disciples knew Him. Nevertheless, the cross was not the end of His incarnational existence, nor did the cross reveal His true identity.

Death had no control over Him who had the power to create that which could die (Cl 1:16; Hb 9:27). And thus by the power of the resurrection, the man Jesus, the Rabbi/Teacher, the Messiah of Israel, was then proved to be the Son of God (Rm 1:4). It is now that this Son of God is King and Lord over all things (Ep 1:19-23). The story of the gospel will be complete when He returns from heaven with His mighty angels (2 Th 1:6-9).

When the apostle John compiled his record of seven miracles that Jesus worked among men, he called on his readers to come to the same decisive conclusion that he and the other apostles had come to when they saw and handled the resurrected Son of God (1 Jn 1:1-3): “These [seven signs] are written so that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God” (Jn 20:31). And we believe, but our belief will always be handicapped with our inability to comprehend fully the incarnational action of God coming into the flesh of man. It is just something that lies outside our human empirical comprehension. Nevertheless, we seek to understand as much as possible through His example, and the example of those first disciples whose lives were totally transformed.

Our journey to understand begins with a question: How would we suppose that God the Son would allow Himself to be incarnationally introduced into the world? Six hundred years before, it was prophesied that “a voice” would come crying in the wilderness and announcing His coming (Is 40:3). But in our own misguided social environment of prestige and pomp in a religious world that has often gone astray from the incarnate Bethlehem babe, we would possibly consider that He should be introduced by the top “lectureship speakers” of Jerusalem. Or possibly, He should be introduced by some renowned professor or preacher of some major religious group in Rome. Or, we might seek out some well-known religious leader among the Jews who was instigating a rebellion against the Roman Empire. All these presumptions would be wrong assumptions.

If God would have someone to introduce the incarnation of Himself into the world, then we would certainly assume that He would introduce Himself by one who himself would seek to bring the literal incarnation of God metaphorically into his own life. And that one was John, the baptizer in the wilderness. John exemplified the metaphor of the literal incarnation of the Word by living incarnationally in the wilderness.

Before John began his introductions of the incarnate Word, we do not know how much was revealed to John concerning the One he would cry out in the wilderness to be the coming One. But we do assume from his life-style that he was obliged in some way to live the life of the Word who was incarnate from spirit into the flesh of man. How else can we explain John’s behavior and the location he chose as his “church sanctuary.”

In some way to be “worthy” to introduce divine incarnation, John extracted himself from the fine life of glamour in Jerusalem. “He came preaching in the wilderness of Judea” (Mt 3:1). He refused to be dressed in the glamorous tailored suits of the touring preachers. “John had a garment of camel’s hair and a leather belt around his waist” (Mt 3:4). He deprived himself of the fine cuisine in the restaurants on Main Street in Jerusalem. “His food was locusts and wild honey” (Mt 3:4).

If the One he was to introduce to the world gave up the glories of heaven in order to be incarnate into the flesh of man, then certainly John in some way felt that he must do the same. He too must live the incarnational life. How else could he possibly introduce to others the One who gave up all that heaven had to offer in order to trudge the dusty roads of Palestine in the flesh of man (Ph 2:5-8; Cl 1:16)?

If we would preach this same incarnate Son of God, should we not in our own way do the same? People must see in us incarnational living in order to be drawn to the One who was incarnate for us. John introduced the gospel restoration movement by introducing the incarnate Word who would draw all men unto Himself because He gave up so much for us (Jn 12:32). Though we can never lower ourselves as much as the incarnate Word, we must at least, as John, give it our best effort. Heaven is reserved for incarnationals.

THE INCARNATIONAL GOSPEL JOURNEY

Remember when Peter, during the ministry of Jesus, said to Jesus, “Behold, we [apostles] have left all and have followed You” (Mk 10:28)? The gospel restoration movement began during the earthly ministry of Jesus, poured over into the life-style of the immediate apostles of Jesus, and then into the behavior of the early church. When Saul became Paul, the one who persecuted incarnational disciples left all for the incarnate Son of God. As the apostle to the Gentiles, Paul too expected others to live as the One to whom he had submitted through the gospel. In order to persuade others to be drawn to the incarnational Savior of the world, he too had to follow the behavior of His Savior that was emulated in the lives of the first apostles.

Through Paul’s hand, the Holy Spirit inscribed these things: “Have this [incarnational] mind in you that was also in Christ Jesus” (Ph 2:5). And with this statement, the materialist begins to shutter at what is inferred. Nevertheless, it is through this paradigm shift into the mentality and actions of the Son of God that we all must move.

So the Spirit continues through Paul with the incarnational journey of the One who came forth from God. When the Son of God was initially existing “in the form of God [that is, spirit], [He] did not consider it robbery to be equal with God [in spirit]” (Ph 2:6). Form and equality with God were sacrificed for incarnational existence with those whom He had created in the flesh (Cl 1:16). In order for Him to dwell among His brethren, incarnation was necessary for the salvation of us all.

Therefore, since the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise partook of the same, so that through death He might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil (Hb 2:14).

“In all things He [the Son of God] had to be made like His brethren, so that He might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make an atoning sacrifice for the sins of the people” (Hb 2:17).

If we would live the incarnational life in gratitude of being delivered from death, then we too must give up living after the “form of the world” and being “equal in glamor” with those of the world. The incarnational life calls on us to change our aspirations from the world to heavenly aspirations of those things that are above (Cl 3:1,2). And for this reason, few who are in high places in the world humble themselves to the incarnational life as a disciple of the incarnate Son of God.

In order to make this paradigm shift, transformation is necessary. “Be not conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind” (Rm 12:2). Having the mind of Christ calls for a transformation of our minds. The mind of Christ must become our mind. We live the incarnational mind of Christ when we begin thinking and behaving as the incarnate Son of God in whom we profess our faith. This is the aroma of Christ (2 Co 2:14). When all those who believe that Jesus is the Son of God start living the incarnational mind of Christ, it is then that we experience the gospel restoration movement. This is a movement that is led by incarnational thinking as opposed to legal self-righteousness.

The Spirit continued with His definition of how our behavior must emulate the incarnational behavior of the Son of God. The transformation of our mind is His business through our voluntary submission to the aroma of His being. He established the example that we must follow. The Spirit explained that since it was Jesus’ business to transform Himself into the flesh of man, then Jesus calls on us to make the same personal decision. So the Holy Spirit reminded Paul’s readers, “He [the incarnate God] made Himself of no reputation” (Ph 2:7). “Made Himself” is middle voice. Jesus acted upon Himself. His incarnation was not passive, suggesting that the Father and Holy Spirit acted upon Him. His incarnational existence was totally personal and self-inflicted. So it must be with us.

Jesus could not blame the Father if the incarnation was not complete. And neither can we blame the Holy Spirit if our lives are not totally transformed in following the example of Jesus. As Jesus Himself carried out the incarnation of His own will, so we also must carry out our incarnational transformation in the renewing of our minds and life-styles. At the end of the day, we can never blame the Holy Spirit for any lack of transformation of our lives into the mind of Christ. We must take ownership of our own paradigm shift to be transformed into incarnational living.

We must be patient with ourselves and others, for transformation into incarnational living is a lifetime struggle. John Mark grew up among the privileged in the big city of Jerusalem. His life as a young man was evidently sugarcoated as the son of an economically advantaged family.

In his youthful zeal, and possibly by the encouragement of his cousin, Barnabas, young Mark tagged along on Paul’s first missionary journey (Cl 4:10). After passing through his cousin Barnabas’ homeland of Cyprus, the glamor of the trip lasted only until he was faced with the daunting task of crossing the mountains of Pamphylia in southern Asia. He was too far from the comforts of his Jerusalem home and the fun of the journey had turned into agony. It was there that he turned from the work.

When it came time for Paul to launch out again on a second missionary journey, he deemed John Mark still incarnationally immature for the type of incarnational journey in missions that the transformed Paul could accomplish (At 15:36-37). However, Barnabas was patient with his cousin, and subsequently took him back to the familiar territory of Cyprus (At 15:39). But what is significant to notice in the transformation of Mark is embedded in Paul’s request for him during Paul’s imprisonment many years later. He wrote to Timothy, “Get Mark and bring him with you, for he is profitable to me for the ministry” (2 Tm 4:11). So the last mention we have of the formerly spoiled Jerusalem boy is when he was with the imprisoned apostle Paul in a Roman prison (Cl 4:10). Mark had spiritually transformed into being able to venture far beyond the mountains of Pamphylia. He had grown to venture right into the heart of what would become the center of state persecution against Christianity. His incarnational transformation was complete.

In the years that followed the disappointment at the foot of the mountains of Pamphylia, Mark spiritually grew into profitability. It took time for him to grow into the incarnational life that would be profitable for ministry. But he made it there. Therefore, we must be patient with ourselves and others as we too grow into incarnational living.

What is significant about Mark is that he did not turn back from the challenge to grow into behavior that emulated the incarnation of his Savior. He would not allow himself to have a faith that was void of living the incarnational gospel.

In the incarnation, Jesus did not hold Himself up in heaven with “faith only.” He did not continue to reside in the form of God in a heavenly environment when there was a mission that had to be accomplished. He thus acted on Himself and launched out of heaven and into the form of man. In comparison to His existence with God in the form of God, incarnation meant that He had to personally make the decision to sacrifice the reputation (existence) of being God in the spirit (Ph 2:6). He sacrificed the privileged existence as God in order to be made as a man. He thus took the form of a slave by “being made in the likeness of men” (Ph 2:7). In some metaphorical manner, we must do the same.

It was not only in the likeness of men that He came, but He made Himself a slave to the needs of others. The Greek word in the text is doulos, the word for slave. A slave gives up his right to choose for himself when he allows the needs of others to make choices for him. There is no such thing as living an incarnational self-willed life. Incarnational living is inherently slave oriented. And so as the Son of God loved us to become a slave on our behalf, we too love others in order to be their slaves (1 Jn 4:19,21).

Those who would live as incarnational slaves must follow Jesus to dirty feet. The incarnational life-style is not for those who thirst after popularity or prosperity. They do not crave to be “Hollywood preachers” who broadcast themselves around the world as someone who thinks himself to be somewhat. Worldly living and selfish ambition are not the spirit of the slave of Jesus who would live incarnationally. On the contrary, the incarnational slave finds a towel and looks for dirty feet to wash (See Jn 13:1-20).

After Jesus washed all the disciples’ feet, He said to all of them, “Truly, Truly, I say to you, a bondservant [slave] is not greater than his lord” (Jn 13:16). And since we call Him Lord, then we must find more than the dirty feet of twelve men to wash. We must look for dirty feet throughout our lives. If we think of ourselves too good to wash dirty feet, then we are not disciples of the One who initially created the feet.

In appearance as God, the incarnate Son made Himself into the flesh of man in order to wash dirty “spiritual” feet (Ph 2:8). Those who would seek to be disciples of Jesus must do likewise. Few who are in high places are called to these matters because they find it difficult to incarnate into the example of a slave to the needs of others. If the preacher loves “the best places at feasts and the chief seats in the synagogues,” then he seeks to live contrary to an incarnational Savior (See Mt 23:6). If one is a lover of money, he too will find incarnational living difficult (See Lk 16:14). In fact, the incarnate Son of God said, “Whoever of you who does not forsake all that he has, cannot be My disciple” (Lk 14:33). Jesus gave up all of heaven in order to lead the way in giving all of self to us.

Incarnational living calls for death to our old life of living for ourselves and consuming upon our own lusts. The Son of God “humbled Himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross” (Ph 2:8). When Jesus said, “And whoever does not bear his own cross and come after Me, cannot be My disciple,” the disciples soon realized that incarnational living after their Master meant a cross of death (See Lk 14:27). It is as the incarnational life-style of Paul. “I affirm, brethren, by the boasting in you that I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily” (1 Co 15:31). If one would live the incarnational sacrifice of Jesus, then he puts his signature on his own death certificate to have died with the incarnate Son of God on the cross of Calvary (Rm 6:3).

But there is a glorious end to the incarnate life-style. We will in some way be in this life as Jesus now is. The Spirit explained, “Therefore, God also has highly exalted Him and given Him the name that is above every name” (Ph 2:9). It was upon the foundation of this truth of the risen and reigning incarnate Son of God that Paul inscribed the following words in reference to all those who would live incarnationally in this life:

For if by one man’s offense death reigned through the one, much more they who receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness [through the gospel of Jesus] will reign in life through the one, Jesus Christ (Rm 5:17).

What a glorious statement! And just in case we missed the point in the letter to the Romans, Paul reminded the evangelist Timothy with the same thought: “For if we died with Him [in baptism], we will also live with Him. If we suffer [bearing our cross], we will also reign with Him [in this life]” (2 Tm 2:11,12). This reigning is not future, it is present as Jesus now reigns as King of kings and Lord of lords (1 Tm 6:15).

Living the incarnational life is a victorious life in Christ. The faith about which John wrote (Jn 20:30,31), leads to victorious living in this life. “This is the victory that overcomes the world, our faith” (1 Jn 5:4). The incarnational life is victorious only if we take the incarnational journey with the Son of God who was formerly with and as God, but then on His own initiative, became as the flesh of man in order to be our slave and wash our dirty “spiritual” feet.

We too must make a voluntary decision to live in gratitude of the gospel of Jesus. Since He came for us, we go for others. Since He died for us, we too bear a cross in order to take the gospel into all the world. This is the nature of living incarnationally for the benefit of others in order that they find their way into eternal life through the atoning sacrifice of the incarnate Son of God on the cross. When we speak of discipleship, therefore, we are not talking about a title of being Christian. We are talking about living a sacrificial life in response to the incarnate Son of God who gave Himself for us. Discipleship is our behavior of life wherein we express our thanksgiving to the Son of God for all that He has done for us, and will do for us when He comes again.

Chapter 4

INCARNATIONAL EXAMPLES

It is the incarnate life as a disciple of the incarnate God that we seek to live. This is living the power of the incarnational gospel. Once we understand the incarnational journey of Jesus, we then begin to understand some of the puzzling historical statements in the New Testament concerning the behavior of the early disciples.

For example, during the first days after the official announcement of the gospel reign of Jesus, the early disciples “sold their possessions and goods and divided them to all, as everyone had need” (At 2:45). Because we often live in materialistic societies today, we have difficulty understanding this behavior. When we understand what happens once one adopts the incarnational journey of the Son of God to the cross, then we begin to understand that the submitted seek to emulate in their lives the incarnate Servant who suffered on the cross for them. In the historical setting of the previous statement, those first disciples were willing to forsake what they possessed, just as Jesus forsook heaven He possessed, in order to serve the needs of those who had journeyed to Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost feast. Inherent in incarnational living is using possessions to continue the mission of King Jesus.

This transformed behavior of the early disciples continued far beyond Pentecost. Church was identified by the incarnate nature of the members. A few years after Pentecost, this behavior was again brought out in Luke’s historical statement concerning the sacrificial offering of the members. “And no one said that any of the things he possessed was his own” (At 4:32). This is incarnational thinking. Why would the Holy Spirit make this statement concerning the “mind of the church” if only a few of the members behaved in this manner? The point is that the Spirit recorded for posterity through Luke the very heart of the incarnational living of the early disciples as a whole. There was a paradigm shift in how they viewed the ownership of their possessions. Owners still had control of their possessions (At 5:4). However, they were willing to relinquish the ownership of what they possessed in order to fulfill the needs of others.

There were few anomalies among them in sacrificial contributions. The very nature (behavior) of the church was identified by the incarnational sacrifices of every member to meet the needs of others. Jesus had revealed that His disciples would be defined and identified by their love for one another (Jn 13:34,35). And that was just what happened when men and women were obedient to the incarnational Son of God. Gospel living is inherently sacrificial.

Luke further explained, “Nor was there any among them who lacked, for as many as were owners of land or houses sold them and brought the proceeds of the things that were sold” (At 4:34). And such did Jesus who left his “land” in heaven. He illustrated an example for all those who would be His disciples. “Whoever of you who does not forsake all that he has, cannot be My disciple” (Lk 14:33). This was in the prophesied relationship that Jesus would have with His disciples during His ministry: “He who finds his life [in this world] will lose it. And he who loses his life for My sake will find it” (Mt 10:39).

Mark recorded the same sentiment of Jesus: “For whoever wishes to save his life will lose it, but whoever wishes to lose his life for My sake and the gospel’s, the same will save it” (Mk 8:35). This is gospel living after the example of the incarnate Son of God. “For what will it profit a man if he will gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?” (Mk 8:36). However, if we are willing to leave all for Jesus, then Jesus promises the following in this life.

Truly I say to you, there is no one who has left house or brothers or sisters or father or mother or wife or children or lands for My sake and the gospel’s, who will not receive a hundredfold now in this time ... and in the age to come eternal life (Mk 10:29,30).

Paul lived the incarnational life. “What things were gain to me [in my former life],” he wrote, “those things I have counted loss for Christ” (Ph 3:7). He did not escape into living a presumed sacrificial life, but a reality in reference to his own incarnate living: “I count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ

Jesus my Lord” (Ph 3:8). And to express his emphatic life-style that illustrates the example of incarnational living, he wrote in reference to those things he gave up and left: “I count them refuse so that I may gain Christ” (Ph 3:8). The Greek word for “refuse” in this text is the word “dung.” Aspirations for those things of the world become repugnant to those who live the incarnate life. They are refuse to be discarded and never viewed again as the priority of our lives.

For the incarnate disciple, money becomes only a means to accomplish the mission of living and preaching the incarnate Son of God. The Philippians saw this in the lives of Paul, Silas, Timothy and Luke, and subsequently behaved the same in their own lives after only a few days as disciples of Jesus. Paul, Silas and Timothy were in the city of Philippi only a few days on the second missionary journey of Paul—Luke stayed when the other three went on to Thessalonica (At 16:12). During the few days while the evangelists were in the city, Lydia and the Philippian jailor, with their households, obeyed the gospel by baptism into Christ (At 16:15,33).

Several years later, Paul wrote of the example of these new disciples. He reminded them that immediately after obeying the gospel, they began to support the preaching of the gospel when he, Silas and Timothy traveled on to Thessalonica.

Now you Philippians know also that in the beginning of the gospel [in your lives] when I departed from Macedonia, no church shared with me concerning giving and receiving but you only. For even in Thessalonica you sent once and again for my needs (Ph 4:15,16).

Why do new Christians do things as this? The answer is simple. When evangelists go forth living the incarnate life of the One they proclaim, then those who obey the gospel of the incarnate Son of God know what they are getting themselves into before they obey the gospel. They first count the cost, and then they begin to understand that in this life God will do them right regardless of their sacrifices (See Lk 14:28-33). But most important, God will reward them with eternal life when the Son returns. Therefore, as Paul lived the incarnational life of his Savior, so did the Philippians in reference to making themselves the slaves of others who were in need, just as those first disciples on Pentecost. When the gospel of grace comes into one’s life, marvelous things will happen.

We make known to you the grace of God that has been given to the churches of Macedonia [which includes those in the city of Philippi], that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty, abounded in the riches of their liberality. For I testify that according to their ability, yes, and beyond their ability they gave of their own accord (2 Co 8:1-3).

All the disciples of Macedonia followed the incarnate example of the first evangelists who came to them, for one of those first evangelists later wrote to the Corinthian disciples, “Be imitators of me even as I also of Christ” (1 Co 11:1). As Christ gave up everything of heaven for us, so we are willing to give up everything of this world for others. As He made Himself a slave to our needs, so we also make ourselves a slave to the needs of others. This is the gospel of incarnate living after the example of the Son of God. In fact, “this is the message that you [we] have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another” (1 Jn 3:11). We can know that we are living the incarnate life of Jesus by our response to the needs of others. “*We know that we have passed from death to life because we love the brethren” (1 Jn 3:14). “*By this we know love, because He [through incarnation and the cross] laid down His life for us. And we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren” (1 Jn 3:16).

But whoever has this world’s goods, and sees his brother in need and closes his heart against him, how does the love of [the incarnate] God abide in him? (1 Jn 3:17).

Chapter 5

THE CRUCIFIXIONAL GOSPEL

It is the love of the incarnate Son of God that motivates our hearts to live the incarnational life. In reference to the incarnate Son of God, God’s love was demonstrated on a cross for our behalf. The cross happened in history, not because we were worthy people, but because we were worthless people in sin. “But God demonstrates His love toward us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us” (Rm 5:8). The cross was a demonstration. There was no “faith only” in reference to God’s love for us. The Son of God did not stay in heaven and just believe us into the grace of God.

Incarnation, which was for the purpose of a sacrificial offering for sin, was a demonstration of the fact of God's love for us. For this reason, His love for us is reciprocal. Therefore, "we love because He first loved us" (1 Jn 4:19). During His ministry Jesus prepared His disciples for the crucifixional life-style of love that would come as He demonstrated the love of God on the cross.

"Whoever does not bear his own cross and come after Me, cannot be My disciple" (Lk 14:27). Crucifixional living is the demonstration that we are the disciples of Jesus. By our love we demonstrate that we are of the crucified One (Jn 13:34,35). All those who would simply cry out "Lord, Lord," without obedience to the instructions of the Father, have deceived themselves into believing that a dead faith is profitable. James asked such people, "But are you willing to know, O foolish man, that faith without works is dead?" (Js 2:20). So James admonished, "You see then that a man is justified by works and not by faith only" (Js 2:24). The crucifixional life is a demonstration that we have been crucified with Christ. Our faith led us to the cross. And once at the cross, we emulate in our own lives the sacrificial offering of the incarnate Son of God.

The crucifixional life is as what Paul stated of himself. "I die daily" (1 Co 15:31). He explained, "I have been crucified with Christ. And it is no longer I who live, but Christ lives in me" (Gl 2:20). Bearing the cross of Jesus means living daily the crucified life. Notice the passive tense in the phrase that Paul wrote in reference to obedience to the gospel in baptism: "Our old man was crucified [Gr. passive] with Him" (Rm 6:6).

Passive means that our old man was acted upon. At the cross, Jesus acted upon our old man of sin. We were crucified with Him two thousand years ago. Our obedience to the gospel today is our acceptance of His crucifixion for us. We thus begin our walk of the crucified life when we are raised from the waters of baptism. "For if we have been united together in the likeness of His death [crucifixion], we will also be in the likeness of His resurrection [from the dead]" (Rm 6:5). He was resurrected to reign as King of kings. And by walking the crucifixional life, we too reign in life with Him (Rm 5:17).

Paul wrote, "We preach Christ crucified, to the Jews a stumbling block and to Gentiles foolishness" (1 Co 1:23). For the Jews who were looking for a Messiah who would deliver them from Roman oppression, they could never follow a crucified leader. A crucified incarnational God was just foolishness to the Gentile idol worshipers who held their gods in high esteem. Therefore, neither the Jews nor the Gentiles in mass would allow themselves to be crucified with Christ in obedience to the gospel in baptism. Such things were contrary to their religious world views.

But notice this: "For though He was crucified because of weakness, yet He lives by the power of God. For we also are weak in Him, but we will live with Him by the power of God toward you" (2 Co 13:4). The power of the gospel to both save souls and change lives was unleashed at the cross. Jesus allowed Himself to remain weak in the flesh in order to be taken in bodily form to the cross. But He was raised up by the power of God. He was "declared to be the Son of God with power ... by the resurrection from the dead" (Rm 1:4).

In the same manner, we allow ourselves to be crucified with Him in order that by the power of a forgiving God, we too can be raised to walk in newness of life (Rm 6:4). The crucifixional life is the result of our submission to His crucifixion for us, as well as His resurrection and reign by the power of God. This is exactly what Peter reminded those on Pentecost who took part in the crucifixion of Jesus: "Therefore, let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ" (At 2:36).

The result of submission to the gospel of crucifixion is the crucifixional life. We live the cross. "Now those who are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires" (Gl 5:24). Such people can only do as Paul wrote, "God forbid that I should boast, except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world has been crucified to me and I to the world" (Gl 6:14). The crucifixional life is a life of self-denial. In other words, and with the same thought, Paul reminded those in Colosse, "For you are dead, and your life is hidden with Christ in God" (Cl 3:3).

We died with Christ on a cross of crucifixion. Our lives are embedded in the crucified Christ, and thus we have died to the world. In living the crucifixional life, we "put to death" our fleshly members that crave after the things of this world (Cl 3:5-7). "If you then were raised with Christ [from the waters of baptism], seek those things that are above" (Cl 3:1).

Living the crucifixional life is more than venturing outside our "comfort zone" to do an occasional soup kitchen in the ghetto. If there is still a "comfort zone" in our lives as a Christian, then we are living neither the incarnational, nor the crucifixional life. Comfort zones vanish away when we do as the self-crucified Paul: "We endure all things so that we should not hinder the gospel of Christ" (1 Co 9:12). Therefore, we must live as Paul. "I have become all things to all men so that I might by all means save some" (1 Co 9:22). As Jesus moved out of His "comfort zone" in heaven in order to go to the cross, we too must move out of our “comfort zones” to live the crucifixional life.

Though we may not forsake all when we move out of our comfort zones, we must at least understand that all we possess belongs to the Lord. When one obeys the gospel, his attitude toward his possessions changes.

Before obedience to the gospel one consumed all things upon his own lusts. But after obedience to the One who gave all for us, our possessions become the opportunity for us to preach the gospel to others. It is a transformation of thinking. We move our own minds out of our heads in order to move in the mind of Christ.

THE RESURRECTIONAL GOSPEL

Living the resurrectional life is the evidence that the gospel is alive in our lives. Herein is revealed the power of the gospel to inspire a paradigm shift in our lives. We remember what was preached on Pentecost that first cut people to the heart:

Foreseeing this, he [David] spoke of the resurrection of the Christ .... This Jesus God has raised up .... Therefore, being exalted at the right hand of God .... God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ (At 2:31-33,36).

The people were stunned by the news of the resurrected and reigning Lord Jesus Christ, “They were cut to the heart” (At 2:37). What cut the people to the heart was the gospel of the resurrection and reign of Jesus. The man Jesus was made Lord and proved to be the Christ (Messiah). It was by the power of His resurrection that God proved that He was the Son of God (Rm 1:4). The resurrected and reigning King Jesus, therefore, is the power that motivates the transformation of our lives.

The Holy Spirit rehearsed the power of the resurrection in the lives of men and women who truly believed that Jesus was raised from the dead. He wanted us to realize that if we extract the fact of the resurrection from Christianity, then our faith is simply just another religion. So He began His rebuke of some in Corinth with the question, “Now if Christ is preached that He rose from the dead, how can some say among you that there is no resurrection” (1 Co 15:12). “*But if there is no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not risen. And if Christ has not been raised, then our preaching is vain and your faith is vain” (1 Co 15:13,14).

And if Jesus was not raised, “*Then those also who have fallen asleep [died] in Christ have perished” (1 Co 15:18). If He were not raised, then we are to be pitied for our foolish faith that He was (1 Co 15:19). So “if the dead are not raised, let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die” (1 Co 15:32).

But since He has been raised, then this changes everything. The power that motivates a moral paradigm shift in our lives is our faith in the resurrection and current reign of Jesus Christ. Paul said as much in Colossians 3. The prelude to Colossians 3 is Romans 6:4:

Therefore, we are buried with Him [Christ] through baptism into death that just as Christ was raised up from the dead through the glory of the Father, even so we also might [be raised up from the waters of baptism to] walk in newness of life.

Paul introduced his motivation for living the resurrectional life by referring to the Colossians’ former baptism into Christ. “If you then were raised with Christ [from the waters of baptism], seek those things that are above” (Cl 3:1). Because the Christian has believed in the resurrection, he was buried with Christ in baptism in anticipation of the final resurrection to come (Jn 5:29). The power of the resurrectional life is in the resurrection of Jesus, for His resurrection assumes His present kingdom reign. This is the power that refocuses our attention to His reign in heaven. Our minds are turned off those things that are on this earth in order to focus on the reigning King Jesus who is seated at the right hand of God (Ep 1:20,21; Hb 8:1).

Believing in the resurrection of Jesus is the impetus to “put to death your members that are on the earth: fornication, uncleanness, passion, evil desire, and covetousness, which is idolatry” (Cl 3:5). It is the power to “put off ... anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy speech ...” (Cl 3:8). Belief in the resurrection of Jesus empowers us to transform our lives into the image of our King.

Since we have put off the old man of sin in the waters of baptism (Rm 6:6), we “have put on the new man, who is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him who created him” (Cl 3:10). Therefore, our belief in the resurrection moved us to the grave of water to join Jesus in His burial. Through our belief in the power of the resurrection and His reign, we are driven to lead the resurrectional life after coming out of the tomb of water.

Christians will always live in a world of moral degradation. It is the way of the world. If Christ was not raised from the dead, then we have no reason to be repulsed with the moral degradation of the world. If Christ has not been raised, then there is no such thing as “moral degradation,” for we are free to live as we choose. There are no moral rules.

But if Christ has been raised from the dead, then everything changes. God sees the world through the resurrection, for in the resurrection He proved to us that Jesus was His Son (Rm 1:4). And since Jesus was His Son who came into the world, then the world will eventually be held accountable to the moral standards of our King. “He who rejects Me,” Jesus said during his earthly appearance, “and does not receive My words, has one who judges him. The word that I have spoken, the same will judge him in the last day” (Jn 12:48).

The time is coming when God will judge “the world in righteousness by the Man [Jesus Christ] whom He has ordained” (At 17:31). Eventually, “we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ” (2 Co 5:10). Knowing that we will give account before the resurrected Son of God inspires us to live resurrectionally according to the standards of His word. The gospel of the resurrection is our motivation to stand confident in the fact that Jesus will come to raise us from the dead (See 1 Th 4:13-18).

GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM REIGN

It all started with the historical statement, “Now when they [the Jews] heard this [the resurrected and reigning Son of God], they were cut to the heart” (At 2:37).

Something on that Pentecost in Jerusalem two thousand years ago was spoken that caused a traumatic response from the hearts of about 3,000 people. What Peter preached was not sweet Jesus, meek and mild. He did not preach church. He did not initially preach repentance and baptism. But something he did preach eventually led to the world being spiritually turned upside down by the change in life-styles of about 3,000 people. He preached the resurrected King Jesus.

Peter’s initial gospel message began with King David. King David of Israel knew that the authority of his kingdom reign always originated from heaven at the throne of God. Therefore, when God promised that He would in the future set Someone on his throne, David correctly concluded that the One who would eventually reign on his throne would rule from heaven with the authority of God. By the Spirit, David prophesied of such a reign in Psalm 110:1: “The Lord said to my Lord, ‘Sit at my right hand until I make Your enemies Your footstool.’”

All who were in attendance on that memorial Pentecost two thousand years ago knew the prophetic statements of David in reference to his throne. Peter’s message helped them to connect the dots. In announcing the resurrection of Jesus, he convinced them that “this Jesus” whom they had crucified was the “Lord” about whom David had spoken. He was the One whom the Father had promised would be seated on the throne of David. Peter proclaimed that the man Jesus was the Man. It was gospel news that Jesus was resurrected and reigning on David’s throne.

This same Jesus, whom they had previously known only as a good Teacher from Galilee, was raised up by God to be seated on the throne of David (At 2:32). This same Jesus was at the time of Peter’s pronouncement, “both Lord and Christ” (At 2:36). This was Peter’s initial gospel message. This was all he had to say in order to cut to the heart many in his audience. When people understood that Jesus was the reigning Son of God who is coming again to take vengeance on those who do not know Him, then they were cut to the heart. They were subsequently moved to submit to Peter’s instructions to obey this gospel news (See 1 Th 1:6-9).

We must explain from the rest of the New Testament where Peter did not have time to go. The same Jesus about whom he spoke was at the time he delivered this gospel message, reigning as King of kings and Lord of lords (1 Tm 6:15). All authority in heaven and on earth had been given unto Him (Mt 28:18). All things had been put under His feet, and He was the controlling head over all things (Ep 1:22). Even angels and all earthly authorities and powers had “been made subject to Him” (1 Pt 3:22). “God also has highly exalted Him and given Him the name that is above every name” (Ph 2:9).

The Hebrew writer did not want us to understand that Jesus’ reign was limited to a national kingdom as that over which David reigned. On the contrary, he wanted us to understand that King Jesus' reign extended far beyond David's reign over Israel alone. So with the following words, the Hebrew writer clarified the present galactic kingdom reign of Jesus from heaven over all things:

You have put all things in subjection under His feet. For in subjecting all things to Him, He left nothing that is not put under Him. But now we do not yet see all things put under Him (Hb 2:8).

On Pentecost, Peter was speaking to unbelieving Jews. At the time he addressed these Jews, they were under the kingdom reign of a new King in heaven. It was now time for those who were the true Israel by faith to be transferred unto the kingdom reign of the new King (Cl 1:13).

Those who initially heard Peter's announcement were not the church. At the time, and during the ministry of Jesus, most Jews did not believe that the One about whom David prophesied was the Son of God (Mt 16:18,19). On Pentecost, however, Peter informed them that there had been a change of kingship in heaven, and that the resurrection proved Jesus to be more than a good Rabbi from Nazareth. For the first time in history, Peter announced the good news (gospel) that Jesus was proved to be the Son of God through His resurrection and that He was now reigning in heaven.

On that day about 3,000 believing Jews were transferred unto the kingdom reign of Jesus by their obedience to the gospel. They were before their obedience to the gospel under the kingdom reign of Jesus for about a week. However, they were not members of the church of obedient subjects, for the church was established on Pentecost by their submission to Jesus' existing reign. They submitted to the King who had already ascended to the right hand of God in heaven only about a week before. In other words—don't miss this point—King Jesus was already made King of kings over all things in heaven and on earth BEFORE the first announcement of His kingdom and reign was made by Peter on the day of Pentecost in Acts 2.

We must emphasize this point because there is a subtle misunderstanding that is persistently made by some against the present gospel reign of Jesus to which the initial subjects of this reign submitted. It is asserted that the kingdom of Jesus and His church are the same, and thus the reign and kingdom of Jesus are now limited to the church. Unfortunately, those who assert this misunderstanding of the present gospel reign of Jesus fail to recognize that they are minimizing one of the vital truths of the gospel message that cut about 3,000 Jews to the heart on the day of Pentecost. By teaching a limited reign of Jesus, they are cutting the heart out of the gospel reign that Peter preached on Pentecost that moved men and women to be cut to the heart.

The totality of the gospel entails the incarnation of the Son of God (Jn 1:1,2,14), His atoning death for our redemption (1 Co 15:3), His resurrection that proved Him to be the Son of God (Rm 1:4; 1 Co 15:4), His ascension to be head over all things for the sake of the church (Ep 1:22), His present kingdom reign and priesthood over all nations of the world (Hb 8:1), and His final coming to take us to our eternal home (1 Th 4:13-18).

If we limit Jesus' present reign only to those of us who have submitted to His gospel reign, then we are cutting a significant piece out of the message of the gospel. We are limiting the reign of Jesus, and thus weakening the power of the gospel that includes His present headship and reign over all things for the benefit of the church (See Ep 1:22,23).

The kingdom of Jesus and the church are not the same. The members of the church are the obedient subjects of the kingdom of Jesus on earth. However, the kingdom of Jesus presently extends from heaven and far beyond the church of obedient subjects. It extends to angels, earthly authorities and powers. Jesus is King of kings and Lord of lords, and those kings and lords over whom He reigns are not all members of the church.

Even Satan is under the kingdom authority of Jesus, for it will be Jesus who has the authority to cast the old serpent into fire and brimstone (Mt 25:41; Rv 20:11-15). Even during His lower state of earthly ministry, Jesus had authority over all demons. One terrified demon even cried out to the incarnate Son of God, "I beg You, do not torment me!" (Lk 8:28). If Jesus had such authority over demons even while He was on earth, then we are amazed at the authority He now has as King of kings and Lord of lords over the universe. The knowledge of His present kingdom authority is our inspiration to change our lives.

If Jesus' reign were limited to the church, then it would be easy to be fearful of supposed demons creeping around in the night if King Jesus had no control over them. Those who teach that the kingdom and church are the same need to take another look at what they are teaching in reference to limiting the galactic kingdom reign of the Son of God. They are preaching a limited King Jesus who has limited power and limited influence in the affairs of man and over the kingdom of darkness. They are opening the door of opportunity for all the end-of-time false prophets to speculate that Jesus is yet to come in order to rule over the world.

We must keep in mind that Jesus presently has authority over all for the sake of those who have submitted to the gospel of His reign. Remember, the church is composed of all those who are obedient subjects of the kingdom reign of Jesus, but not all the kingdom of Jesus is composed of those who are the church. Though we may not now see all things subject to the reign of Jesus, as stated by the Hebrew writer (Hb 2:8), there will come a time in the future when King Jesus will subjugate all things, and then cast the wicked and Satan into eternal destruction (2 Th 1:6-9). It will be then that He will return kingdom reign to the Father (1 Co 15:28). It will be then that we shall forever be with our King and Lord Jesus. And finally, it will be then that all this world will pass away with all its evil and suffering. This indeed will be the gospel (good news) of the coming kingdom of heaven where we will dwell in peace.

LEGAL RESTORATION

It was very difficult for the Jews of Jesus' day to accept the ramifications of the gospel. It was difficult because of the nature of the bondage of the religion into which they had brought themselves. Judaism was so contrary to the gospel of grace.

Judaism, as many religions today, was based on countless traditions that had become the religious heritage of the Jews. At the cost of having an engaging relationship with people other than Jews, even with the Samaritans who had a similar historical religious background, the Jews had a difficult time relating with those who professed other people. Subsequently, "religious policemen" arose out of Judaism in order to guard and enforce strict obedience to the traditions of the Jews and to guard the Jews from even eating with those who were not Jews (See At 11:2,3). And just in case there was a difference of opinion in reference to interpreting the codes of the religion, there were religious lawyers (scribes) who would settle disputes. Legal restorationists always have a court of judges and lawyers (See Js 2:4; 4:11).

It was not that the Sinai law of Moses was the problem. All the debate was over the added interpretations and examples that the Pharisees and scribes had attached to the law. When Jesus said in the Sermon on the Mount, "You have heard that it was said ... but I say unto you," He was not contrasting the Sinai law of Moses with what He would later reveal (Mt 5). He was contrasting the gospel with the Jews' interpretations of the law. He was setting the stage for the great conflict that would soon arise during His ministry and after the Holy Spirit revealed to the apostles all truth in reference to the gospel of grace (See Jn 14:28; 16:13,14). There was new wine coming that would burst asunder the old wineskins of the legal religion of Judaism.

The legal restoration of Judaism arrived in Palestine during the few centuries before the revelation of the gospel through Jesus. We better understand the ministry of Jesus that the Holy Spirit recorded in Matthew, Mark and Luke when we understand that after the Babylonian captivity which ended in 536 B.C., there was a call for restoration among the returning Jews. The Jewish writer Matthew made the statement, "And after they were deported to Babylon" (Mt 1:12). It was as if he wanted to alert us to a time when there was a change coming in the Jews' restoration movement. The change would be difficult because the Jews had struggled for centuries to get to where they were religiously by the time Jesus came into the world.

While in captivity, the Jews had been so estranged from the Sinai law that they had established countless interpretations of the law that they codified with the law. By the time Jesus arrived, the Jews' religion was no longer the Sinai law alone, but the law plus many other religious regulations. There were the written traditions of the Mishneh, Talmud, and interpretations of the Torah. During the Babylonian captivity, new orders were established as the Pharisees and scribes of the law. In Jews' separation from the temple, synagogue assemblies were inaugurated with synagogues being built throughout the Roman Empire. The synagogues were not a part of the Sinai law.

During the fourteen generations from the Babylonian captivity to the coming of Jesus, the religious leaders of the Jews had established many religious rites and ceremonies that became the Jews' religion (See Mt 1:17; Gl 1:13). It was into this arena of legal restoration that Jesus was born and the gospel announced. The nature of Judaism became the definition for the legal restoration that Jesus confronted during His ministry. The same confrontation continued as the disciples went forth to preach the gospel.

By the first century, the additions of interpretations and religious customs had moved the religious leadership of the Jews away from the heart of God. In fact, in order to keep the people entangled in the legal restoration of the Jews, guardians of the traditions protected the religious heritage of the Jews. Their protection of the traditions of Judaism was so stringent by the time the gospel was revealed, that Paul, who was engrossed in Jewish religiosity, proclaimed through the Spirit, that that in which he and the other Jews were involved was actually the “Jews’ religion” (Judaism) (Gl 1:13). It was this “legal restoration movement” of the Jews after their captivity that eventually nailed Jesus to the cross and stoned one of the first messengers of the gospel (At 7:54-60). Legal restoration is always at odds with gospel restoration.

The post-captivity restoration of the Jews was not God’s revealed faith to Israel on Mount Sinai. It had by the time of Jesus become a conglomeration of accepted interpretations of the law and added traditions. It was into this strict legal restoration of the Jews after the captivity that Jesus came with the freedom of the gospel. This was indeed the background for the statement of Paul in a letter that was directed specifically to the invasion of such legal religionists into the gospel-obedient church of Christ: “But when the fullness of time came, God sent forth His Son” (Gl 4:4). Gospel restoration always glows brightly to those who are entangled in the throes of legal restoration.

This was not a casual inscription of Paul’s literary attack against the legal restorationists of some Jewish brethren who had come in among the disciples of Galatia. Since God knew that the gospel would bring a gospel restoration in the midst of legal religiosity, He simply waited until legal religion was at its zenith before He revealed the gospel. It would be in this way that the gospel restoration of Jesus would be clearly revealed to be in contrast to Jewish legalism.

In their religious zeal after the captivity, the religious leaders of the Jews set themselves on a course of legally restoring their faith in Palestine. Unfortunately, they did so by trusting in their performance of law by which they presumed to establish their own righteousness, and thus justification before God. In their ignorance to perfect their righteousness before God, the Jews went beyond the Sinai law. “For they being ignorant of God’s righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God” (Rm 10:3).

Where the legal restorationists of the Jews went wrong was their attempt to guard the Sinai law of Moses with countless regulations and behavioral practices that surrounded the keeping of the law itself. In doing such, they lost sight of the intent of the law. When Jesus came with a gospel restoration, the Pharisees and scribes came complaining to Jesus, “Why do Your disciples not walk according to the tradition of the elders?” (Mk 7:5). The disciples did not so walk because Jesus was revealing to His disciples a gospel restoration that was soon to be revealed on a cross and announced in a Pentecost sermon.

So Jesus rebuked the religious policemen of Judaism: “For laying aside the commandment of God, you hold the tradition of men” (Mk 7:8). Invariably, legal restorationists will exalt their traditions and methods of obedience of the law above the law itself. And because of their zealous religious spirit, they will seek opportunities to debate their opinions when they judge that someone is not walking according to their established religiosity.

But the legal restorationist will not stop there. Jesus explained. “All too well you reject the commandment of God so that you may keep your own tradition” (Mk 7:9). For a present-day example, the legal restorationist will argue and debate over the legal performance of something as the Lord’s Supper, but in his zeal of debate he will lose sight of the unifying purpose of the Supper itself.

The legal restorationist will legalize worship with certain ceremonies in order to validate that he has in his behavior carried out “true worship” according to law. But at the same time, he sits in the assembly with a heart that is far from God. The legal restorationist will always end up as the legal restorationists of the Jews: “This people honors Me with their lips, but their heart is far from Me” (Mk 7:6). The legal restorationist is always in a quandary over the performance of his acts of worship, while at the same time his heart is far from the heart of God in the performance of his legal actions. His worship is heartless because he seeks to legalize worship.

The legal restorationist will sometimes heartlessly argue his case with others, but will satisfy himself with the assumption that he has already won the argument. He will list his supposed victories in religious discussions because he has won a battle by heartlessly throwing opinion after tradition against his opponent in order to prove his point.

The legal restorationist Saul was sincere in his efforts to defend the Jews’ religion. He was heartily zealous, but his zeal was based on ignorance of the heart of God. He later confessed as a gospel-transformed apostle, “I was formerly a blasphemer and a persecutor and injurious. But I obtained mercy because I did it ignorantly in unbelief” (1 Tm 1:13). His confession begs the question: When legal restorationists debate their opinions and traditions with gospel restorationists, are they not revealing their unbelief in the power of the gospel to transform lives?

Legal restorationists can always be identified by their willingness to contend. Now we understand why Paul exhorted Timothy that the leaders of the flock of gospel believers must not be contentious (1 Tm 3:3). And in the context of some argumentative brethren in Corinth, Paul wrote, “But if anyone seems to be contentious, we have no such custom, nor the assemblies of God” (1 Co 11:16). Paul was gospel driven because he was a gospel restorationist. But some of those in Corinth who were contentious, were not so. Therefore, Paul instructed both Timothy and Titus as to what must be done when faced with a legal restorationist: “Reject a factious man after the first and second admonition” (Ti 3:10). In fact, he instructed both Timothy and Titus not even to show up at meetings with those who are contentious (See 1 Tm 1:3,4; 6:3-5; 2 Tm 2:23; Ti 3:9).

For the legal restorationists, the recording of the earthly ministry and teachings of Jesus was for the purpose of outlining a dissertation on law. Some Bibles are printed as “red letter” editions. The “red letter” editions of the records of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John originated out of a desire to make sure that the readers of the Bible correctly identified some supposed codified mandates that came directly from the mouth of Jesus. While the “black letters” identified the gospel behavior of Jesus, the “red letters” somehow revealed “commandments” from Jesus that were more important than the gospel example that Jesus lived.

The legal restorationist, therefore, reads and labors over his Bible with the purpose of finding legalities in the pronouncements of Jesus, while minimizing the gospel example of the life of Jesus. People sometimes do such with the teachings of Paul. It was for this reason that Paul exhorted the Corinthians, “Be [gospel] imitators of me [in my behavior] even as I also am of Christ” (1 Co 11:1). The gospel restorationist reads and labors to discover the gospel example of Jesus and Paul that reveals the heart of God.

Legal and gospel restorationists study the Bible for two different reasons. Each uses the Bible from the viewpoint of two different perspectives. Legal restorationists are often searching the word of God for scriptures to win debates and identify the “liberals” in the church. They are often searching for laws by which they can justify themselves legally before God. Gospel restorationists, on the other hand, are motivated to search the Scriptures in order to discover the gospel of the grace of God that motivates them to cry out “Abba, Father!” They subsequently ask their Father for instructions as to how they would live the gospel.

The legalist ends up with pride and boasting, and an attempt to self-justify himself according to perfect law-keeping. Gospel driven people of faith, however, end up remembering the words of Jesus, “Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted, [etc.]” (See the entirety of Jesus’ explanation of the nature of the gospel driven saint in Mt 5:3-12.)

We must not miss the conclusion of Jesus’ “beatitudes”: “Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness sake, .... Blessed are you when people insult you and persecute you ...” (Mt 5:10,11). It is in the nature of legal restorationists to persecute those who seek God’s righteousness through gospel behavior, as opposed to self-justification through perfect law-keeping. We must not forget that legal restorationists put Jesus on the cross and stoned a disciple named Stephen who lived and preached the gospel. Legal and gospel restorationists are inherently opposed to one another.

If one today were born out of a legal restoration movement, then it will often be difficult for him to transition into a gospel restoration. When he does make the transition, he often brings with him the baggage of his legal religiosity. Self-righteousness will often follow him after he comes forth from the waters of baptism. For some time it will be difficult for him to walk in the newness of life in Christ after having been set free from efforts to keep law perfectly in order to feel righteous before God. So Paul would remind such people, “For sin will not have dominion over you, for you are not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14).

We caution ourselves about this because most of the Jews of the first century did not obey the gospel. Their hearts were hardened to the gospel of grace that flows from the heart of God. It was intentional that the gospel first confront those who were embedded in legal restorationism. The prophet Isaiah revealed, “He [God] has blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts” (Jn 12:40). After obedience to the gospel, it often takes time for those who were previously blinded and hardened by legal religion to see the light of the freedom that is in Christ. Obedience to the gospel calls for a complete transformation as to how one relates to the God of grace.

God would take ownership of the hardening aspect that the gospel has on those who refuse to obey the gospel. The gospel offers the opportunity for people to harden their hearts against the heart of God. When one has confidence in the performance of his own righteousness, it is quite difficult for him to have faith in the righteousness of God that was revealed through Jesus. When one has for years walked by sight in his own righteousness, then it is sometimes difficult to walk by faith in the grace of God (See Rm 9:18; 10:1-21).

Therefore, when the gospel went forth into all the world, “Some were hardened and did not believe” (At 19:9). We could even apply a statement here to legal restorationists that was made specifically in reference to the Jews: “But their minds were hardened. For until this day the same veil remains in the reading of the old covenant, which veil is done away in Christ” (2 Co 3:14). The legal restorationist is always veiled with his legal righteousness in performance of law. He is veiled to the point that he cannot understand the freedom that gospel restoration offers.

In order to defend gospel restoration, and to guard the church against legal restorationists, the Holy Spirit used a former legal restorationist to defend gospel restoration (See Ph 3:1-8). He used the apostle Paul who wrote to the Philippians in reference to his former legal performance of Judaism, “I count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord” (Ph 3:8). Paul explained that he wanted to “be found in Him [Christ], not having my own righteousness that is from law [keeping], but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness that is from God by faith” (Ph 3:9).

Paul tried the legal restorationism of the Jews. But he found it wanting. When he finally realized the righteousness of God that was revealed through the gospel of Jesus Christ, he responded by releasing all those things he counted profitable in the Jews’ religion.

In the preceding statement is the transfer of one from the kingdom of darkness in legal justification by works of law into the kingdom of the light of the gospel of Jesus Christ (Cl 1:13). In this transfer, we would follow Paul. He had experienced the continual guilt that legal restoration brings into one’s life, a guilt that always leaves one on his bed at night wondering if he has performed properly all the mandates of his religion. After the transfer, Paul, and those to whom he wrote, were encouraged to “rejoice in the Lord always. And again I say, rejoice” (Ph 4:4). And to those brothers and sisters who were being recruited to return to the legal restoration of the Jews (Gl 4:17), he mandated, “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1).

GOSPEL RESTORATION

Paul’s letters to the Christians in both Rome and Galatia are the Holy Spirit’s defense of the gospel. These two documents would be the “bill of rights” for those who once lived under the bondage of law, but found freedom from religion through the gospel of God’s grace. Gospel restoration calls for a return to the gospel of grace as opposed to a return to the demands of perfect law-keeping as a means to stand just before God. For this reason, gospel restoration stands against religion, for religion is defined by strict adherence to a system of religious codes whereby one would attempt to justify himself before God through law-keeping and meritorious good works.

The gospel is good news because the sufficient atonement of the cross sets us free from having to sanctify ourselves through our own religious behavior. This gospel appeal was stated clearly by Paul: “By works of law no flesh will be justified in His sight” (Rm 3:20). Therefore, we are “justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rm 3:24). We are thus “not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14). These statements of Romans establish the foundation upon which the gospel restoration rests. And to be clear, these statements are saying that one cannot be saved on the basis of keeping law perfectly. When one goes wrong, atonement cannot be made for sins by doing good works. The premise of legal restoration and gospel restoration are contrary to one another.

Legal religion places one under the bondage of having to self-sanctify one’s self by keeping perfectly the rituals of a particular religion in order to be saved. Within the rites of religion there is always some system of self-sanctification by which one can atone for violations against either God or the rites of the religion. But if Paul says that any attempt to keep even the law of God perfectly is impossible, then certainly keeping all the unique rituals of any particular religious group is totally impossible. Paul’s point in reference to our relationship with God’s law is that “there is none righteous [under law], no, not one” (Rm 3:10). The same can be said of one’s efforts to obey all the rules of his or her particular religious group in order to justify one’s self before God.

As the Jews who had established their own righteousness as a religion (Rm 10:3), we sometimes think we can devise a system of self-sanctification in order to be justified before God. The problem with any system of self-justification is that such systems of religion are inherently egocentric. We are led to boast one against another because of either our religious performances or assortment of atoning good works. But in the eyes of God, the Holy Spirit responds, “And if [we are saved] by grace, then it is no more by works [of law or good works], otherwise grace is no more grace” (Rm 11:6). Therefore, since we are saved by God’s grace, then there is no room for boasting in reference to our performance of law or good works. “Where then is boasting? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? No, but by the law of faith [in the grace of God]” (Rm 3:27). Religion and gospel are contrary to one another.

The legal restorationist always falls short because he falls short both in his performance of the laws of his religion, as well as the law of God. On the other hand, the gospel restorationist is always confident. His confidence is not in himself in reference to his performance of law and rituals, but in the grace of God who performed for him on the cross.

Our confidence is not in our performance of law, or self-sanctifying good works to atone for our failure in our performance of law. Our confidence is in Christ Jesus and the grace that was revealed at the cross. It is this confidence that we seek to restore to the hearts of men. We seek to restore the “confidence we have through Christ toward God” (2 Co 3:4).

Our confidence is not in ourselves, least we create for ourselves an opportunity to boast. Paul wrote to those of Achaia in reference to some among them who boasted in their religiosity. So he asked the Achaians to bear with some foolish comparisons on his part “so that I may boast a little” (2 Co 11:16). Paul took the opportunity to boast of his life in order to shame those in Achaia who trusted in their performances.

Paul’s boasting was actually a mockery of those who would boast in their meritorious works in order to sanctify themselves. So he sarcastically rebuked those who suffered little for Jesus. “What I speak,” he wrote, “I do not speak as the Lord, but as in foolishness in this confidence of boasting” (2 Co 11:17). So “seeing that many boast according to the flesh, I will boast also” (2 Co 11:18). If there were an opportunity for comparing works (accomplishments) of the flesh—Paul considered such comparing foolishness—then he listed the hardships of his incarnational living (2 Co 11:22,23). But he did so, as he stated, out of foolishness. He went beyond their works by revealing the suffering he personally endured as a result of living the mind of Christ (2 Co 11:24-27). Paul sought to embarrass those who would take pride in the performance of their work-oriented religion.

We must not overlook the application of what Paul stated in the context of 2 Corinthians 11. Unique religious groups are maintained solely because all the adherents of the groups commonly maintain the rituals and ceremonies that identify each particular religion (denomination). This is what some in Achaia were doing, for in doing this they were offering their religious performances as a testimony to themselves and others that they were right and Paul was wrong. Through their self-sanctifying performances, therefore, they were seeking to draw attention away from Paul and to themselves.

This is always the appeal of the religionist who seeks to trust in the rich heritage of religious codes that identifies his or her particular religious group. Legal religionists trust in their heritage that is identified by the performances of their religion that have been handed down to them by their forefathers. They do this in order to have confidence in their faith. However, in the context of 2 Corinthians 11, Paul sarcastically mocked such reasoning and behavior as Elijah mocked the Baal prophets on Mount Carmel who religiously cut themselves in order to validate their faith (1 Kg 18:27).

When religionists, as some in Achaia, start “comparing themselves among themselves,” then we know that they have moved beyond the foundation of the gospel (2 Co 10:12). We must not forget that different religious groups exist because the adherents compare their religious heritages among themselves. For this reason, they can never have gospel unity among themselves because each particular group is exalting his “rich” heritage above others. Gospel restoration tears down all this nonsense.

Restoration of the gospel means that we can have no confidence in our performance of the rituals of our particular religious group, law or good works. One of the central statements that defines gospel restoration is 2 Corinthians 4:15: “For all things are for your sakes, so that the grace that is reaching many people may cause thanksgiving to abound to the glory of God.”

It is the gospel of grace that motivates thanksgiving. “For by grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves [in the performance of unique rituals, laws or good works], it is the gift of God; not of works, lest anyone should boast” (Ep 2:8,9). We are not saved by our meritorious behavior of law in conforming to any system of religion. We are saved by God’s actions on the cross. And in thanksgiving of the grace of God that was revealed on the cross, we work. The gospel restorationist is identified by his obedience to law and works because of his gratitude for what he has already received through the cross. We are not saved in order to boast of what we seek to acquire through our religious performances.

We are thus “created in Christ Jesus FOR good works” (Ep 2:10). We must not allow our desire to boast to change the preposition from “for” to “by.” We are not created in Christ by good works. Through obedience to the gospel in baptism into Christ we come into the sanctifying realm of the blood of Jesus, and thus we are justified freely before God (Rm 3:24). “Freely” means that our justification was in no way accomplished through our performance of either rituals or law-keeping in order to come into Christ. “Freely” means that there need be no supplementing of the grace of God. It is for this reason that baptism is never a meritorious obedience to law, but a heartfelt response to the gospel of grace. This is why the Holy Spirit used the phrase “obey the gospel” to refer to baptism (See 2 Th 1:8; 1 Pt 4:17).

When one understands the realm of the sanctifying blood of the Son of God, he seeks to come into this realm of grace by being buried with the One who created this realm of grace (See Rm 6:3-6). Newness of life is thus in Christ because it is in Christ that one has the privilege of walking in the continual cleansing of the blood of Christ (1 Jn 1:7).

Our salvation is not accomplished by our performance of law in Christ, neither is it accomplished through performances of self-sanctification. There is for those who are in Christ the total and continual cleansing by the sanctifying blood in Christ. Jesus offered the atoning sacrifice for our sins once and for all time. Sanctification was accomplished for everyone in Christ at the cross. When we speak of atonement, therefore, “this He did once for all when He offered up Himself” (Hb 7:27). “By His own blood He entered once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption [for those who are in Christ]” (Hb 9:12). “Once for all” means that there can never be any supplementing of the blood offering of the cross with our presumed self-sanctifying efforts to complete the cleansing blood of Jesus.

Now listen to this: “*By this will we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all” (Hb 10:10). Every time we think we can sanctify ourselves through our own works of merit, then we must remember that we are denying the “once for all” sufficiency of the sanctifying blood of Jesus on the cross. Through our works of merit, we are minimizing the effectiveness of His blood. Self-sanctifying religiosity minimizes the power of the gospel (Rm 1:16). As long as one lives a life of attempted self-sanctification, he or she can never experience the full joy of a gospel restoration.

And herein is the devastating blow to those religious groups who seek to sanctify themselves by strict adherence to the traditions of their fathers. They honor their fathers in the keeping of the heritage of their religion above the sanctifying power of the blood of Jesus on the cross. We must not forget that there is no salvation in any church. Salvation is not in church, for the church is the assembly of the saved, and the saved do not sanctify themselves.

The gospel restoration seeks to restore the sufficiency of the cleansing blood of Jesus at the cross. We seek to restore in our lives the full power of the gospel. Legal restorationists seek to be sanctified by the blood of Jesus in conjunction with obedience to religious rites, law or meritorious good works. Legal restoration is thus defined as religion by the self-sanctifying efforts of the adherents to a particular set of rules. But the gospel restorationist walks in gratitude and thanksgiving because of his faith in the sanctifying blood that flows freely from the cross of Jesus.

This is “the faith that was once for all delivered to the saints” (Jd 3). This “faith” was not a body of doctrine. It was not a code of laws. This is the faith that excludes religious performances by which we would seek to sanctify ourselves of sin before God (Rm 3:27). This is the faith that trusts in the gospel of God’s grace as opposed to trusting in our own performance of law and works. It was on the foundation of this faith that Paul wrote to all of us to “work out your own salvation with fear and trembling” (Ph 2:12). It is not that we are working for our salvation. We already have it! We must not forget that because we are already His children, “it is God who works in you both to will and to work for His good pleasure” (Ph 2:13). We are His “workmanship” because His grace drew us into Christ through the gospel, and subsequently we walk in thanksgiving of His grace (Ep 2:10).

Gospel restoration means that we trust in the sufficiency of the sanctifying power of the blood of the cross. It means that we need not attempt again to sanctify ourselves through perfect law-keeping and meritorious works of religion. In Christ, we already have the sanctification by His blood as we live the gospel (1 Jn 1:7). Through the sanctification of His blood, therefore, we are justified before God. Again, we are “justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rm 3:24). And “*having been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rm 5:1). Therefore, “having now been justified by His blood, we will be saved from wrath through Him” (Rm 5:9). Glory hallelujah!

This is the gospel that must be restored in the religious world that continues in the fruitless self-sanctify-ing efforts to be justified through religious performances of law and good works. Restoration of the gospel has a tremendous appeal to those who know that they are in the bondage of their own religiosity.

The mistake that many make is that they appeal to those who are in the bondage of legal religiosity with just another legal-based religion. If we are legally seeking to be justified before God, then we have no gospel freedom in Christ to offer to those who are also living under the bondage of legal religiosity. In other words, if we are legally defined and not gospel defined in our identity, then we have no appeal to those who are living under the bondage of their own legal religiosity. Unfortunately, if we feel that we have all the rules figured out, with a scripture under every point of a doctrinal outline, then we have lost our appeal of the gospel of freedom to those who have the same legal system of religion.

Gospel restoration is not an appeal to law, but an appeal to grace. If our appeal is to the religionist who is living under the same bondage under which we are living—self-sanctification through perfect law-keeping—then there is no drawing power from the grace of God. God’s grace is not discovered through law-keeping. Law is discovered when we discover grace. Is this not what Paul meant in Romans 8:15,16?

For you [Christians] have not received a spirit of bondage again to fear [in trying to perfectly keep law], but you have received a spirit of adoption by which we cry, “Abba, Father!” The Spirit Himself bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God.

GOSPEL GATHERINGS

There is no command in the New Testament that states that Christians must fast. But in Acts 13:1-3, when Paul and Barnabas were about to go on their first missionary journey, we see the early Christians in Antioch fasting in preparation for the mission. We wonder why these Christians would fast for such an epic journey to preach the gospel, even though there were no commands to fast.

In the absence of a command to fast, we see the fasting of the Antioch disciples as an indication of their seriousness to preach the gospel to the world through Paul and Barnabas. But without a command to fast for the occasion, we still wonder why they fasted? When Jesus said that His disciples would fast when the bridegroom was taken (Mt 9:15), could it be that when Jesus was taken away through death, and then ascension to heaven, that they would then after Acts 2 fast in preaching of the gospel message to the world?

We have also noted that there is no command in the New Testament to partake of the Lord’s Supper every first day of the week when the disciples come together. But we see the first Christians doing so, both in Troas, and by deduction in the Achaian city of Corinth. In the absence of a direct command to partake of the Supper on the first day of the week, we find Christians throughout the world assembling and remembering the gospel of the Christ on Sunday. We wonder why? Could it be that those who understand the greatness of the gospel are moved without command to celebrate the gospel when they come together?

We need not wonder long when we consider the power of the gospel. Gospel-driven people need no law to fast when a special mission to preach the gospel is under consideration. Gospel commitment naturally calls for fasting when the gospel is going to be preached. Connected with prayer, fasting is only natural in order to call on God when a gospel-driven disciples send forth ambassadors of the gospel into all the world.

As it would be spiritually unnatural for gospel-obedient saints not to pray and fast for gospel missions, it would also be spiritually unnatural for them not to remember the gospel when they come together in assembly. In fact, it would be quite revealing if there were an assembly on Sunday when the Supper of the Lord did not take center stage for the occasion. If the Supper was not the primary focus of a Sunday assembly, then we would be suspicious concerning the motives of the people who were gathered in attendance.

Consider this for a moment. Christians are the church of the Lord Jesus Christ because the members have all obeyed the gospel of Christ (1 Co 1:12,13; 12:13). They have believed in the incarnational entry of the Son of God into this world because the Father so loved us (Jn 3:16). They have subsequently responded to the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God on the cross. They have rejoiced over the good news (gospel) of the empty tomb that proved Jesus to be the Son of God (Rm 1:4). And, they continue to believe in the gospel reign of the Son of God at the right hand of the Father (At 2:32-36; Hb 8:1). There is good news yet to come when the risen Son of God comes again from heaven with His mighty angels (1 Th 4:13-18; 2 Th 1:6-9). There is a great deal of good news that Christians have to celebrate when they come together.

In response to the gospel journey of Jesus into this world in order to take us out of this world, we have believed in this gospel event. We have thus obeyed the gospel by immersion into the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus (Rm 6:3-6). We have obeyed the gospel of Christ, and subsequently, we have been added by God to the universal church of Christ (At 2:47). Now then, what would gospel-obedient believers naturally seek to do when they gather in assembly on the first day of the week? Would it not be to remember that which, or the One, who motivated them to assemble in the first place?

When we speak of partaking of the Lord's Supper on the first day of the week, no commands are needed for gospel-obedient people to do so. Only those who are still influenced by legal religiosity need a command. But no command is needed for those who have obeyed the gospel. They need no command for them to remember the gospel when they come together on the first day of the week since the gospel is the central reason for coming together. In fact, it would be unusual for gospel-obedient believers not to partake of the Supper that reminds them of the purpose for which they have come together in honor of their Savior.

Since Jesus Christ is the very purpose for obedient saints to gather every first day of the week, then their remembrance of why they are the saints of God is only natural when they assemble.

In fact, it is for this reason why we would question the assembly of those who had no intention of remembering the gospel of Jesus Christ through the Supper when they come together. The center-of-reference to some assemblies may be a gathering of narcissistic religionists. By narcissistic we mean that the assembly is focused primarily on themselves. Some eloquent speakers seek an assembly before whom they can perform their sermons. They thus seek to inspire through eloquent speeches in order that people "turn the channel" to them again the following Sunday. They presume, therefore, that the people have showed up for them. Some attendees seek a musical concert for the pleasure of their ears. They too are narcissistic in that they attend for themselves to please themselves. The assembly, therefore, becomes an opportunity to be self-centered, and thus entertained.

And then there are those who enjoy a good social gathering with religious friends of a common heritage. These give honor to the fathers of their traditions, and subsequently, use every Sunday morning as an opportunity to renew their membership in the church social club that gathers under a unique name on Fifth Street and Main.

It is true that each attending member of a church may have some of the preceding motives in mind when attending a particular assembly. However, if the preceding motives—and others—are the primary reason for checking off one's attendance chart on Sunday, then those who attend as a collective have to a great extent moved away from gospel motivation as the primary focus of their assembly.

In another book we wrote of an encounter with a preacher who had come across a border into a country we were visiting. We knew the preacher when we recognized him coming out of a food store. After the usual surprised greetings, we eventually came around to ask him why he had come from such a great distance and across the border. He simply replied, "We have no fruit of the vine back home for the Supper, so I came to buy a supply for the brethren."

Surprised? We should not be. With such consideration gospel-obedient believers consider the importance of the Supper in assemblies that honor Christ. Gospel-driven people will do unusual things to make sure that they express their gratitude for the atonement of the cross, the gospel reign of Jesus, and His gospel coming again. They want to be holding up a cup of the "blood" when He arrives in the clouds.

Preachers who are not narcissistic—as the preacher we encountered—will assist in any way so that the assembly of gospel-obedient saints release their gospel-responsive hearts in proclaiming the death, resurrection and reign of Jesus through the Supper. The saints need no commands to do such. They simply cannot help themselves but to remember the Lord for themselves, and remind the Lord to come and fetch them from this cruel world. These are those who are a part of the gospel restoration movement that is presently sweeping across the world. They are leading the church in a gospel restoration movement.

GOSPEL IDENTITY

The primary reason for gospel-obedient saints to show up at the assembly on Sunday is to proclaim the Son of God as their Savior and to celebrate their commitment to the covenant they have with God. The assembly of the saints centers around Christ, the only mediator we have with God (1 Tm 2:5). This is the very foundation upon which Paul made the concluding statement of Romans 16:16: “Greet one another with a holy kiss. All the churches [assemblies] of Christ greet you.”

The word in this text that is commonly translated “church” is the Greek word “assembly” (ekklesia). When Paul wrote to the Christians in Rome with the statement, “all the churches (ekklesia) greet you,” he was reassuring the Christians in Rome by reminding them that they were not alone. There were other assemblies of Christ throughout the Roman Empire who were also meeting together in order to proclaim Jesus as Lord and Christ, and their Savior. They were publicly doing so through their participation in the Supper of the Lord. Each assembly of saints was identified as an assembly of Christ because the saints came together to proclaim through the Supper that Jesus was the Christ and Son of God (See Mt 16:18,19). He was Lord of lords (1 Tm 6:15).

Legal identity and sectarianism were far from Paul’s thinking when he made the statement of Romans 16:16. He certainly had no intention of establishing a legal name for the church. He had just written an entire Spirit-inspired dissertation that resoundingly denounced that Christians were part of a legal sect in the bondage of self-justification (Rm 6:14). He proved that we are not under perfect law-keeping, and thus made no attempt in this final chapter of his glorious epistle to legally name the church.

There are some who are quite inconsistent in their interpretation and application of passages as Romans 16:16. In the passage, to greet one another with a holy kiss is an imperative (command). However, reference to the “churches of Christ” is simply a declarative statement. Some would make the declarative a command, while making the imperative of the holy kiss a declarative. When names and traditions of a legal restoration become heritage theology, it is difficult to transition to the gospel of grace.

Paul wrote Romans in order to state that we are not under the demands of keeping law perfectly. We are under the gospel of grace. He would certainly not have contradicted himself when he came to the final chapter of Romans. His proposition throughout Romans was that we are “justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus” (Rm 3:24). He eventually concluded, “Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of law” (Rm 3:28). “For sin will not have dominion over you, for you are not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14).

If we would seek to revert to justification through perfect law-keeping, then we would be returning to the law of sin and death (Rm 8:2). By the time Paul came to chapter 16, he wanted his Roman Christian readers to know that they were not alone, for others were assembling under the name of Christ and were celebrating their victory over sin by the grace that was revealed through Jesus Christ.

With that said, those of the assembly of Christ, therefore, can never find their identity in a legal name. The church can never be identified by the members’ establishment of some system of legal assembly, and thus become a religious sect among other sects. It is for this reason that established legal acts of worship can never identify the assembly of gospel-driven people. As soon as gospel-identified people morph into a legal identity, they are no longer under grace, but under meritorious law-keeping, and thus under the law of sin and death. It is their celebration of the gospel of grace that identifies the people of God.

Paul’s entire argument in Romans and Galatians was that God’s people are identified by a grace response to the heart of God apart from law. They are gospel-driven, not law-driven. And for this reason, they can find no comfort in perfect law-keeping. Their comfort is in the gospel of the grace of God. It is not that they have to obey the law of God. It is that they want to in response to faith in the grace of God.

Does this mean that Christians are not under instructions from God because they have been justified before God by trusting in His grace? Paul would answer, “Do we then make void law through faith [in God’s grace]? Certainly not! On the contrary, we establish law” (Rm 3:31). Gospel motivated children establish law in their lives by asking in thanksgiving that their Father should instruct them as His children. Grace-saved people are thus fervent students of their Father’s instructions (Bible) because for their overwhelming appreciation of their Father’s grace. On the other hand, cries for grace are hollow when they come from those who do not study their Bibles.

When the saints digress from gospel motivation to be instructed by their Father, to identifying themselves through their own meritorious obedience by law-keeping, then they know that they have become another sect as other religious groups that are not gospel-motivated by faith in the grace of God. When we identify ourselves in name only, then we know that we have become a sect of meritorious law-keepers, or a group of tradition keepers who seek to protect our identity by name only. We have exchanged a gospel restoration of grace for a legal restoration movement of law-keeping.

Those who are sectarian often boast in the rules of their sect. It is for this reason that sectarianism is inherently boastful in order that the adherents of the sect legally identify themselves as a unique sect. Subsequently, legal restorationists who trust in their ritual-keeping sectarianism take pride in the rules of their identity. Such people should be reminded of what the Holy Spirit said of those who seek to boast in their legal righteousness: “Where then is boasting? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? No, but by the law of faith [in the grace of God]” (Rm 3:27).

The members of the body of Christ assemble to celebrate the fact that they are grace-saved people, and not self-justified by their perfect law-keeping. The Lord’s Supper is the centrality of their assembly because they celebrate the fact that they are not a sect that is identified by law-keeping. They are identified as grace-respondent disciples of the One who was revealed as the Son of God at Calvary through His incarnational offering (Mt 27:54).

Those who are still struggling to meritoriously obey legal acts of worship in order to prove their identity have missed the point. Grace-motivated disciples assemble on the first day of the week because they are of Christ, not because they feel compelled under law in order to validate themselves as the church through law-keeping. If they were to assemble in order to validate themselves as the church through meritorious obedience to legal acts of ceremonial worship, then they would be contravening the gospel of grace by which they are to be motivated. If they seek to be under a “law of worship,” then they are no longer under grace (Rm 6:14). If one can ceremonially perform his perfect worship through assigned rituals, what need is there of grace?

In our efforts to be transferred unto the gospel restoration of the Son of God we often bring with us theological baggage from our former residency in legal religion. It is simply a contradiction to assert that we are a grace-defined church of God, while at the same time, we seek to legally identify ourselves as a church through meritorious laws of worship.

We must refer to those religious groups who see no need to assemble around the table of the Lord to express their gratitude for the gospel of God’s grace. We must reflect on their motivation for assembly. If they partake of the Supper only periodically, then they only periodically proclaim Jesus Christ as the primary personality for their assembly (1 Co 11:26). They do so because they have simply minimized the importance of the Supper by their infrequent observance of the Supper.

We would correctly assume that those who have not obeyed the gospel in baptism would have little motivation to celebrate the gospel when they assemble. Narcissistic worshipers rarely celebrate the gospel simply because the purpose for their assembly is often not gospel focused. When our assembly is on “me,” then we have little desire to remember “He” (Jesus). But when our assembly is always focused on the incarnational, resurrected, and reigning Son of God, then it is not possible to assemble without remembering through the Supper who He is and our calling on Him to return.

Those who have obeyed the gospel need no commands to remember the gospel of Jesus when they come together. They need no law for a weekly proclamation of the gospel during their assemblies. Gospel celebration is a natural response of gospel-obedient people.

It is for this reason that the encouragement of Romans 16:16 is just as relevant today as it was when it was first penned two thousand years ago. There are thousands of assemblies of the saints around the world today who are continually celebrating the Christ who gave Himself as an atoning sacrifice on the cross of Calvary. The members of these assemblies need no law to meritoriously act out some form of worship. Their observance of the Supper of the gospel of Jesus identifies the One on whom they focus when they come together in assembly.

When Jesus Christ is the star attraction of our lives, we thirst to glorify and remember Him around His table “as-often-as” we can. And when all the elements can be provided when we come together in the “assemblies of Christ,” it is unthinkable not to commune together with our Savior around the table.

After all our attempts to be identified legally as the disciples of Jesus, our identity still rests on the foundation of how Jesus said we would be identified as His disciples. There is nothing complicated about this identity as it was clearly revealed in the following statement:

A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another; as I have loved you, that you also love one another. By this will all men know that you are My disciples, if you have love for one another (Jn 13:34,35).

Chapter 12

GOSPEL HOPE

The gospel story has not been finalized. There is one last event that will conclude history and sum up all that was planned before the creation of the world (See 1 Pt 1:20).

Life would be an existence of despair if there were no hope of life after death. The gospel, therefore, would mean nothing if there were no final chapter of hope to survive death. What good would be a faith without any future beyond enduring the trials of this life? Without hope, we would be as Paul wrote, “If we have hope in Christ only in this life, we are of all men most to be pitied” (1 Co 15:19). And if there were no life after death, then enduring life would be most difficult. The hope that this life is not all there is gives meaning to life itself. The gospel, therefore, is good news for our sanctification from sin only in view of the fact that we will exist beyond death. But if there is no resurrection coming that will deliver us into eternal life, then there is no good news about the sanctifying blood of the cross. Our resurrection to come validates the sacrificial offering of the Son in the past. In other words, there would have been no need for the cross if there were no resurrection to come.

In Jesus’ final words to His disciples before His crucifixion, He prepared them for hope.

I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to Myself, so that where I am, there you may be also (Jn 14:2,3).

This was the foundation upon which the early disciples based their faith as they went forth into all the tribulation of the world. About a week before the coming of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles in Acts 2, it took two angels to remind the apostles that there was a gospel of hope in Jesus’ coming again to receive them unto Himself. He left them at the ascension, but He would come again. After Jesus ascended, the angels said to the stunned apostles,

You men of Galilee, why do you stand gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus who was taken up from you into heaven will come in like manner as you have watched Him go into heaven (At 1:11).

This was the first announcement after His ascension that Jesus would come again and complete the gospel that was planned before the creation of the world (1 Pt 1:20). This was, therefore, an announcement of the final chapter of the gospel.

Our predicament of life was written by Isaiah and reaffirmed in quotation by the Hebrew writer:

Therefore, since the children are partakers of flesh and blood [that will eventually die], He [the Son of God] also Himself likewise partook of the same, so that through death He might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver those who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage (Hb 2:14,15).

We are in the bondage of a physical body that is destined to death. And if there were no resurrection, then our end would be hopeless and our fear of death would be justified.

But the promises of the Son of God that are validated to be real on the basis of His resurrection from the dead, has changed all this. In our obedience to the gospel, we have come into the new paradigm of eternal life (2 Tm 2:20; 1 Jn 5:11). The gospel of the resurrection means hope for a body that was destined to be terminal. The Son of God became flesh in order that “in His name the Gentiles [nations] will hope” (Mt 12:21). David declared, “Therefore, my heart rejoiced and my tongue was glad. Moreover, my flesh will also rest in hope [of the resurrection]” (At 2:26). Paul boldly stood before unbelievers and proclaimed, “I am being judged for the hope and resurrection of the dead” (At 23:6). Christians, therefore, can stand firm in the fact that they “have hope in God” (At 24:15).

The gospel of our hope is strong. It is so strong that it moves us to keep our focus on the cross. It compels us to look forward to the future coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. This was in the meaning of Paul’s words when he wrote, “For we are saved by hope” (Rm 8:24). Because of this hope, we remain steadfast in the gospel which we obeyed. Our hope, therefore, must be beyond this world in order to keep our minds focused on that which is above.

“Hope that is seen is not hope, for what a man sees, why does he still hope for it?” (Rm 8:24). Therefore, “if we hope for what we do not see, then with perseverance we wait for it” (Rm 8:24). It is the gospel of the final coming of Jesus that keeps our minds focused on Him who is above this world (Cl 3:1,2). Hope moves our minds beyond this life.

Hope in Jesus' coming again, therefore, is the foundation of stability upon which we base our gospel living. It is such because we can see beyond this life as a result of His resurrection from the dead. It is as Paul wrote to the Achaians, "Seeing then that we have such hope [in life beyond death], we use great boldness in our speech" (2 Co 3:12). Or, we might say that we "use great boldness" in our behavior.

It is the gospel of our hope in His coming again that leads to "rejoicing in hope, persevering in tribulations, continuing steadfastly in prayer" (Rm 12:12). Hope is the motivation by which we keep our lives focused on living the sanctified life. John wrote, "And everyone who has this hope in Him purifies himself, just as He is pure" (1 Jn 3:3).

Before we came into Christ, we were "strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world" (Ep 2:12). Death meant the end of everything. No comforting words could ever have been said to us on our death bed. But when we came into Christ, the funeral atmosphere changed. We now "believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so God will bring with Him those who have fallen asleep in Jesus" (1 Th 4:14). If we die before Jesus comes again, then we will be in that company of souls He will bring with Him when He comes for the living saints. For this reason, when we consider those brothers and sisters who have died, we "do not grieve as others who have no hope" (1 Th 4:13).

The funeral of the unbeliever is a scene of termination and sadness. But the funeral of the believer is a celebration of one who has been delivered from the trials and tribulations of this present world. Because of our faith in Christ Jesus, Paul wrote that there has come to us "the hope that is laid up for you in heaven, of which you heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel" (Cl 1:5). For this reason, we must not be tempted to move "away from the hope of the gospel" that we have heard (Cl 1:23). If we remain steadfast in our hope of His coming to take us home with Him, we will certainly reap the rewards of this hope.

Paul would ask all of us, "For what is our hope or joy or crown of rejoicing? Is it not you in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at His coming?" (1 Th 2:19). This is the gospel we preach to the world. This is the message of good news that brings hope of glory that is yet to come.

It is the desire of the evangelist to go forth with the gospel of hope in order that in the end, he may do as Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "... so that I may present you as a pure virgin to Christ" when He comes again (2 Co 11:2). Paul preached in order "to present you [the Colossians] holy and blameless and beyond reproach in His sight" (Cl 1:22; see Jd 24).

We eagerly yearn for this conclusion that validated the necessity of the incarnation of the Son of God. Paul was evidently so overcome with excitement about this matter that when he finally finished the chapter of the gospel of the resurrection in 1 Corinthians 15, he simply stated in his final words, "Come, O Lord" (1 Co 16:22). John evidently experienced the same emotional euphoria when he finished inscribing the visions of Revelation. "He [Jesus Christ] who testifies these things says, 'Surely I am coming quickly.' Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rv 22:20).

We too cannot but thank enough "our Lord Jesus Christ Himself and God our Father, who has loved us and given us everlasting comfort and good hope through grace" (2 Th 2:16). So we walk "in hope of eternal life which God, who cannot lie, promised before time began" (Ti 1:2; see 3:7). We will, therefore, remain to be the faithful house of God "if we hold fast to the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm to the end" (Hb 3:6; 6:11,18). It is the gospel of hope that we have as an "anchor of the soul" (Hb 6:19). It is an anchor of our soul because it is based on the foundation of "the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead" (1 Pt 1:3). Peter's concluding words are appropriate:

Therefore, gird up the loins of your mind. Be sober and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought to you at the revelation of Jesus Christ (1 Pt 1:13).

Epilogue

We do not know much of what will transpire when Jesus comes again. It would thus be fruitless to speculate concerning those matters that are beyond our empirical abilities to understand. However, we must caution ourselves about the speculations of those who presume to know much about that which has yet to be experienced, or revealed.

Though we may not know a great deal about what will be revealed, we can caution ourselves about believing those things that are contrary to the very nature of the gospel. This is especially true in reference to the incarnational dwelling of Jesus among us, and the revealed teaching of the Holy Spirit about living the gospel. There are some very important points to remember in reference to our hope of dwelling in eternity:

• Our hope is not in carnal things. In living the incarnational life after the example of the incarnate Word, we have spiritually grown to the point where we consider the things of this world not to be coveted when there are needs to fulfill (At 4:32). We have thus lived a gospel life where we counted as “dung” those things of the world that we once coveted to be the center of attraction in our lives (Ph 3:8).

When we obeyed the gospel, we refocused. Our minds have been focused on those things that are above, and not on the things of this world (Cl 3:1,2). We have left all for Christ. We could go on with the host of examples in the New Testament and in the lives of many we know who have forsaken the world in order to preach the gospel to the world. But throughout our entire lives of living the gospel, we have sought not to be carnal.

It would certainly be inconsistent to believe that heaven is a worldly place of dwelling. We have struggled all our lives to detach ourselves from that which is carnal. Would it be reasonable to believe that what we would inherit in heaven would be carnal? We lived to emotionally detach ourselves from the value of gold. Would we then assume that God will give us gold in heaven? The truth would be that gold is so worthless in heaven—we speak metaphorically—that it is used to pave streets.

Heaven cannot be that which we have denied throughout our incarnational living in this world. Heaven will not be an environment wherein gospel living will be reversed.

• Our hope is not vindictive. The Hebrew writer reminded his readers that vengeance was God’s business (Hb 10:30). And when Jesus comes again, He will come with His vengeance (2 Th 1:8). The point is that through the Scriptures the Holy Spirit has taught us that in living the gospel we must put away all vindictive feelings toward those who persecute us. When Jesus comes again, therefore, He will not put us in an environment where we can carry out vengeance on those who did us harm in our lifetime.

We must be cautious, therefore, about end-of-time prognosticators who seek to convince us that we will reign over our persecutors. Such a theology is vindictive. It is contrary to incarnational living. Such is contrary to the spirit of what Jesus uttered from the cross:

“Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing” (Lk 23:34).

• Our hope does not thirst for power. When Paul wrote that we now reign in life with our Lord Jesus Christ who is now reigning, he did not want us to assume that there was coming a time when we would rule over unbelievers on this earth (Rm 5:17). Such a teaching would be contrary to the spirit of gospel submission.

Our “spiritual” reign over unrighteousness would last as long as the reign of Jesus. And the reign of Jesus will terminate when He has subjected the last enemy, which is death (1 Co 15:26,27). It will be then that Jesus will return kingdom reign to the One who subjected all things to Him. “And when all things are subjected to Him, then will the Son also Himself be subject to Him who put all things under Him” (1 Co 15:28). Physical death will end with the resurrection. It will be then that the reign of the Son of God will also end. At that time our reign with Him will end.

We must be cautious about any theology that would assume that our spiritual reign with Christ now will be changed to a physical reign here on earth sometime in the future. Such hopes appeal to our carnal inclinations, and are thus totally contrary to the mind of the incarnate Son of God we sought to follow all our lives. We would ask why would God give us a hope that was totally contrary to the gospel of the incarnate Son of God? Why would He reverse the mind of Christ by which we have struggled to live with a carnal reign over the wicked on earth in the future?

We must always keep in mind that Jesus has prepared our character in life in order to coexist in heaven with others in a paradigm of eternal life. Any theology that contradicts what Jesus is training us to be now, cannot be true when He comes again. We can envision heaven to be a place where incarnate disciples of Jesus coexist with one another forever. This is the purpose of “church” as we learn to live with one another in preparation for eternal dwelling in the presence of God. In our restoration of the gospel as the centrality of our focus in life, we thus prepare ourselves with the mind of Christ in order to dwell with Him in eternity. It is necessary, therefore, that we restore the gospel as the motivation upon which we are transformed into a living example for Jesus.

Solutions To The Problem

The Holy Spirit knew that we needed a record of how the gospel affects our lives in any environment of the world. As with those recorded examples where Israel failed in her obedience to the will of God, the Spirit knew that we also needed a record of those in the early church who were struggling to grow spiritually in response to the gospel. We have in the New Testament, therefore, examples of gospel-changed lives, as well as those who struggled in their spiritual transformation.

If one has been the product of a legal restoration, or reformation, then he or she may have difficulty in initiating the power of the gospel in his or her life. If we approach the New Testament only as a legal book on doctrine, then we may struggle to move past legalities in order to experience the transforming power the gospel can have on our lives. The problem with approaching the New Testament only as a catechism of doctrine is that we cheat ourselves of understanding the impact that the gospel of grace can have on our lives. We also fail to understand why there were problems with some in the early church who did not respond to the power of the gospel in their lives.

The gospel is about how Jesus Christ, the Son of God, affects people. The gospel affects people both salvationally and behaviorally. Therefore, we find in the gospel not only how one comes into Christ, but also how one walks in Christ. We must approach our studies of the New Testament in the context of both areas. God seeks through the power of the gospel to establish a lasting covenant relationship with us, and then grow us into heavenly dwelling.

I grew up on a farm in the central American state of Kansas. My life after leaving the farm, and residing in many large metropolitan cities of the world, has offered me the opportunity to have a reality check in reference to the function of a Christian in the midst of millions. For example, this farm boy had great difficulty understanding contexts in Scriptures that were set in the urban environment of the first century. Most of the problems of the disciples that are recorded in the New Testament were problems that arose in the struggles of the early Christians to function as the body of Christ in urban centers. In fact, except in those encounters that Jesus had with people in a rural setting, most of the epistles deal with dysfunctions of the church in the city. When I moved to the city, it was then that I realized that much of the difficulties that the early Christians experienced were often unique to urban centers.

The city has a tendency to dent our personalities. We are around so many people that we often build emotional mechanisms to survive in the midst of so many people. This may be why we have a record of urban problems in the early church. The Holy Spirit wanted us to have a road map of spiritual growth in order to deal with any dysfunctional attitudes and behavior that the city produces in our personality.

The purpose of this book is to offer an aid in how to deal with church problems that may develop in any environment. We may have obeyed the one gospel, but implementing that gospel in our lives can be quite difficult in an urban setting. It is my prayer that this special focus on the dysfunctional behavior of the early disciples will help everyone to better understand that the gospel is so powerful that it will bring peace of mind and transformation even in the most difficult circumstances.

Sometimes we spend so much time in the New Testament discussing or debating matters of opinion that we fail to investigate the function of the early disciples as the organic body of Christ. In our quest to discover and implement doctrinal purity, we often overlook those areas of behavior where some early disciples dysfunctionally lived contrary to the gospel they had obeyed. More important, we minimized the example of those early disciples as they lived the incarnate mind of Christ (See Ph 2:5-8).

Even more striking in our dichotomous religiosity in these matters, we are zealous to bring an individual to the point of salvation in obedience to the gospel, but while he is still dripping wet, we fail to encourage the baptized believer to die daily while he or she lives the gospel they obeyed. The Holy Spirit wanted to exhort some in the Philippian church in this matter by reminding them that their behavior as disciples must always reflect the gospel they obeyed: “Only let your behavior be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Ph 1:27). When we later refer to the example of the Philippian disciples, we will discover that they took seriously to heart what Paul wrote in these words.

Since our behavior as Christians must reflect the incarnate Son of God whom we have obeyed, then it is imperative that we study in the New Testament those examples where the Holy Spirit recorded dysfunctions in the organic body as new Christians sought to live the incarnate Jesus in their own lives. We must turn to what was recorded with the same zeal by which the Holy Spirit encouraged the early disciples to consider the Old Testament examples. “For whatever things were written before [in the Old Testament] were written for our learning” (Rm 15:4). The same exhortation was written to the disciples in Achaia: “Now these things happened to them [the Israelites] as an example, and they were written [in the Old Testament] for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages have come” (1 Co 10:11).

Organic dysfunctions of the body of Christ in the first century were not recorded by the Holy Spirit for the simple purpose of filling in historical material for us to read. The record of these dysfunctions in the body is in our hands today for a purpose. Since all Scripture is “profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness” (2 Tm 3:16), then we would correctly assume that the Holy Spirit would record examples in the New Testament that we could examine, which examples illustrate dysfunctional behavior on the part of some early disciples. We must assume, therefore, that these recorded examples of dysfunctional behavior on the part of some were recorded for our correction and instruction in righteousness.

We must never allow all the noise that hovers around debates over matters of opinion to draw our attention away from organic dysfunctions that possibly reveal that we may not be worthy of the gospel. For example, we have found that we are quite hypocritical in this matter in reference to the Lord’s Supper. We will strive over incidental matters that surround the Lord’s Supper, when the Holy Spirit says at the same time, “Do not strive about words to no profit” (2 Tm 2:14). We divide over the Lord’s Supper that was instituted to remind us that we are to be one united body because of our common obedience to the gospel (1 Co 10:16,17). We sometimes become hypocritical humbugs in these matters.

The Holy Spirit wanted us to understand that when He recorded dysfunctional behavior on the part of the early disciples, He wanted us to be reprovved by the examples of bad behavior. And in being reprovved, He wanted us to refrain from such dysfunctional organic behavior that does not reflect the full power of the gospel in our lives.

The Spirit said this clearly through the pen of Paul: “If you then were raised with Christ [through obedience to the gospel], seek those things that are above” (Cl 3:1). The word “seek” in this statement goes far beyond mental assent. Reference is to letting our behavior “be worthy of the gospel of Christ” (Ph 1:27). When our minds are focused on the resurrected and reigning Son of God, then we are encouraged to behave in a manner that is worthy of the gospel. We will thus “put to death ... fornication, uncleanness, passion, evil desire,” etc. (Cl 3:5). In contrast to such dysfunctional behavior, we will put on “a heart of compassion, kindness, humility, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another and forgiving one another” (Cl 3:12,13).

It is through the power of the gospel that our lives are transformed from worldly behavior that is dysfunctional according to the gospel. The organic body of Christ functions at her best when all the members put away the dysfunctional behavior that is typical of worldly behavior. Paul's exhortation to the members of the body in Rome was not without his initial reminder that he was not ashamed of the power of the gospel that would not only save, but would also transform behavior (Rm 1:16). We must allow this power to transform our own lives.

Be not conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind [that is focused on things above], so that you may prove what is the good and acceptable and perfect will of God (Rm 12:2).

With the preceding thoughts in mind, we must establish a very important foundation upon which to interpret the historical statements concerning the function of the early organic body of Christ. We must not assume that the recorded historical accounts of the function of the body were arbitrarily placed in the New Testament by the Holy Spirit simply as statements of history. To do such would be assuming that the Holy Spirit simply wanted to give us a historical record of the early church. In this history, there were dysfunctions of the organic body. We would assume correctly, therefore, that all historical statements that are recorded in the New Testament are there for the purpose of teaching something greater than the historical record itself. Since the early gospel-obedient believers sought to live a life that was worthy of the gospel of Christ, then we must seek to understand where they failed in those areas of function that were not according to the gospel.

Since an encyclopedia of history could have been written by the Holy Spirit to give accounts of all the activities of the early church, we must conclude, therefore, that those cases that are given were recorded to teach specific lessons. This was the Holy Spirit's approach in recording key miracles in the life of Jesus.

Jesus did many other signs in the presence of His disciples that are not written in this book. But these are written so that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God ... (Jn 20:30,31).

When we come to the book of Acts, we must assume "that many other things happened in the early function of the church that were not recorded, but these events were recorded to teach how we should live according to the gospel." We therefore come to the record of the dysfunctions of the organic body of Christ that are recorded in the New Testament—specifically the book of Acts—in order to solve problems we encounter in reference to the function of the body of Christ. We thus consider the examples of dysfunction to have been recorded in order that we guard ourselves against doing the same.

DYSFUNCTIONAL CHALLENGES

From the beginning in Acts 2, the number of saints in Jerusalem grew from an initial infusion of about 3,000 gospel obedient members, some of whom were traveling visitors from throughout the Roman Empire for the Passover/Pentecost feast who later went home. The number of members grew to well over five thousand men a few years later (See At 4:4). These members were meeting in homes throughout the metropolitan area of Jerusalem at the time Luke inscribed the historical statement of Acts 4:4. If the 5,000 men of Acts 4:4 could be doubled to include the same number of women, and then conservatively add about two children per family, then by the time Luke made the statement there could have been well over 20,000 Christians in Jerusalem within a few years after the events of Acts 2.

Since there were no church buildings, civic halls, or public schools in which these Christians could meet on Sunday morning, of necessity they met in their homes. (The meetings outside in the temple courtyard of Acts 5:42 were evangelistic, not worship assemblies of the saints). The point is that the saints were meeting in homes throughout the city by the time the dysfunctional distribution to widows occurred that is recorded in Acts 6:1-6.

If we would suppose that there were an average of about twenty-five people who could meet in any particular home in Jerusalem, then this would be an approximate number of 800 assemblies of the disciples in different homes throughout the city. Because of our experience with the disciples meeting in homes, people of like-mind often gravitate to those with whom they feel comfortable. For example, those who speak a common language naturally gravitate to those house fellowships where a common language is spoken. The same would be true in reference to cultural similarities.

This would only be natural. In a small social environment, the most inner feelings of one's heart can be expressed only in one's native language or culture. And when there is a possible average of about twenty-five people in each group meeting in Jerusalem, then it was simply a natural thing that there be a common language that was spoken in each assembly.

We have found that most Bible interpreters forget this very important historical context of the early church in all the cities throughout the Roman Empire where there were Christians. Because Bible interpreters have ignored the house assembly and function of the early disciples, they often do not understand completely contexts as Acts 6 in the historical setting of the times. This has led to an inability on the part of some to establish an objective historical foundation upon which to understand the context of events that transpired. In other words, if one approaches the context from a large institutional church group as is common today, then he will have difficulty understanding what was happening in the context of Acts 6.

When we step into the historical context of Acts 6, the Grecian Jews who spoke Koine Greek were meeting in homes that spoke primarily the Greek language. These were Jews who evidently grew up in Greek-speaking areas of the Roman Empire, but later migrated to the metropolitan area of Jerusalem. And since they were probably migrants to the area, then they were possibly living in the lower economic suburbs of the city because they were not connected to the established financial heritage of the local resident Jews, which Jews spoke Hebrew, or Aramaic.

Those local resident Jews who spoke Hebrew, or Aramaic, were meeting in homes that spoke the common local language, possibly homes that were in the upper economic or established suburbs of the city. Because the approximate 800 assemblies were conducted throughout different suburbs of the city, we would certainly assume that none of the 20,000 members of the 800 assemblies knew all those who met in all the assemblies. This would especially be true if the house groups were located in different economic suburbs of the city. It would simply be unreasonable to think that all the members knew the approximate 20,000 plus individuals of the church of Jerusalem within the few years since the beginning in Acts 2. This would particularly be true because of the rapid growth of the church in Jerusalem, especially since Luke makes the point of growth when he introduced the problem of the neglected widows (At 6:1).

In small groups people naturally have a tendency to bond closely with one another. Those of a common language and culture simply gravitate to one another, and subsequently bond around their common means of communication. There is nothing abnormal about this. It is simply the way God made us. We can imagine, therefore, how difficult it would have been for many of the disciples in Jerusalem, who did not share a common language or culture, to know those of different languages or cultures. This would especially be true if there were new converts in many different suburbs of the city, and thus, many new assemblies since the initial Pentecost a few years before.

This would be a particular challenge for those groups in the upper economic, or locally cultured suburbs of the city. It would be difficult for them to know those of the lower economic suburbs. There were simply too many groups and too many differences for all the saints to know all the saints. This seems to be the historical setting that led to the dysfunction that is recorded in Acts 6. The Grecian Jewish widows were being "neglected in the daily distribution of food" because they were not known by the groups who were taking care of their own widows (At 6:1).

We do not know all the reasons for this neglect, but for some reason the lack of fair distribution was occurring among the disciples in Jerusalem after three or four years from the beginning of the church in Acts 2. Understanding how the early church solved the problem does give us a great deal of information concerning how the early disciples allowed the gospel to move them as an organic body.

The occasion of the problem also provides us with a "mission textbook" on urban evangelism. Jerusalem was a typical multiple-cultural city of the ancient world. The organic function of the church in such a city, therefore, provides a great deal of information on how the organic body of Christ should function in similar urban centers today.

Almost all cities of the world today are as the urban area of Jerusalem in the first century. If we can view the church as one throughout the city of Jerusalem—and we should—then we can begin to understand how the organic function of the body of Christ occurs in a multi-cultural environment wherein many languages are spoken. We simply need to keep in mind that people then are as people today. We should not think that because there is a two thousand year gap between them and us that we are different than they were in a cultural environment wherein many languages were spoken.

Chapter 2

URBAN DYSFUNCTIONS

The function of the church in large urban centers is different than the social environment of rural areas. Since the members of the body in urban centers are faced with special problems in reference to remaining in contact with one another, we believe the Holy Spirit recorded for us a situation of organic dysfunction in the historical context of the early church in order to help us learn some basic principles in reference to the function of the urban church.

The “neglect of widows” in Acts 6 was the ideal example to illustrate some of the obstacles the members of the body in urban centers must overcome. Specifically in this example, the church was challenged with fulfilling the mandate that widows are to be a part of the contribution of the church in any particular city (See Js 1:27). We are sure that the Jerusalem disciples fell short in other areas of function. However, this particular dysfunction in the area of the fellowship of the one body was revealing.

The care for widows and orphans defined the church as an organic body that revealed the heart of God (See 1 Jn 3:10-24). For this reason, the Holy Spirit moved the mind of Luke to record this historical case of dysfunction in order to give us solutions on how to function as the organic body, even in the complexities and complications of large urban centers.

A. Identifying dysfunctions:

The first lesson we learn from this historical incident is a dysfunction in the organic body in reference to the disciples’ responsibility to care for widows. Because the members in Jerusalem were meeting in different homes throughout the city did not justify this dysfunction.

It seems that some Hebraic groups had become so autonomous from one another that the Grecian widows actually became anonymous from them. Regardless of the cause, the dysfunction had to be corrected. Solutions had to be made in order to correct this problem in the function of the entire body in Jerusalem.

Keep in mind that the dysfunction in distribution to the Grecian widows was realized because there were those who saw it as dysfunctional behavior among all the members of the body. They realized that the organic function of the body among all the members who were assembling in the approximate 800 groups throughout the city was actually behavior that was not worthy of the gospel. It revealed that some were not living in a manner that was worthy of the gospel that brought all of them together into one organic body in Christ.

Great shepherds among us will always know their Bibles well enough to identify areas where we are not functioning according to the gospel. And when they speak out with Scripture concerning dysfunctional problems in the behavior of the body, the body must respond. This is the focus of Paul’s instructions to the elders of the body. In listing qualities that the shepherds must have before they are designated shepherds, Paul wrote that “an elder must” hold “fast the faithful word as he has been taught, so that he may be able by sound teaching both to exhort and refute those who contradict” (Ti 1:9). In the context of the Acts 6 dysfunction, though not mentioned in the text, there may have been elders who initially brought the matter before the apostles.

We must not be surprised with the suggestion that there were designated elders among the disciples at this time in the history of the church in Jerusalem. Paul and Barnabas designated elders in the cities of Lystra, Iconium and Antioch when the older Jewish men in these cities were only about six months in the faith (At 14:23). Simply because Luke does not mention elders in the historical narrative of Acts before Acts 11:30 is not proof that there were no elders in the early church of Jerusalem before Acts 6.

The matter of dysfunction in distribution was brought before the apostles only because the apostles—the source of all truth for the church—were still in the city at the time. The disciples, including possibly the elders, wanted to bring the “neglect problem” before the apostles in order to determine if there was any further revelation from the Holy Spirit on the subject of caring for widows in the urban setting in which everyone lived (See At 2:42).

We must consider this point in view of the promises that Jesus made to the apostles in John 14:26 and 16:13. During His ministry, Jesus promised the apostles, “The Holy Spirit ... will teach you all things [in reference to the gospel behavior of the church]” (Jn 14:26). The Holy Spirit “will guide you into all the truth” (Jn 16:13). So we would ask, Who gave the early church instructions to take care of the widows? In view of what Jesus promised the apostles in order that they teach the early church (At 2:42), we would conclude that it was the Holy Spirit through the apostles who informed the disciples that they had the responsibility of taking care of their widows as the church of Christ. In the case of neglect in Acts 6:1-6 we would correctly assume that the disciples came to the apostles in an attempt to receive more revelation on the subject of how the distribution must be conducted.

Since the church was in existence from four to five years by the time we get to Acts 6, it would be reasonable to conclude that some Jewish elders had been converted and designated elders in the Jerusalem church. This would be a valid assumption, especially in view of the fact of what was stated in Acts 6:7, that a great number of the priests were obedient to the faith. It would be logical to believe that there were designated elders among the several thousand Christians in Jerusalem at the time someone came across the neglect of Grecian widows. Either these elders, or some other concerned members, identified the “neglect problem” to be a flaw in the organic function of the body that was initially taught by the apostles. They knew the truth of God on this matter well enough to know that the “neglect problem” had to be corrected if they were to continue in the truth of the gospel.

B. Financial dysfunctions:

From the time of the initial zeal of the early disciples to have all things in common, something went wrong in reference to the common needs of the Grecian widows we read about in Acts 6. In the early days of the disciples, Luke historically recorded in Acts 2,

Now all who believed were together [as one body], and had all things in common. And they sold their possessions and goods and divided them to all [in the church], as everyone had need (At 2:44,45).

And then again this same financial function of the body was carried on by the time we come to the events of Acts 4. Luke again historically recorded, “Now the multitude of those who believed were of one heart and one soul” (At 4:32). Luke continued, “Nor was there any among them who lacked” (At 4:34).

However, by the time we come to Acts 6, we discover among the disciples in Jerusalem those who lacked. The widows lacked because they were being neglected.

From the days of the early birth of the church in Acts 2, and its continued obedience unto Acts 4, something went wrong by the time we come to Acts 6. It seems that for some reason some widows became lost in the massive growth of the early church. We might conclude that the lesson we learn from the development of the problem originated because of the extensive growth of the Jerusalem church. There was thus a breakdown in communication among the thousands of disciples in the city of Jerusalem.

C. Function of the one body:

Another lesson we learn from the “neglect problem” in Jerusalem was that there was no such thing as “church autonomy” among all the members of the church in Jerusalem. All the Christians in Jerusalem functioned as one organic body of Christ from the very beginning (See At 2:44; 15:4,22). They were one church regardless of whose house in which the members sat on Sunday morning. Their Sunday assembly at different locations did not divide them from one another as autonomous churches. The members remained as the one body in the city throughout the history of the church in Jerusalem (See At 15:4,22).

However, efforts on the part of the Hebraic groups to be independent from the Grecian groups may have been the source of the problem. And since the neglect was a problem, then any autonomous behavior on the part of the Hebraic groups was wrong. A natural result of autonomy is that groups often develop a sectarian spirit that keeps groups separated from one another. In the case of some groups in Jerusalem, their autonomy may have led some groups to be negligent in their responsibilities toward the whole body of disciples throughout the city who were meeting in other homes.

The fact that there were complaints, and subsequently a solution for the problem, clearly teaches that where the disciples sat on Sunday morning did not make them autonomous from one another. Neither did sitting in a separate assembly relieve them of their responsibility to minister to the Grecian widows of other groups.

If the possible 800 assemblies were indeed rightly autonomous from one another, then we should be complaining about their complaining. We would assume that each autonomous group should take care of their own widows, and thus, not make the “neglect” a “brotherhood issue.” If all the members in Jerusalem were intentionally behaving independently as autonomous groups, then the solution that the apostles later suggested would have been contrary to church autonomy.

We say the preceding because we ourselves live in a large metropolitan area that represents many different language and cultural groups. In a city area of over four million people, there are at least ten different language/cultural groups represented among the churches throughout the metropolitan area. Unfortunately, some church groups have little contact, and sometimes concern, for those groups that are linguistically and culturally separated from them. It is simply the way people begin to function when they are separated from one another in a large metropolitan area and without any means of transportation.

But because the world functions in this manner, does not mean that Christians can separate themselves from one another because of either language or culture. Since we have a tendency to separate ourselves from one another, then we need to heed the exhortation of the Holy Spirit that we should be “eager to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace” (Ep 4:3).

Understanding linguistic/cultural differences helps us develop a practical appreciation of what exists in most large urban centers in the world today. The Holy Spirit gave us some insight into this common challenge that we have when working in urban centers. He inspired Paul to reveal that God “has made of one man all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth [or city], and has determined their appointed times and the boundaries of their habitation” (At 17:26).

These are not “boundaries” that are drawn on a map. These are cultural boundaries that are often identified by linguistic differences. It is the way God naturally separated people from one another after the attempted efforts on the part of man to build a tower whose top would possibly reach unto heaven (See Gn 11).

If one has not experienced living in a metropolitan area wherein several languages are spoken among those who are of different cultural backgrounds, then it may be challenging to understand the natural human instinct of people to assemble under their own cultural or linguistic flag.

Throughout the world today there are thousands of cultural and linguistic “boundaries” that separate people from one another. These “boundaries” exist within the limits of most international urban areas of the world. It is simply a reality with which the church within these cultural centers must deal in order to be the one body of Christ. It is possible, therefore, that the Holy Spirit recorded for us the “neglect problem” in Jerusalem in order to help us understand means and ways by which we can evangelize and function as the one body of Christ in urban centers.

In Jerusalem in the first century, there existed at least two linguistic/cultural groups, specifically the Grecian and Hebraic Jews. The two groups had a common father in Abraham, but this did not mean that they were common in their culture or language. The fact that the Hebraic Jews seemed to have ignored the Grecian Jews suggests that they allowed their culture and language “boundaries” to be an excuse to ignore their responsibilities to function as the one universal body of Christ. They were at the time a dysfunctional organic body because some had forgotten the oneness that is produced by our common obedience to the gospel. They had forgotten what the Holy Spirit said to some Jewish brethren in Galatians 3:26-28:

*For you are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek. There is neither bondservant nor free. There is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus.

D. Unity dysfunction:

We mentioned the numerous assemblies in Jerusalem at the time the “neglect problem” occurred because of the unfortunate organic dysfunctions that resulted from the behavioral dysfunction of autonomy. This problem may possibly have crept in among the disciples in Jerusalem. Some of the groups in Jerusalem may have intentionally declared their autonomy because of their cultural identity and language similarity. Because of the extensive growth of the church, and in their efforts to be culturally identified, the Grecian groups may have naturally drifted away from the Hebraic groups. Autonomy, therefore, may have been the problem that led to the neglect of widows for whom the whole church was responsible.

The only time we read about autonomy among Christians in reference to widows is a statement made by Paul in his instructions concerning the widows of an immediate family. He began his instructions concerning widows with the commanding statement,

But if any widow has children or grandchildren, let them first learn to practice piety at home and to repay their parents, for this is good and acceptable before God (1 Tm 5:4).

If there are children or grandchildren, then the care of widows must be autonomous from the responsibility of the church. The physical family of children or grandchildren must assume the care of their own aged parents. If the children or grandchildren do not care for their widowed mother or grandmother, then Paul adds, “But if anyone does not provide for his own, and especially for those of his own household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever” (1 Tm 5:8).

Paul then extended instructions to the whole church in reference to the care of qualified widows. Those widows who have no children or grandchildren to care for them must be provided for by the church. However, widows must not be enrolled by the church for support if they are under sixty years of age (1 Tm 5:9).

Including other points of qualification, the widows over sixty become the responsibility of the whole church if they have no believing children or grandchildren to care for them (See 1 Tm 5:1-16). Regardless of where qualified widows assembled on Sunday morning, it is the responsibility of the whole church to enroll these widows for the distribution of care that is to be administered to the widows. These widows are the collective responsibility of the collective body.

It may help to apply this collective responsibility by understanding that when we are discussing the subject of widows, we are speaking of individuals. When groups become autonomous from one another there is the tendency to assign the care of widows to the particular autonomous group with whom the widow assembles on Sunday morning. But such a belief and behavior is contrary to the function of the one universal body of Christ.

In the context of Acts 6, individual widows of the entire city are under consideration. Neglect of individuals, not individual assemblies, was the problem. In other words, every individual Christian in every region where the body of Christ exists, has a responsibility to care for the individual widows of the church who have no children or grandchildren to care for them. If we need proof for this concept, we must read again the mandate of James in James 1:27. James wrote “to the twelve tribes who are in the Dispersion” (Js 1:1). But in verse 27 of the same chapter, he instructed, “Pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father is this, to take care of the orphans and widows in their affliction.” There is no “church autonomy” inferred in this mandate. Individual widows and orphans are the responsibility of every member of the worldwide body of Christ.

It is indeed the responsibility of the local disciples to care for the widows and orphans in their area. This was the case in Jerusalem. The disciples in Jerusalem cared for the individual widows in Jerusalem. It would have been likewise true that the disciples in Antioch were to assume their responsibility for the widows in Antioch. We would assume that the disciples in Antioch would not be responsible for the widows in Jerusalem, since the disciples in Jerusalem had the responsibility to care for the widows in their city. If the Jerusalem disciples did not care for the widows in their own city, then they would be dysfunctional in reference to the care of their own widows.

We say the preceding because of one statement that was made by the apostles in Acts 6:3: “Look out from among you.” There was dysfunction in Jerusalem, and thus those who were involved in the dysfunction in the immediate area had the responsibility to correct their own dysfunction. The disciples in Antioch could not look out from among the disciples in Jerusalem in order to solve a dysfunctional problem in Jerusalem. It was not the responsibility of the Antioch disciples to assume responsibility over those whom they could not function in a personal manner in the distribution of food. The seven had to be chosen from the disciples of Jerusalem in order that the church in Jerusalem could assume their responsibility of the widows in Jerusalem. This “neglect problem” was not the problem of the disciples in Antioch.

If we would apply the same principle to the care of orphans we would assume that it is the responsibility of the church in any specific area of the world to “look out from among themselves” those who would administer the distribution to those orphans who are in their area. However, we would also assume that those who were chosen by the church in a particular area could ask the universal body for help. But we must not forget that those who would ask for help in the care of orphans and widows in a particular region must have been selected by the church in the area where there was a need.

This must not be a case where an individual takes it upon himself to care for widows and orphans, and then makes an appeal to the universal body. If the universal body is to come to the aid of widows and orphans in other regions (nations) of the world where the contributors do not live, then the contributors must be assured that a “committee,” not an individual, has been selected by the whole church in the region where there is a need.

E. Work of the collective body:

We need to glean another lesson from the Acts 6 dysfunction by going one step further in understanding the organic function of the body. This point was emphasized when Paul wrote to all the Christians of all Achaia who occasionally met in Corinth for a united love feast. During the occasion, it was revealed that some were quite inconsiderate and sectarian. Paul rebuked the dysfunctional members for their competitive practices in reference to ministry. After reminding them of the diversity of ministry by which God ordained that the organic body function, he wrote, “But one and the same Spirit works all these things, distributing [gifts/ministries] to every one individually as He wills” (1 Co 12:11).

The church in all Achaia was a body of individuals who exercised their Spirit-given individual gifts in ministry. These individuals worked in their individual ministries as the one universal body of Christ. Paul therefore instructed, “For as the body is one and has many members [with different gifts], and all the members of the one body, though they are many, are one body [universally], so also is Christ [universally]” (1 Co 12:12).

We must not forget that “the body is not one member, but many” (1 Co 12:14). Though we as the one body “are many members,” we function as the one universal body of Christ (1 Co 12:20). It is erroneous to think that the church can be united only when all the members of the one universal body are sitting in the same assembly on Sunday morning. In fact, cultural and linguistic divisions (boundaries) are revealed when there must be three or four interpreters to interpret the message of the hour into all the languages of those who would be represented.

There is nothing wrong with the translation of the lesson into the language of all those present, but to force such in weekly house assemblies seems to be an effort of forced unity beyond common sense. (In another book we have dealt with the occasion in Corinth when translators—interpreters—were needed in the occasional assembly of all the Achaia house fellowships that is discussed in the context of 1 Corinthians 11-14. See Book 39, Fellowship at the Table, africainternational.org.)

We would conclude that each of the house assemblies throughout Achaia used one common language in each assembly on Sunday morning to accommodate everyone who was present. Those who spoke the language of a particular house assembly went to the house that spoke their language.

Common sense dictates that each language group has the freedom to meet when speakers of the assembly all speak the common language of the group. We have found throughout the years that it is quite naive to think that unity can prevail among individual members only when everyone sits at the same location on Sunday morning. Unity is not based on proximity in assembly, but common obedience to the gospel. If we would judge that unity among the members in a city must be based on close proximity in the same assembly, then we have developed a forced man-made unity that is simply superficial. It is an empirical unity that is not necessarily based on a unity of the spirit. Two people can be just as divided from one another whether they are sitting in one assembly or two different assemblies.

Now locally apply this function to the church in Jerusalem. Luke recorded that the number of the disciples in Jerusalem had increased to about 5,000 men. We have added wives and children, estimating that there could have been over 20,000 members who made up the church in Jerusalem by the time of the events in Acts 6. Now must all these 20,000 be assembled together at the same place in order to be the one united church in Jerusalem? Must they all be at the same place on Sunday in order to preserve unity?

Sometimes common sense should be used when understanding the historical function of the one united body of Christ in any particular area or city. Common sense dictates that the 20,000 did not meet at the same place on Sunday morning in order to sustain unity. Common Sense dictates that the 20,000 met in various homes throughout the city because there were no publicly-owned buildings in Jerusalem that would house this number of people.

The local Christians’ meeting in approximately 800 homes led to the problem of the neglected widows, not a problem of disunity. The solution for the “neglect problem” was not to assemble everyone together under one roof. The solution involved everyone looking out for everyone, regardless of whose house in which everyone sat on Sunday.

There were certainly challenges that faced the church in Jerusalem because of the necessity of the members’ meeting in so many different homes throughout the city. Because the Grecian Jews were meeting in their own assemblies—some would supposedly say autonomously—the Hebraic Jews possibly assumed that they were not responsible for the Grecian widows. It could have been as it is often said, “Out of sight, out of mind.” And since the Grecian Jews were out of sight of the Hebraic Jews, then the Hebraic Jews in their autonomous behavior possibly thought that they had no responsibility to share their contributions with the widows of other groups, especially if they were of another culture/language group, or possibly economic status.

If the Grecian Jews were primarily immigrant Jews to Jerusalem, then they may have been the lower income citizenship of the city. If they were, then it could have been that they could not financially care for some of their own widows. Since they were out of contact with the financially established Hebraic Jews, then we can understand how the “neglect problem” arose. The Grecian Jews may have been embarrassed to ask for help.

But someone did ask, for such neglect was contrary to the spirit of the gospel where members bear one another's burdens (G1 6:2).

In their neglect, at least the Hebraic Jews revealed their dysfunctional autonomous fellowship, if indeed they believed themselves to be autonomous from the Grecian house assemblies. However, we are giving them the benefit of the doubt that the Hebraic Jews did not know that the Grecian Jews were being neglected. At least we assume that Luke alerts us to this possibility when he introduced the dysfunction by saying, "Now in those days when the number of the disciples was multiplying" (At 6:1). The neglect may have been unintentional because of the great number of assemblies that were being established throughout the city because of the phenomenal growth of the church.

Luke does not record in the Acts 6 account that any racism was involved, for everyone involved was a Jew, except for a few proselyte immigrants. And since he did not mention racism as the problem, we must stay with the former conclusion that the Hebraic Jews were unaware of the situation.

There was a vast number of assemblies in the city. The natural thing is that house assemblies often become so bonded with one another in the commonality of their language and culture that they have a tendency to drift away from one another. They subsequently become anonymous from one another. At least the house assemblies in Jerusalem lost contact with one another when there were hundreds of house assemblies being established throughout the city as the number of disciples multiplied.

In the historical situation of Acts 6, it seems that the word "neglect" should be understood in the context that at least the distribution among the Hebraic widows was taking place. However, some house assemblies were simply bypassed by the Hebrew speaking groups and administrators because of an unintentional oversight. The Hebraic groups did not know the language of the Greeks, and thus, they naturally did not make an effort to go to those house assemblies that spoke Greek.

Whatever the real situation that caused the problem, the church in Jerusalem was dysfunctional in this matter as the one organic body of Christ. A solution had to be found to correct the disorder because their common obedience to the gospel brought all of them into one body of Christ whose members must care for one another. The exciting result of recognizing the problem was that the whole church worked together in order to solve the problem. The problem was solved because the members had the heart of God to work as one body in the city.

WRONG RIGHTS

Sometimes it is wrong to do right. When speaking of living the incarnate gospel of Jesus, this statement may seem quite odd. Nevertheless, in the organic function of the body of Christ, it is sometimes wrong for those who are gifted with special ministries to work in an area where they may not be gifted, or in reference to a need that should be passed on to others. This was the case in reference to the disciples in Jerusalem who sought to find a solution for the dysfunction concerning the neglected widows in Acts 6.

Since the apostles were still in Jerusalem at the time the "neglected widows" problem developed, they, as the accepted leaders—or at least the source of truth from the Holy Spirit—were faced with a functional problem among the disciples. There is a great lesson to be learned from how the apostles personally handled this problem concerning the care that the whole church in Jerusalem should render to the widows.

We are not told by Luke who brought the problem of the neglected widows before the apostles. We assume that the apostles were busy with their primary work of prayer and ministry of the word of God (At 6:4). Since prayer should be a ministry of all the disciples, in this case the apostles did not want their prayers to be marginalized by administrative duties that others could do. But specifically, it was their Christ-ordained ministry to deliver the inspired word of truth to the early church (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). This was especially important because of those who continued to come and stay in Jerusalem for the Passover/Pentecost feast. The apostles continued to teach those who journeyed to Jerusalem, for they were the only "Bibles" in town (At 2:42).

The last Passover/Pentecost feast that Luke mentioned was in Acts 2. However, before the event of Acts 6 took place a few years after the Passover/Pentecost of Acts 2, we must assume that the apostles were diligently receiving and teaching many others who continually came for the Passover/Pentecost feasts that followed the feast of Acts 2 (See Is 2:2,3; At 2:42).

It was the apostles' mission to go into all the world and preach the gospel (Mt 28:19,20; Mk 16:15,16). They were accomplishing this mission through those who were baptized during the Passover/Pentecost feasts that followed the Acts 2 event. Therefore, when the dysfunctional organic problem of feeding the widows in Jerusalem was made known to them, they replied, “It is not desirable that we should leave the word of God and serve tables” (At 6:2). In other words, they deemed it unwise to shut down their Bible classes in order to do the good work of administering to widows. This one statement opens a great door for understanding the ministry of the apostles in reference to the organic function of the early church. But it also leaves us a Spirit-inspired lesson to keep our priorities right.

In view of the necessity that the apostles not be diverted from their ministry of the inspired instruction of the church and world evangelism, it would not have been right for them to forsake these Christ-ordained ministries in order to serve tables. In this case, it would have been wrong for them to do a good thing. The apostles simply stated, “But we will give ourselves continually to prayer and to the ministry of the word” (At 6:4). In reference to the ministry of prayer, we would assume that these were special prayer sessions for those who were returning home to other lands after being taught by the apostles. But for sure their ministry of the word of truth to those who had come from great distances to the Passover/Pentecost feast must under no circumstances be interrupted. If they allowed their ministry to be interrupted by serving tables, then souls would have been lost.

We are sure that the apostles were confident that they should fulfill their destiny as Christ-sent apostles. They felt no guilt about saying “no” to a good work of serving tables. Neither did they allow others to make them feel guilty about not caring for the widows (See Js 1:27). When one is focused on doing what he or she believes is his or her God-given ministry, others should not make them feel guilty if they do not participate in another ministry. After all, in another context and situation, Paul wrote,

“Now there are many kinds of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are many kinds of ministries, but the same Lord. And there are many kinds of activities, but it is the same God who works all in all” (1 Co 12:4-6).

Paul concluded 1 Corinthians 12 with the admonition that the organic function of the body of Christ is based on the fact that gifted individuals work together as one body, regardless of the diversity of their gifts (1 Co 12:28). They do not work in completion with one another, or in conflict with one another, as did some in Corinth. In fact, the church can be an organic body only when all the parts function according to their purpose.

In the list of different ministries that God has designated in the body, “administrations” was one of those gifts. On the occasion of Acts 6, the apostles helped the early disciples to understand that “administration” was a special gift that was necessary to be recognized in order that the organic body function properly. So for this reason the apostles said, “Look out from among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Spirit and wisdom, who we may designate over this business” (At 6:3).

In other words, it was not the business of the apostles to leave their gifted ministry of special prayers and teaching in order to administer the distribution of food to the widows. It was not according to the God-defined function of the body that they leave their ministry in order to do the ministry of someone who was specifically gifted in administration. The gifted—which everyone is—must remember this point. This is especially true of those who are gifted in many areas.

Someone once said that if you want something done, then ask the busiest person to get the job done. This may be a true principle in the business world, but when considering ministries of the body of Christ, it is not necessarily true. In fact, doing such sometimes works against the function of the organic body of Christ. In the case of the busy apostles, such would have led to the loss of souls.

If the multi-talented person who is busy is asked to take on the task of another person, as was asked of the apostles, then the apostles would be diverted from their busy schedule of ministry in prayer and teaching. People who are very busy in the function of their gift must not allow others to divert their busy schedule to the point that they must forsake their own ministry in order to be involved in the ministry of another person. If they do leave their ministry, then the work will suffer for which they were gifted to do.

Those who are zealous in their particular ministry must not make others feel guilty if they are not likewise involved in their own ministry. The light of the gospel shines differently through different members of the body. A healthy body is the result of all the organs of the body functioning according to their purpose in order to maintain the function of the whole body.

Body parts must function together as one body. When any one part of the body says that he has no need of any other part of the body, then that part of the body that wants to stand alone becomes dysfunctional in reference to the function of the whole body. Therefore,

“the eye cannot say to the hand, ‘I have no need of you,’ nor again the head to the feet, ‘I have no need of you.’” (1 Co 12:21). Every part of the body must function in order that the body be organic. Each body part has no right to go idle by asking another body part to do its ministry.

Neither should one’s ministry be exalted above the ministry of another member. “On the contrary, more indeed, those members of the body who seem to be more feeble are necessary” (1 Co 12:22). Exaltation of one ministry over another is detrimental to the organic function of the whole body. Minimizing the “less honorable” members in their function is senseless.

And those members of the body whom we think to be less honorable, on these we bestow more abundant honor, and our less presentable parts have more abundant presentation” (1 Co 12:23).

Paul’s point to the Corinthians was in the fact that “if one member suffers [in his or her ministry], all the members suffer with it. Or, if one member is honored [in his or her ministry], all the members rejoice with it” (1 Co 12:26). Members in their ministries must function in cohesion with one another. Parts functioning in cohesion with one another simply means that each part must function in cooperation with all other parts of the body. The body is a team, and thus isolationists and loners must bring their spirits into cohesion with the rest of the body parts.

This is exactly what the apostles taught on the occasion of the function of the body in Acts 6. There was a dysfunction in the distribution of food to the Grecian widows, for only the Hebraic widows were benefitting from the existing distribution. The solution was not that the apostles leave their ministry in order to assume the task of others who had the gift of administration. The solution was in the fact that the members should look out among themselves in order to identify those who were gifted with administration in order to correct the organic dysfunction of the church at the time.

FUNCTION OF THE ORGANIC BODY

When a dysfunction of the body is identified, leaders who are both equipped in creating solutions for the function of body life, as well as taking the initiative to do what is right, will move into action. In the case of the Acts 6 problem that was presented to the apostles, the apostles and church leaders moved into action with solutions that revealed great wisdom on their part.

A. Consider the whole:

This was not a situation where mandates were made behind closed doors and handed down a chain of command to the church. We see no boards of authority in the early church. The apostles did not behave in this manner, and neither should we. As the accepted leaders at the time, and source of all truth, the first thing the apostles did was to call together “the multitude of the disciples” (At 6:2). This move on the part of the apostles called on the entire church to get involved in the solution.

Boards of authority seek to steal away from the whole church the opportunity of the church to find solutions for dysfunctions that affect the whole church. The actions of the apostles teach that it is always the responsibility of the whole church to identify and solve those problems that are in the realm of opinion. Even when the problem involves a doctrinal point, the entire body must go to the word of God in order to study those scriptures that give answers for the problem that has presented itself.

As previously noted, the apostles were the “Bibles” for the church. Jesus had promised that through them “all truth” would be delivered to the early disciples (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). Since the church had received from the apostles the responsibility to care for widows, then we assume that the church brought the “neglect problem” before the apostles in order to receive more revelation of truth on the matter. However, since the method of how the church would carry out the function of the distribution was a matter of discretion on the part of the church, the apostles’ wisdom on this occasion revealed that in the area of opinions, there was no revelation. It was an opportunity for wisdom and common sense to prevail.

The initial command to take care of widows was revealed by the Holy Spirit through the apostles. But the system, or method by which the command was to be carried out was a matter of opinion. Therefore, the “neglect problem” was not a problem that should be solved by the Holy Spirit through the apostles. It was a problem with which the disciples had to deal. The “neglect problem” revealed dysfunctional behavior on the part of the members, not a flaw in the initial truth that was revealed through the apostles to care for the widows.

The lesson here is that when a problem in reference to how a command of the Lord is dysfunctionally obeyed, the whole church must be involved in finding a solution for the problem. All leadership does in such matters is to identify the dysfunction, and then present the opportunity for all the members to work together as one united body in order to find solutions for the problem. Therefore, the church cannot give over to any board of authority that which the whole church should do in living the gospel. Living the gospel is an individual matter as a functioning part of the collective body of Christ.

When the church does find a solution, the solution must not be considered the law of the church. “Law” (truth) was the responsibility of the Holy Spirit through the apostles. If our solutions to problem solving are considered inspired by the Holy Spirit, then we have set aside the function of the apostles to deliver to the church “all truth” (Jn 14:26; 16:13). We must keep in mind that implementation of the law is the responsibility of the recipients of the law.

The fact that the apostles delivered to the church the responsibility to solve the problem, did not mean that the churches’ solution become the law of the church in distributing food to widows. We must keep in mind that this is often a temptation. And for this reason, the Holy Spirit did not allow Luke to write one word that described the means or methods by which the distribution was carried out. The Spirit did not want the example of how the Jerusalem church solved the problem to become a “law” for distribution among the disciples from that time on.

B. Function of the organic body:

In the case of distribution to the widows, the apostles threw the responsibility for solving the problem back to all the members of the body in Jerusalem. They said, “Look out from among you seven men” who will take care of this business (At 6:3). There seems to be no significance to the number “seven” other than the fact that to the Jews the number seven was symbolic of perfection. In the selection process, this is the only decision we see the apostles making.

When the seven were eventually selected by the church, all the apostles did was announce the selection. Nothing was said about the apostles giving their approval of the seven. In other words, we see no effort by the apostles to disqualify any church-selected individual of the seven. When the church put their stamp of approval on the seven men, even the apostles submitted to the decision of the church. Outside the revelation of “all truth” for the church, there was no such thing as “apostolic authority” that was practiced by the Christ-sent apostles of the first century.

What is significant is the fact that the 20,000 plus members of the body that we suppose were in Jerusalem at this time had to work together as one body in order to find and set forth the seven men. Boards of authority seek to usurp the opportunity of all the members to work together as the organic body of Christ. The members of boards assume that they must guarantee the function of the church by handing down dictates to the church. On this occasion, all the apostles did was give three points of qualification, and then allow the church to take it from there. The apostles did not function as a board of authority, for they did not allow the church to detour them from their ministry of prayer and teaching.

In this case, the common behavior of boards of authority was reversed. The church (the “selection board”) handed to the apostles their decision. The apostles suggested the simple guidelines of selecting seven men. But it was the church that made the final decision as to who would serve in the ministry. It was the committee of seven who decided how to solve the problem.

We assume that more than seven men fulfilled the spiritual guidelines set forth by the apostles. But it was the final decision of the church to make the selection of just seven men. After the church made the selection of seven men, the whole church then presented these men to the apostles for the simple task of making a public designation of who would be the seven servants of the church in order to solve the problem.

C. Qualified administrators:

The apostles gave some general spiritual qualifications that should be characteristic of those who would be chosen. The chosen should be men who would work among all the house fellowships. They would take the lead in making decisions concerning the distribution to the widows (At 6:3). The very nature of the ministry of distribution would assume the responsibility of making decisions concerning distribution. Such would conform to the Spirit’s instructions through Paul who wrote, “I do not allow a woman ... to be dominant over a man” (1 Tm 2:12). This would not restrict women from working with their husbands in the ministry, but the principle of male leadership should not be violated in reference to the leadership of the men in the distribution.

1. Honest report: Those who were to be chosen should be of “honest report” (At 6:3). Since the men would be handling a great deal of money, this was a practical qualification in reference to the character of the men. It was also a qualification that guaranteed that the men were known among most of the saints in Jerusalem. And because they were known, they were those who felt comfortable working among people, for that is what they were doing in order to have a good reputation.

2. Full of the Spirit: Men “full of the Holy Spirit” would suggest that they could formerly have had hands laid on them by the apostles to receive one of the miraculous gifts of the time (See At 8:18,19). We could assume that one of these gifts was the gift of administration (See 1 Co 12:28). However, in the selection process we assume that the church would recognize those who had a natural gift of administration. Being full of the Spirit certainly meant that they were Spirit-directed, not worldly minded, and thus tempted to pilfer that which was contributed specifically for the widows. They would be Spirit-guided not to misappropriate the funds designated for the widows to some other ministry.

3. Full of wisdom: The “full of wisdom” qualification would be the foundation upon which decisions were made in the distribution. This qualification would suggest that these men not be novice Christians, neither those who were young. Since the men would be working among all cultural groups in Jerusalem, they needed to be men who were known for their integrity and ability to make the right decisions.

They should be known for their wisdom, for they would be working among the wisest Christians of the church, and thus they should not be immature people. They would need to exercise great wisdom in their distribution of food to the aged Christian widows.

The church initially went to the apostles for a possible revelation from the Holy Spirit on this matter. But this was a matter that needed no revelation from God. It was a function of the body that required only wisdom to solve. Wise Christians who are moved by the gospel can use wisdom in order to carry out the mandate of James 1:27, that the church is responsible for the widows and orphans among them. The Spirit did later give information concerning the care of widows (See 1 Tm 5:1-16). However, in this case of distribution to widows in a large metropolitan area, only wisdom was needed in order to solve the problem. God does not do for us those things we can do for ourselves if we would just use some common sense (wisdom).

SELECTING THE QUALIFIED

Unless one sets his or her mind on Jesus in order to be motivated by the gospel of His incarnational journey into this world, he or she will not go to work for Jesus. Only by their fruits can we know that the gospel is in the heart of those who seek to serve.

When Jesus said, “You will know them by their fruits” (Mt 7:16), He meant more than just identifying the ulterior motives of evil men. He was also referring to what Paul would later refer as to why we are created in Christ Jesus. We are created in Christ through our obedience to the gospel in order to go to work for Jesus (See Ep 2:10). If there are no good works in the life of one who has obeyed the gospel, then one has “just been baptized.” The gospel had no affect on his or her heart.

It is upon the foundation of this principle that the seven men of Acts 6 were selected by the church. The church knew them and their fruits in serving the church. Paul was specific in reference to this principle: “But let these [bondservants] also first be tested, then let them serve, being found blameless” (1 Tm 3:10).

A. Selecting servants:

The seven men of necessity already had a good reputation of having dedicated themselves to the ministry of the saints. This is the character of leaders as described by Paul in 1 Corinthians 16:15,16:

You know [in all Achaia] the household of Stephanas, that it is the firstfruits of Achaia, and that they have dedicated themselves to the ministry of the saints, that you submit yourselves to such, and to everyone who works with us and labors.

This is the commentary passage on the men who were chosen in Jerusalem in Acts 6. Achaia was a Roman province. Because of the dedication of brother and sister Stephanas and their household, they had a great reputation for ministry among all the disciples throughout the province of Achaia.

Because the seven men who were to be selected in Jerusalem were already involved in ministry throughout the city, it would be easy for the church to identify them because they already knew of their ministry. The whole church of Jerusalem, therefore, simply had to select which seven ministering saints of the city they wanted to be designated by the apostles to focus on the administration of food to the widows.

The men had to first agree to continue their work of ministry until the problem was solved. The point is that the seven were already in the work of ministry to the saints before they were selected by the church. Once they were selected by the church, they were then designated by the apostles. This was done in order to make sure that the whole church knew those to whom to go in reference to distribution needs.

The reason they were brought before the apostles was because the apostles were at this time in the infancy of the church still functioning as the center of reference for instruction in the truth. After this public designation by the apostles, however, everyone in the future who complained about this particular problem could redirect their inquiries. The apostles could after the selection and designation reaffirm the decision of the church concerning the seven men. The apostles could themselves direct all inquiries to the specific seven administrators. The apostles could thus deflect all inquiries to the seven. By doing so they could remain in their ministry of prayer and teaching.

God opens doors of ministry for those who are already in ministry. Therefore, instead of praying to find a ministry, one should get busy on his own initiative and start ministering. Once God sees that one is dedicated to the ministry of the saints, then He will open doors for greater ministry for that person. The one who sits idly by waiting for a ministry will see no open doors for ministry. Because he is not able to find something to do is an indication that he will do nothing though a ministry is staring him in the face.

What is also significant about the apostles' suggestion is that it "pleased the whole multitude" (At 6:5). All the saints in Jerusalem were on board for a solution because the apostles did not form a board of authority to run the show. There were no power struggles and debates. We see no business meetings or ambitious populous candidates stepping forward to be voted into office. The church went forth to make their own selection. Candidates did not come forward for a populous vote in order to be voted into an office of authority.

The names of those who were chosen indicate that there were both Greeks and Jews in the group of seven, for the list of names included both Grecian names and Hebrew names (At 6:5). Nicolas was a Gentile proselyte who had migrated from Antioch to Jerusalem. In order to culturally reach all the widows of all the language/cultural groups, those who were chosen represented men from all linguistic and cultural house groups of Jerusalem. The whole church thus revealed great wisdom in choosing the men for this work of ministering to the widows.

B. Generating growth:

It is interesting to note that the Holy Spirit began the historical section of the neglect of the Grecian widows with the statement, "When the number of the disciples was multiplying" (At 6:1). When the solution was implemented by the church, the Holy Spirit concluded with the statement, "So the word of God increased. And the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly" (At 6:7).

When the church does that which is right according to gospel motivation, then growth happens. Whenever there is a dysfunction in the body of Christ, growth is always hindered. When the members' minds are so focused on the problems that disrupt the body, they cannot focus totally on the preaching of the gospel to the lost. For this reason, Satan seeks to disrupt the body, and by so disrupting the body he disrupts the preaching of the gospel. It is for this reason that gospel-obedient disciples must always keep their minds focused on those things that are above (Cl 3:1). They must be alert to areas of function in the body wherein problems may develop.

C. Dissolving committees:

It seems that in the three to four years of growth since the Pentecost of Acts 2, the church in Jerusalem was functioning without any "committee" to feed the widows. The committee of seven was designated only when a dysfunctional problem arose. Committees, therefore, were not a common organizational structure of the early church, even among the possibly 20,000 members of the church of Jerusalem who were meeting in possibly 800 homes throughout the city. Therefore, when a committee was formed to solve a problem, it was not permanent. This does not mean that perpetual committees are wrong. It only means that when gospel-obedient people are motivated in their daily living by the gospel, there is little need for cooperate organizational structures in the function of the organic body.

This point is brought out in reference to the lives of two of those who were on the committee of seven. One of the committee members, Stephen, was full of grace and power of the Holy Spirit (At 6:8). However, his total commitment to preach the gospel eventually led to his death (At 7:54-60).

It is significant to note that though Stephen was part of the committee of seven to serve tables, he still reached out in preaching the gospel. It may be worth noting, therefore, that the church knew him as a leading person among the disciples because he was formerly preaching the gospel in Jerusalem prior to his selection by the church to be on the committee of seven (Compare At 15:22). It may be that by the time of his death, the problem of neglecting the widows had been solved and the committee terminated. At least Stephen's part on the committee was terminated when he went on to glory.

Philip, another person of the committee, was a married man with possibly four young children at the time. Many years later we find Philip as an evangelist. When the great persecution eventually arose in Jerusalem, "Philip went down to the city of Samaria and preached Christ to them" (At 8:5). He then was led to the desert to preach the gospel to the Ethiopian eunuch (At 8:26). And then he and his family moved on to Caesarea (At 21:8,9).

The problem of the neglect of the widows had long been solved by the time of the death of Stephen and Philip's move to Caesarea. Committees are intended to solve dysfunctions in the organic function of the body. But when the problem is solved, there should be no need for gospel living people to be organized into committees to do good to all men, "especially to those who are of the household of the faith" (Gl 6:10). Those who are living the incarnate life of Christ fulfill the needs that arise among those of the family of God as soon as they encounter needs (At 4:34,35). This is the meaning of being "organic" as the body of Christ. When disciples are meeting in their homes, it is difficult to ignore a need that is sitting across the living room table.

Nevertheless, all the house fellowships of an urban center must be in contact with one another lest the needs of one group is too much for the group to handle. Other groups must come to the aid of those groups who are in need as in the case of the Grecian widows.

D. A culture of sharing:

It is as John exhorted, "Whoever has this world's goods, and sees his brother in need and closes his heart against him, how does the love of God abide in him?" (1 Jn 3:17). If one needs a committee person to come by and remind him of his responsibility to care for his brother, then his relationship with the brethren as a whole is not close enough to discover the needs of his brethren. If he knows legitimate needs, but does not respond, then the heart of God does not dwell in him through the gospel. Therefore, "let us not love in word or in tongue, but in deed and in truth" (1 Jn 3:18).

We see in the dissolving of the "widow committee" a point of wisdom on the part of the early church. Unlike many corporate churches today, the early disciples were driven individually by the gospel to function as the organic body of Christ. There was no need for a corporate "nonprofit" committee to steal their involvement away from them as disciples. Paul certainly had this in mind when he wrote to Timothy to "charge those who are rich ... that they be rich in good works" (1 Tm 6:17,18). The rich have a tendency to relieve themselves of hands-on involvement by hiring someone else to do the work for them. They can stand at a distance while others do the work. However, when the rich become disciples of Jesus, their standard of living comes down as they live the incarnate Son of God who came down out of heaven for them (Jn 1:1,2,14).

The corporate nonprofit religious organization seeks to do the work that individual Christians should be doing personally. The corporate committee often steals the opportunity away from individual members to become personally involved in ministry. Therefore, we see wisdom on the part of the early church to dissolve the committee, if indeed this wisdom truly originated from them (See Js 3:13,17,18). The benevolent committee for the widows was dissolved as soon as the disciples began distributing to all the saints who were widows. When the problem was solved, the committee was dissolved.

INCOHESIVE CULTURES

A few years ago we were somewhat shocked as we looked upon a picture of the attendees of a particular lectureship of church leaders in America. There were over one hundred individuals in the picture of this particular annual lectureship. We looked closely at the picture. We looked at every face. What we noticed about the picture took our minds back to the Jewish apartheid years in Jerusalem, and the years in South Africa before everything came right. Everyone who was pictured in the newspaper were African-American preachers and church leaders. No other cultural group was represented.

“Apartheid” is an Afrikaans word—one of the dominant languages of South Africa—that means “separateness.” The practice of racial and cultural apartheid found its legal roots in South Africa when a system of institutionalized racial segregation was introduced within society following 1948. From that date the system was maintained by the authoritarian political power of one group of citizens over the citizenship of the rest of the country.

The practice of apartheid within South Africa resulted in a system of dysfunctional social stratification, which social system legally prevailed until the early 1990s. However, even after the writing of a new constitution that did away with all the apartheid laws, the embedded social behavior of apartheid continues to this day among all social groups of the country. It is a system of dysfunctional social behavior much like the caste system of India that lingers on today, though the legal restrictions are long gone. Social changes continue long after the demise of legal statutes that seek to regulate society contrary to the principles of the word of God.

We live with the legacy of the dysfunctional social injustice of apartheid even to this day in South Africa. But before we target and criticize South Africa for her brief history of apartheid, we must remember that apartheid has always existed throughout the world. The experts use the word “ethnocentrism” to identify the foundation upon which separateness within societies often prevails. Without the principle of “love-your-neighbor-as-yourself,” apartheid is simply the legalization of ethnocentrism. If we take away legalized apartheid, we still behave as segregated citizens within a society because of different cultures and languages.

We originally began the writing of this book in order to deal with dysfunctional behavior systems among the early disciples. But the more we focused on the dysfunctional behavior patterns of the early disciples, the more we began to realize that apartheid was strong in the first century, and subsequently found its way into the organic function of the early church. When it came into the fellowship of the church, organic dysfunction resulted because apartheid is against the very core of the unity that the gospel brings between all men.

Apartheid among Christians is contrary to the spirit of the gospel. When Paul wrote to the Philippians, “Have this mind in you,” he took the Philippians, and us, on a journey of the Son of God across cultural boundaries (Ph 2:5). Through His incarnation, Jesus illustrated in His gospel mission that unless He transitioned through the separateness that existed between God and man, which separation would eventually lead to the total annihilation of humanity for eternity, He had to destroy the “apartheid” between God and man (See Is 59:2). He had to set an example of a cross-cultural journey that would bring all men of society together into the fellowship of one body. This is what the gospel does among all people of the world.

Therefore, for those who have obeyed the gospel of the Son of God, there can be no apartheid between those who have come into the fold of God’s gospel-obedient people. Because He so loved the world, the Son of God left the culture of heaven in order to cross over into our culture. He did so in order to reconcile all of us together into the united family of God. We must never forget that only in Christ can the following social order prevail over our natural instincts of ethnocentrism:

For you are all sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek. There is neither bondservant nor free. There is neither male nor female. For you are all one in Christ Jesus. And if you are Christ’s, then you are Abraham’s seed and heirs according to the promise (Gl 3:26-29).

After the apparent apartheid function among the Christians in Jerusalem was revealed through the lack of administration of food to the Grecian widows, we might assume that the problem of discrimination among the Christians that was based on cultural barriers was overcome. In reference to the distribution among the Grecian Jewish Christians, the problem was immediately solved. However, this was not the end of discrimination among the members of the body. When Jewish Christians started to reach out evangelistically to non-Jewish cultures beyond Jerusalem, there were still some cultural “apartheid” behavior that lingered among Christians. Jesus’ mandate that the gospel go beyond the city limits of Jerusalem ran into some cultural obstacles as evangelists left the city in order to go into all the world.

When Peter went to Caesarea to the house of a Gentile, Cornelius, the persistent cultural barriers that existed between Jews and Gentiles were revealed in the actions of those to whom he returned when he came home to Jerusalem.

A. Apartheid in Jerusalem:

It took a special vision from God to convince Peter, an ardent Jew by culture, to get out of his cultural cocoon (At 10). In the special vision that was sent to him by God about ten years after the establishment of the church in Jerusalem, he even complained when asked in the vision to eat those foods that Jews were not allowed to eat according to the Sinai law. So he complained, “Not so, Lord, for I have never eaten anything common or unclean” (At 10:14).

Peter was an obedient Jew in reference to the food restrictions of the Sinai law. Though that law was dead, and God had subsequently declared all meats to be clean, Peter still refrained from eating certain meats. What Peter and other Jews had difficulty practicing was the fact that what was unlawful to eat under the Sinai law had now become only the customs of the Jews under the gospel law of liberty. Therefore, with the following statement, Paul excused himself and all Christians from any Jewish food restrictions: “I [Paul] know and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus that there is nothing unclean of itself. But to him [Peter] who regards anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean” (Rm 14:14).

So we will excuse Peter for the moment for not considering all foods clean. But he and all Jews had to understand that what was once law when they were under the Sinai law, was no longer law in reference to foods. They could now prepare foods from a Gentile cook book, and enjoy a good pork chop. Eating of all meats was simply determined by the custom one might feel in reference to eating certain foods, but not in reference to any scriptural prohibitions.

Now when the Holy Spirit eventually came upon the household of Cornelius, God signalled to Peter and the Jews who had accompanied Peter to the house of Cornelius, that the gospel must go to the Gentiles. When the household of Cornelius was empowered by the Holy Spirit to speak in other languages during the meeting, the attending Jews realized that God was signaling that the Gentiles must hear the gospel, and subsequently come into the fellowship of the disciples (At 10:44-48). And if the gospel must be preached to the Gentiles in order that they obey the gospel, then the unity of the gospel must do away with any cultural barriers between Jews and Gentiles that would separate the two cultural groups.

Because of his experience with the Holy Spirit coming upon the household of Cornelius, Peter finally understood the teaching of the vision. He thus stated to Cornelius and all the Jews who were present, “*Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons. But in every nation he who fears Him and works righteous- ness is accepted by Him” (At 10:34,35). (Hold this thought.)

After Cornelius and his household obeyed the gospel, Peter and company returned to Jerusalem. But when they reached the city limits, “those who were of the circumcision [Jews] disputed with him, saying, ‘You went in to uncircumcised [Gentiles] men and ate with them’” (At 11:2,3). We would correctly assume that those of the “circumcision” were fellow Jewish brethren. If they were fellow Christians, then the cultural barrier between Jews and Gentiles in the city of Jerusalem reached into the fellowship of the church. This was probably the case since the culture of Jerusalem was strictly Jewish. This “separateness” (apartheid) was later revealed when Paul came to the city many years later and the Jewish elders of the church encouraged him to observe some Jewish customs in reference to the temple (See At 21:17-25).

If indeed these were fellow Jews and fellow Christians who came out to contend with Peter, then the Christians in Jerusalem continued to be intimidated by the apartheid of the Jews in Jerusalem in reference to the Gentiles. The cultural separation between Jews and Gentiles greatly influenced the behavior of Jewish Christians in the early years of the church. This may have been the source of the “neglect problem” that led to the oversight of the Grecian widows.

Even though a special vision of God was revealed to one of the Christ-sent apostles (Peter), cultural barriers continued to hinder the missions of the Jerusalem church for at least ten years after the beginning of the church in Acts 2. (We assume that Peter’s trip to the house of Cornelius was approximately ten years after the Pentecost of Acts 2.) But the cultural barrier of race continued on north of Jerusalem to the city of Antioch a few years after Peter went into the house of Cornelius.

B. Apartheid in Antioch:

There were two occasions when Jewish culture affected those of the Gentile church in Antioch. Both cases reveal that some Jews had by this time in the growth of the church moved Jewish customs beyond cultural behavior. Specifically, circumcision was made a matter of salvation by some Jewish brethren (At 15:1).

1. Circumcision salvation: “After fourteen years [from Paul’s first visit to Jerusalem when he returned from Arabia], I [Paul] went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, taking Titus also with me” (Gl 2:1). This visit to Jerusalem was Paul’s visit to the city for the meeting of Acts 15.

Titus was a Greek. This presented a problem.

When the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem confronted Titus about not being circumcised, Paul identified those who confronted him as “false brethren” (Gl 2:4). From this identification, therefore, we would assume that if someone would make a cultural practice a matter of salvation, then he is a false brother (See At 15:1). But this was not the end of the story in reference to apartheid in the church of Jerusalem. These false brethren sought to take their “Jewish cultural Christianity” far beyond the city limits of Jerusalem.

2. Apartheid condemnation: Several years later Paul wrote of an apartheid incident in Antioch. In the letter he stated, “But when Peter came to Antioch, I opposed him to his face because he stood condemned” (Gl 2:11). After reading this statement, we wonder what Peter, the apostle, whom God sent to the house of Cornelius, did to bring himself into a state of condemnation. This was the same Peter to whom were given the “keys of the kingdom” (Mt 16:18,19). Peter certainly preached the truth according to the Holy Spirit, but the Holy Spirit did not force him to conform to the truth of the gospel that he preached. And because any direct control of his behavior was not a work of the Spirit, Peter stood condemned because he was responsible for his behavior on this occasion.

While in Antioch, and before the arrival of the Jewish delegation from Jerusalem, Peter “ate with the Gentiles” just as he had done with the household of Cornelius (Gl 2:12). However, when “certain men” came from Jerusalem, “he withdrew and separated [apartheid] himself [from the Gentile brethren]” (Gl 2:12). But it was not Peter alone who practiced this apartheid behavior in the fellowship of the disciples. Barnabas and the other Jewish Christians in Antioch also withdrew themselves from the Gentile brethren (Gl 2:12,13). If a picture of the church were taken after the arrival of the Jerusalem brethren, it would probably have been a picture of Jews only.

What Peter, Barnabas and the other Jewish Christians in Antioch did was place themselves in a state of condemnation because “they were not straightforward about the truth of the gospel” (Gl 2:14). Their behavior was contrary to the gospel of Jesus who gave up His cultural environment of heaven with God in order to be transformed into the flesh of man (See Ph 2:5-8). It is often difficult for people to understand that they must never allow any cultural barriers to stand between them and the preaching of the gospel. If we live the incarnational example of Jesus, then there will be no cultural barriers that will hinder us from going unto every creature with the message of the gospel (Mk 16:15).

Many suggestions have been made as to why Peter allowed himself to be intimidated into living contrary to the incarnational Son of God in Antioch. We would assume that the Jewish culture was still so strong in him and in the Jerusalem church, that it continued to hinder the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles. In this case, the cultural bondage of the Jews made its way even to the church in the Gentile city of Antioch.

We should probably give Peter some grace on this matter. At least this is what the brethren did in Jerusalem on the occasion of the Acts 15 meeting. On that occasion Paul reviewed for everyone that “God shows no partiality to man” (Gl 2:6). Everyone understood that God worked “in Peter for the apostleship to the circumcision,” while at the same time He “effectively worked also in me toward the Gentiles” (Gl 2:8). So James, Peter and John “gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship so that we should go to the Gentiles and they to the circumcision” (Gl 2:9).

We must never underestimate, therefore, the influence of culture on the behavior of our faith. When Christians believe that certain rites of their culture are necessary in order to be saved, then they inevitably seek to bring the brethren under the bondage of such cultural behavior. Sometimes the intimidation of those who taught “cultural Christianity” was so strong in the first century that even a Christ-sent apostle succumbed to those who preached such bondage. We must never forget what Paul wrote in order to encourage the Galatian Christians never to succumb to “cultural Christianity: “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1).

And just in case his readers did not understand the seriousness of this matter, in the context of the “circumcision Christianity” that some Jewish brethren were teaching, Paul wrote, “Behold I, Paul, say to you that if you are circumcised [in order to be saved], Christ will profit you nothing” (Gl 5:2; see At 15:1).

Chapter 7

LORDS OF AUTHORITY

In the early 1970s we were with other students sitting in a philosophy class at a university in southern Mis-issippi. At one time, we were all studying the French philosopher and skeptic Rene Descartes of the 17th century. As students with religious backgrounds, we were all held in wonder as the professor lectured as to why Descartes was so philosophically skeptical of that in which we all believed ... faith and God.

When the professor took us deeper into the society and mind of Descartes, we began to understand the religious world in which Descartes lived. Descartes dealt with the same religious environment as the modern-day fictional English writer, Philip Pullman. Descartes' time was an era of misguided institutional religion that was revealed in the religiosity of the Roman Catholic Church.

During a recent British Broadcasting Cooperation interview with Pullman, Pullman said, "Institutional religion is the real evil" (BCC, Sept. 22, 2018). Descartes was confronted with institutional Roman Catholicism and Pullman with the institutional Church of England today (the Anglican Church).

Pullman questioned the religion with which he was acquainted. Descartes was agnostic in reference to the god that was presented to the world by the Roman Catholic Church. However, both were referring to an institutional religious world where religionists had established authority structures and theologies of men within religion. Both saw the evils of institutional religion that is founded on the authority of men, and is upheld by innocent followers who know only the heritage of their respective religious institution.

The followers often promote their dysfunctional religions, regardless of any scandal within the leadership of their religion. Unfortunately, dysfunctional religion leads to a dysfunctional faith. Descartes was a philosopher, and thus, he saw the hypocrisy of the leadership of the Roman Catholic religion. Pullman simply wrote that if institutional religion could not be elevated above human behavior, then it is flawed with all sorts of evils.

The apostle Peter was faced with dysfunctional religious institutionalism that was creeping in among the disciples even before the close of the first century. His first letter was written to the elders in five Roman provinces: Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia (1 Pt 1:1). These were provinces of the Roman Empire, not cities. The first epistle of Peter was written in the early or middle 60s. By the time Peter arrived at the exhortations of chapter 5, he identified a dysfunctional leadership problem among the leaders of the Christians in the provinces he identified at the beginning of the letter.

Peter addressed the rise of the core of institutional religion. As a fellow elder, he exhorted those elders to whom he wrote, "Shepherd the flock of God that is among you ... not under compulsion ... not as being lords" (1 Pt 5:2,3). "Compulsion" and "lordship" exist only when men assume authority. There is no such thing as a lord who has no authority. One cannot function with compulsion as a lord unless he has assumed some authority over those whom he seeks to compel. (More on this in a later chapter.)

Institutional religion is defined by organized structures that are sustained by men of authority who assume authority as lords. They function as lords in order to perpetuate the existence of the religion. The pope is the "head" of the Catholic Church. He is the pope because he is a highly respected person who functions as the center of reference of the Catholic Church on earth. He functions as a head because the religion of Catholicism invests within him the authority that is necessary to perpetuate the religion of Catholicism. Likewise, the Queen of England is the head of the Church of England. Though she may not exercise the authority that is invested in her as the head of the Church of England, the authority is still there, which authority is exercised by designated officials of the church.

This is institutional religion at its best. And this is the institutional religion that had gone wrong by the time of Descartes. Descartes was agnostic in reference to such religion. Pullman simply called it evil. These men were not necessarily anti-faith. They were anti-institutional religion. They were so because they saw the evils of authorities in religion who had gone wrong in their assumption of being lords over the flock of God.

When Paul revealed to the Ephesian elders that eventually some among them would draw away disciples after themselves, he saw the dysfunction of an institutional religion that was coming (See At 20:30). Paul spoke to the elders of cities, whereas Peter wrote to the elders throughout provinces. What Paul saw coming in the cities, Peter identified as already in existence among some elders throughout the provinces at the time he wrote in the middle 60s. An authoritative hierarchy had developed among the disciples within only two decades after the beginning of the church in Acts 2. The only stage yet to develop in the apostasy would be an internationally designated head of the church on earth, which thing eventually transpired in a couple centuries later with the development of the Roman Catholic Church.

There is always the possibility that lords of authority will rise up among the disciples. The question in reference to dealing with this dysfunction in the leadership is not to allow lordship leadership to develop in the first place. This is why we have a New Testament in our hands to guide us in these matters.

The twelve disciples offered the first indication that men will dispute among themselves as to who is in control (See Lk 22:24). In dealing with the struggle among the disciples for prominence, Jesus gave instructions and mandates in reference to the leadership that would exist among His disciples, which leadership would reflect His incarnational leadership among them. After the apostles were transformed into the behavior of their incarnate Savior, the Holy Spirit added to Jesus' instructions on leadership as He continued to work through the apostles and early writers of inspired Scripture. The following is a brief list of key points that must be taught among us, beginning with each disciple who comes forth from the waters of baptism:

1. There are to be no rulers among the disciples who rule by lordship (Mk 10:42,43; Lk 22:25,26).
2. There are to be no leaders who exercise authority over the church (Mk 10:42,43; Lk 22:25,26).
3. All leaders will function as slaves to the needs of the church (Mk 10:44; Lk 22:26; Jn 13:1-20; 1 Pt 5:2).

4. Leaders will not compel other members of the body (1 Pt 5:2).
5. Leaders will lead by the gospel example of their own lives (1 Co 16:15,16; 1 Pt 5:3).
6. Leaders will study and teach the word of God (1 Tm 3:2; 2 Tm 2:15,24; Ti 1:9).
7. Leaders will live the incarnational example of Jesus by making His mind their mind (Ph 2:5-8).

Inherent in leaders who are not living the gospel example of Jesus is the desire to lord over the flock of God. Such leaders see the church as an opportunity to exercise their desire to rule. However, such leaders forget that our Lord lowered Himself, giving up the form of God. He humbled Himself to the flesh of man (Jn 1:1,2,14; Ph 2:5-8). If a leader among the sheep of God is not willing to behave in this manner, then he has no right to be considered a leader of God's sheep.

ENDANGERED IDENTITY

3 John is one of those brief New Testament letters that is often ignored by Bible students. However, it is one that is directly focused on dysfunctional relationships that often occurs among leaders of the body. In fact, the dysfunction about which John wrote was so great in this particular situation that it endangered the organic function of the body to evangelize the world. Souls were or would be lost if the dysfunction in relationships continued. For this reason, the Holy Spirit deemed it necessary to write a specific document (letter) to correct the problem. If necessary, the Spirit sought to send a Christ-sent apostle to the location of the dysfunction in order to sort out the individual who was the source of the trouble.

There were four personalities (disciples) involved in the dysfunctional scenario that is addressed in 3 John. There was the Christ-sent apostle, John, who wrote the letter. There was Gaius, the informant, to whom the letter was written. There was Diotrephes, the instigator of the problem. And then there was on the sidelines a disciple name Demetrius. All four individuals played a significant role in the problem and solution.

The letter does not deal specifically with the church as a whole, but with individuals. In this case, the focus of the letter was directed to a businessman for whom John prayed would become more successful in his prosperity and health, just as he was spiritually prospering (3 Jn 2). Gaius had assumed the responsibility of living the gospel, and in living the gospel, he took personal ownership of making sure the gospel was preached through his support of traveling evangelists. He did not shun his personal responsibility to preach the gospel. He did not off-load his responsibility on a "church budget." He was directly involved in mission support.

The Holy Spirit, therefore, urged John to write of his personal prayers for this individual: "I pray that in all things you may prosper" (3 Jn 2). Nowhere else in the New Testament is there such a prayer offered for the material prosperity of an individual. We must conclude that if such a prayer were offered for ourselves, then certainly we should be doing with our material prosperity that which Gaius was doing with his. In his case, the more Gaius prospered, the more money he had at his disposal to support those evangelists who were passing through his house on their way to preach the gospel to unevangelized regions.

But there was a serious problem. The problem was so troubling that Gaius was moved to inform John, and then ask for help from the aged apostle. John's instructions in the letter, therefore, are significant in reference to our personal responsibility to preach the gospel through others. When the preaching of the gospel to the lost is threatened, then it is time to take action. We can be patient with personality disputes among brothers and sisters. However, when the disputes endanger the preaching of the gospel to the lost, then we are in danger of forgetting who we are as disciples of Jesus. If the church does not step up and sort out any problem that causes any member to be discouraged from supporting the preaching of the gospel, then we individually lose our purpose for being disciples of Jesus.

A. Endangered relationships:

The historical scenario upon which the problem developed was centered around the common social relationships that the disciples had with one another as members of the universal body of Christ. Though the problem certainly spilled over into the assemblies of the disciples, we must not assume that the problem was specifically centered around the church as a whole.

This was a problem in the organic body in a particular region that resulted from the dysfunctional relationships that certain individuals had with one another. It was a problem that originated from the influence of one particular leader who affected the evangelistic function of another member of the body.

In reference to the assemblies of the disciples, we must approach this text with the understanding that the identified members of the body in the region were meeting in the homes of the disciples. This is significant in order to understand the Holy Spirit's instructions to solve the problem. It is important to understand the home assemblies of the early church lest we read into the letter our modern-day institutional behavior of large single-assembly churches. This is important lest we also read into the text a behavioral practice of assembly that was not relevant to the situation that prevailed in the first century.

The historical scenario was not a problem within a particular assembly of disciples. The problem was that one particular individual took advantage of some disciples who were living in the area where the problem was created. We must keep in mind that the problem centered around individuals, not assemblies.

This point is significant. If we believe that the problem developed within a single-assembly of members in a particular region, then we might misunderstand both the instructions of John, as well as what was actually transpiring in the development of the problem. For example, if we interpret the text from the viewpoint that the problem developed within a particular group of disciples in a region who were meeting in one assembly, then we might erroneously conclude that there was "division in the church." We might conclude that Diotrephes was drawing away from one particular assembly of disciples a group the disciples over whom he could exercise lordship authority. His group of followers, therefore, would not be showing up at the general assembly of the saints. They would be meeting on their own apart from the greater gathering of the disciples. Diotrephes was certainly exercising lordship authority, but we would question his exercising of such authority in order to divide a group of disciples.

John does not deal with the problem that prevailed as if it were a problem of division within a particular single-assembly church. The problem was not division of a church, but the erroneous beliefs and behavior of a particular individual who was disrupting the mission responsibility of each member of the church. Diotrephes was dominating an entire group of people, and thus threatening with disfellowship those over whom he lorded.

Though the application of the instructions of John would have a secondary application to division among members of a single-assembly church, such an application would be slightly misapplied. It is imperative, therefore, that we understand the text from the historical fact that the early disciples were assembling in many different homes throughout a particular region. Diotrephes' influence was over a particular group of disciples with whom he had a lordship relationship.

John gave no instructions for Gaius to start another assembly of the saints with someone else in order to correct the problem that he had with Diotrephes. The problem was not in reference to a particular church group as a whole, but with individuals. It is important to make this distinction in reference to John's instructions lest we twist his instructions to be advice to pit one assembly of disciples against another.

Though the preceding scenario could have been happening among those who were customarily meeting at the same house, we would conclude that John was advising Gaius to separate himself from the control of an individual, not from an entire assembly of good people who had been captured by an autocratic leader. We do not believe that it was the intent of John's instructions to encourage any member to disfellowship himself from the whole in order to avoid the one. At least in this context, John advised Gaius as an individual to associate with the good that came from brother Demetrius, and thus shun the influence and behavior of Diotrephes (3 Jn 11,12).

Regardless of our lack of information concerning assemblies in the text, we find it difficult to believe that John advised Gaius to start another assembly in order to correct the problem. Correction of any leadership problem as that which is identified in this brief letter indicates that we must directly approach an individual who is causing the problem. In this case, the apostle John was personally going to approach the source of the problem. In the meantime, he instructed Gaius on what to do until he showed up at the scene.

It would be closer to the truth of the historical house assemblies of the early church to believe that there were several ongoing assemblies in houses throughout the region where Gaius and Diotrephes lived. The sin of Diotrephes was that he was teaching and practicing the autonomy of his group over whom he exercised dominance. Since all the saints were meeting in many different houses in the region, Diotrephes took advantage of the situation by drawing away those under his influence from the rest of the saints in the area. His love to be first moved him to take control of his own group.

B. Endangered servanthood leadership:

Since Diotrephes was behaving autonomously by exercising lordship over his sect (group) of disciples, he was disrupting the evangelistic function of the body as a whole. Since there was to be no such thing as autonomous groups of disciples functioning separate from one another in the universal body, what Diotrephes was doing as an individual was making it difficult for the traveling evangelists to go from one group of disciples to another in order to be encouraged and supported to continue their ministry of preaching the gospel to the world. If we understand correctly the instructions in the context of this function of the evangelists of the early church, then we can better understand the instructions that John wrote to Gaius.

Since the letter of John is a late letter of the Holy Spirit, then we must assume that what was transpiring in the area of Gaius and Diotrephes had developed over a period of about two decades. Therefore, we must go back a few years in order to lay the foundation for what had become dysfunctional by the time John wrote.

About twenty years before, and while Paul was among the leaders of the church in Ephesus, he warned the Ephesian elders, “Also from your own selves will men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away the disciples after themselves” (At 20:30). About fifteen years after Paul’s meeting with the elders of Ephesus in Miletus, Peter wrote to the disciples throughout the provinces of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia (1 Pt 1:1). To the leaders of the church in these provinces, he specifically admonished the elders with the following words: “Shepherd the flock of God that is among you, serving as overseers, not under compulsion ... nor as being lords ...” (1 Pt 5:2,3). This admonition was based squarely on Jesus’ mandate that there be no lords of authority among His disciples (See Mk 10:35-45).

That about which Paul had warned the elders in Ephesus, was coming true only about fifteen years later among some of the elders throughout the provinces of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia. At least one very important lesson is learned from Paul’s warning, and evidently Peter’s identification of lords among the sheep. By the time Peter wrote, there were some leaders already at the point of drawing away disciples after themselves through lordship behavior. When John wrote to Gaius, Diotrephes was behaving in a lordship manner about which both Paul and Peter wrote. The important lesson to learn is that among leaders there is always the temptation for them to function autonomously in order to exercise lordship over a particular group of disciples. It does not take much time for such a disorder to develop among disciples.

It is believed that in the latter years of the apostle John, John resided in some area of the aforementioned provinces. At least in his latter days he was in exile on the island of Patmos off the West coast of Asia, and subsequently directed the letter of Revelation “to the seven churches that are in Asia” (Rv 1:4,9). We could assume, therefore, that some of the leaders of the church in the five provinces identified by Peter did not listen to the Holy Spirit’s instructions through Jesus, Paul, Peter, and now John. The apostasy of church autonomy based on lordship authority had already set in as individual leaders assumed lordship over separated groups of disciples. In doing this they were doing as Diotrephes who drew away disciples into his own autonomous group in order to exercise lordship over them. The outline that John gives us in 3 John are instructions on how such leaders become lords of autonomous groups of the flock of God in order to stymie the mission outreach of the disciples.

C. Endangered missions:

Gaius was justifiably concerned about the disruptive influence of Diotrephes. He was concerned because Diotrephes’ behavior was affecting him personally where he lived. He was being discouraged in fulfilling his personal ministry to support missions. Diotrephes was not only behaving with a sectarian spirit, he was disrupting the mission function of the universal body of Christ. While Gaius sought to live the gospel by supporting the preaching of the gospel, he was being threatened by Diotrephes who sought to discourage others from supporting traveling evangelists.

We must notice carefully how John established the foundation upon which he would eventually judge Diotrephes’ behavior to be both divisive, disruptive and evil. John made the following statement in order to encourage Gaius, as well as identify the organic function of the body: “For I rejoiced greatly when brethren came and testified of the truth that is in you” (3 Jn 3).

There were traveling evangelists moving among the early disciples in their ministry to preach the gospel to the unbelievers. Those who had visited Gaius eventually made their way to John. They reported to John that Gaius gave them accommodation, as well as supported them financially to go on to the next point of preaching. Therefore, John wanted to encourage Gaius with the following introductory comment: “Beloved, you do faithfully whatever you do for the brethren [evangelists] and especially for strangers” (3 Jn 5).

John’s introduction in the letter was directed specifically to encourage Gaius in the midst of his turmoil with Diotrephes. He wanted to encourage Gaius to continue with his personal responsibility to evangelize the world through those whom he supported.

The reason for this encouragement was obvious. Since the evangelists went forth (1) for the sake of preaching the name of Jesus, (2) while they took up no contributions from those to whom they preached, it was necessary that (3) local brethren partner with them financially in order that they continue to preach the gospel (3 Jn 7,8). John encouraged Gaius to continue “doing well” in supporting these evangelists. Diotrephes, however, was disrupting the flow of traveling evangelists among the disciples. He was trying to stop the supply line of finances to support missions.

In order to identify the disruptive efforts of Diotrephes, the Holy Spirit gives us a list of characteristics that identify the personality and behavior of the one who would seek to call disciples after themselves, and thus hinder the preaching of the gospel (At 20:30). This would be the leader who would disrupt God’s system of the function of the organic body to reach throughout the world with the message of the gospel. From 3 John 9,10, the following is a summation of both the character and behavior of Diotrephes to disrupt the mission responsibilities of the body:

1. Diotrephes loved to be first among the disciples. He craved notoriety.
2. Diotrephes did not receive (support) the apostles or anyone who might challenge his position of authority. He was so locally focused on his ministry that he could not see lost souls beyond his locality.
3. The deeds of Diotrephes were contrary to the purpose of the church because his efforts resulted in the loss of souls, for he discouraged both the missionaries and those, as Gaius, who would support them (3 Jn 11).
4. In order to convince others not to receive and support the traveling evangelists (missionaries), Diotrephes slandered those who would threaten his lordship over those whom he dominated. Through slander he hoped to recruit a group of oppositionists who would stand with him in opposing any transient evangelist who might be passing through their area.

5. Diotrephes did not receive (support) the brethren who were traveling about preaching the gospel, and thus he discouraged others from doing so.
6. Diotrephes intimidated any person of the group over which he lorded in order that they also not receive (support) any apostle or evangelist whom he could not dominate.
7. Diotrephes lorded over those whom he seized control by threatening them with excommunication from his group.

D. Endangered by evil:

In ancient Greek times, the name “Diotrephes” was given to individuals of influence. It was not a name given to those of low estate. We note this because we wonder why Diotrephes rose to the position of power that was allowed by those over whom he dominated. We might conclude that those who are successful and influential in the world may not be the best leaders among a flock of slaves. Unless a leader truly lives the gospel of the incarnate Son of God, he cannot lead those who are living incarnationally (See Ph 2:5-8).

It is difficult for those who are leaders in the world and successful businessmen to live incarnationally among the disciples. The best advice to give to a leader of the world, or a successful businessman who is converted to the Lord, would be, “But what things were gain to me [in the world], those things I have counted loss for Christ” (Ph 3:7). If a successful person in the world cannot live this statement, then it would be very unwise for the slaves of Christ to designate him to be a leader among the disciples. Diotrephes took advantage of the innocence of the sheep, and in some way became dominant among the sheep because of his influence that he had before he became a Christian.

It is noteworthy that John did not judge the sheep for allowing Diotrephes to capture them through his autocratic behavior. John judged the cause of the problem, the one who was the opportunist who lorded over the innocent sheep. Embedded in John’s reply is his assurance of Gaius that individuals as Diotrephes will eventually take ownership for their own behavior in the final judgment because they seized an opportunity to steal the flock of God. Until then, James reminded all leaders with the following caution: “Let not many of you become teachers [leaders], knowing that we will receive the stricter judgment” (Js 3:1).

Because lordship leaders will be held accountable for lording over the flock, they must understand that it is evil to substitute their lordship in the place of the one Lord to whom we must all give our allegiance. So John exhorted Gaius, “Beloved, do not follow what is evil” (3 Jn 11).

The character and behavior of Diotrephes was evil. He sought to establish an autonomous group of disciples under his own lordship, and thus, steal the sheep from their true Lord. The Holy Spirit defined this behavior as evil. If we would make a general list from 3 John of what God considers evil among those who would lord over His sheep, it could be the following:

1. It is evil to crave to be the leader of the flock for the purpose of either notoriety, lordship, or financial gain. (We must not confuse this with the desire to shepherd the flock about which Paul wrote in 1 Timothy 3:1. That about which Paul spoke was in reference to desiring ministry, not notoriety or authority.)
2. It is evil to separate a group of disciples under the banner of one’s own personality and command.
3. It is evil not to support those who are traveling about in order to preach the gospel to the lost.
4. It is evil to disrupt the mission support of the church.
5. It is evil to discourage any individual member from supporting the preaching of the gospel to the lost.
6. It is evil to slanderously damage the reputation of an evangelist who seeks to preach the gospel to the lost, for in so slandering an evangelist, supporters would be reluctant to preach the gospel through him.
7. It is evil for a church leader to hinder the mission purpose of the church.
8. It is evil to threaten disfellowship from the disciples those with whom one would disagree in reference to receiving and supporting preachers of the gospel.

E. Endangered world evangelism:

The behavior of Diotrephes was evil because his behavior would lead to the loss of many souls. On the other hand, Gaius was doing well in supporting those who came his way and left to evangelize other areas. Gaius was living the gospel. Diotrephes was discouraging Gaius from his gospel living. Diotrephes’ behavior, therefore, was contrary to the gospel.

If evangelists were not supported, then many people would never have an opportunity to hear and obey the gospel. Those who live the gospel know this. Diotrephes’ behavior, however, was disrupting the evangelistic function of the body of Christ because he was threatening Gaius and others who supported the preaching of the gospel. In contrast to living the gospel, he was doing evil by obstructing the evangelistic function of the body of Christ.

We must look beyond Diotrephes when interpreting the “evil” that was encouraged by this one individual. The problem went far beyond both Gaius and Diotrephes. If Diotrephes’ example and influence were continued into the next generation of leaders after him, then the preaching of the gospel to a great extent would terminate before the close of the first century. It was for this reason, therefore, that the Holy Spirit deemed it critical that this very short letter be included in the canon of Scriptures for the church for centuries to come.

The church must be warned about allowing any leader to capture the church to the detriment of evangelizing the world. If Diotrephes’ behavior of church leadership were passed on to those who followed him, then his cancer of opposition to the gospel would have been catastrophic. Thousands of souls would have been lost.

But in order to satisfy the immediate frustrations of Gaius, John advised Gaius to receive Demetrius (3 Jn 12). Gaius must put himself in the fellowship of those who have a good reputation (3 Jn 12). We thus assume that Demetrius had the reputation of living the gospel that must be preached throughout the world. Demetrius may have been a messenger sent by John with John’s letter in hand. Whether he lived in close proximity to Gaius, or was one of John’s fellow evangelists, John encouraged Gaius to receive and fellowship him as a source of good.

Because Diotrephes’ influence could possibly spread throughout the church at the time, the Christ-sent apostle John determined that he should personally show up at the door of Diotrephes’ house. If John had in mind his responsibility to exercise the duty of a Christ-sent apostle, then the ring of Diotrephes’ doorbell would not be pleasant.

By this time in the history of the church, Diotrephes had surely heard that disciples dropped dead before Christ-sent apostles in the early beginnings of the church (At 5:1-11). Some were delivered unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh so that they might be taught gospel behavior (1 Co 5:4,5). Some were struck blind by a Christ-sent apostle (At 13:11). If John were coming with the same rod of discipline that Paul was prepared to use with some arrogant leaders in Corinth (1 Co 4:21), then Diotrephes was in trouble. John’s coming to Diotrephes would be as Paul’s coming to some arrogant leaders in Corinth:

For I fear, that perhaps when I come, I will not find you as I wish, and that I will be found by you to be as you do not wish ... lest when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and I will mourn over many who have already sinned, and have not repented ... (2 Co 12:20,21).

We must mention the preceding because we wonder why John decided not to write a lengthy letter about the problem. “I had many things to write to you, but I will not with ink and pen write them to you” (3 Jn 13). John did not write a lengthy list of instructions because he possibly felt that this situation was so serious that it needed the direct intervention of God through a Christ-sent apostle. Therefore, John wrote, “I hope to see you shortly” (3 Jn 14).

When we are faced with problems among the disciples in the church, it is best to first determine if the problems directly affect the underlying principles of the gospel and our responsibility to preach the gospel to the world. There will always be personality problems among disciples. Such was the case with Euodia and Syntyche in Philippi (Ph 4:2,3). But when problems affect the God-defined organic purpose of the body of Christ to preach the gospel to the world, then it is time to take action. This was the case where Gaius lived, for the evangelistic function of the body was under threat. The mission function of the body to preach the gospel to the world was being curtailed.

This particular case involved a local dysfunction of the mission outreach of the church. But the problem could have gone further, and subsequently, affected the immediate area in which the participants lived. It would be worth mentioning in this context the disagreement between Paul and Barnabas when Paul determined that it was time to continue their mission into Asia (At 15:36).

There was a disagreement between Paul and Barnabas in reference to giving John Mark a second chance, for he had turned back on the first journey (At 13:13). When it came time to go on the second journey, Paul did not believe that Mark was mature enough to go into the difficult areas to which he planned to go. Paul and Barnabas divided over the level of Mark's spiritual maturity, but both evangelists did not allow their disagreement to detour them from doing that which they must do, that is, preach the gospel to the world. Paul simply took Silas, and Barnabas took Mark, and all four men carried on in their mission to preach the gospel to the world (At 15:39-41).

Nothing should ever become an obstacle to the preaching of the gospel to the lost. If we allow dysfunctional problems in the local church to hinder the preaching of the gospel to the world, then we know that we are wrong. We are wrong because we are allowing personal squabbles to lead to the loss of souls.

It is not possible for most individuals as Gaius to quit their jobs and go into all the world as evangelists. If Gaius gave up his means of support, then there would be no support to give in order to send others into all the world. God's system of world evangelism involves senders and those sent. Paul explained, “And how will they preach unless they are sent?” (Rm 10:15).

The point is that if a sender is discouraged in his responsibility to send, then there is a problem. God's system of world evangelism breaks down. If another individual covets the money of the willing sender, then evil has entered the heart of the covetous person. This may have been the problem with Diotrephes. He may have simply coveted Gaius' support money for himself. Such is evil.

We must never forget that the eternal soul of a person is far more precious than any personal disagreements we may have with one another, or any love of money (See 1 Tm 6:12). Diotrephes was standing in the way of the preaching of the gospel to the world. For this reason, the Christ-sent apostle John was on his way to deal with him personally in order to either bring him to repentance, or move him out of the way. In either case, the gospel mission of the organic body of Christ had to go on.

CONTACT PROBLEMS

We must understand dysfunctional religion in order to understand autonomy. The word “autonomy” is not used in the New Testament. However, the concept is inferred in reference to warnings that the disciples guard themselves against dysfunctional religion that is sustained by lords of authority. We have found that it is quite difficult to explain the concept of autonomy to those who live in a religious world wherein individual church assemblies have commonly become insular, or a cocoon of fellowship within which members reaffirm their membership with one another. It is easy to be misunderstood when speaking of these things in a religious world of independent church groups that seek to function on their own. Nevertheless, we will give it a good effort. Since the Lord mandated that there be no lords of authority among His disciples, then it is imperative that we are vigilant in these matters lest we establish autonomous assemblies wherein dominant personalities take control of a group of disciples (See Mk 10:35-45).

In order to understand autonomy, it is necessary to first understand the simple fact that each individual disciple has direct contact with Jesus. Each Christian has a direct relationship with Jesus in his or her personal life. In order to understand this, we must not view the book of Acts from the perspective of independent church groups on earth looking up to the one head of the church, the Lord Jesus Christ. We must in thinking take our minds into the heavenly realm of Jesus at the right hand of God. From heaven, we must look down from the throne of Jesus to individual members of the body on earth. In the book of Acts, we see the Holy Spirit recording the function of the members as they went about as the result of the gospel motivating them to serve the Lord. The Holy Spirit, through the book of Acts, seeks to transcend our view of the organic body from a heavenly perspective. In order to do this, He places no emphasis on church groups functioning as independent groups that are governed by local authorities. He does not picture independent churches seeking to preserve their independence to be separated from one another.

On the contrary, the book of Acts is a heavenly view from the throne of King Jesus as He looks down on the obedient subjects of His galactic kingdom reign. The obedient subjects' relationship with the King, therefore, is direct, regardless of what group with which they sit on Sunday morning. The members' relationship with their King is not via independent church groups with whom the members showed up to sit together on Sunday morning. The fact that they sit together during an "hour of worship" does not allow them the opportunity to declare their autonomy from other assembled groups across town, or across the state. In other words, assemblies are not inherently autonomous.

Because we live in a world where we make Sunday morning assemblies identify the existence of "a church," we often confuse ourselves. We know that our membership is in heaven, but we are often confused by a secondary membership that we place with our favorite group with whom we assemble on Sunday morning. But the fact that the New Testament says nothing about the second membership emphasizes the point that our focus must be on our direct relationship with Jesus. Our relationship is directly with Jesus, not via our personal relationships with one another.

The rise in the last few decades of literature on the subject of one's "personal relationship with Jesus" is evidence of the fact that people are struggling to release themselves from the confines of institutional churchianity in order to restore a direct relationship with King Jesus. Our struggle to release ourselves from churchianity is a movement away from institutional religion. It was the same movement that Paul sought to encourage when he wrote the statement, "Stand fast therefore, in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage" (Gl 5:1).

If we place ourselves in the bondage of any lord but the Lord Jesus Christ, then we become a part of an autonomous institutional group that has separated itself from the whole. We have succumbed to a group of disciples who have been drawn away from the whole by those who seek to rule over us (See At 20:30).

Both Paul and Peter, following the exhortation of Jesus in Mark 10:42,43—that there be no lords of authority among the disciples—warned the disciples about forming autonomous structures of authority. These structures of autonomy are simply contrary to the personal relational connection that members of the body are to have with the universal Head of the body. Autonomous religious structures that separate individual members of the body from one another are contrary to the mandate of the Holy Spirit that the church is a worldwide fellowship. Where the members sit on Sunday morning in different cities and states does not separate them from one another. Assemblies of the members must never be used to make the members autonomous from one another. The Spirit says,

For as the body is one [universally], and has many members [throughout the world], and all the members of the one [universal] body, though they are many [worldwide], are one body, so also is Christ [universally]" (1 Co 12:12).

ISOLATIONISTS

One of the greatest fellowship statements of the Scriptures that explains the cause of the universal bond that Christians have with one another throughout the world is 1 John 1:3:

That [resurrected Jesus] which we have seen and heard we [apostles] declare to you so that you also may have fellowship with us, and truly our fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ.

Included in John's use of the word "us" is at least himself and the other Christ-sent apostles who experienced the resurrected body of Jesus. But since 1 John was written to all of us, then the bond that holds all of us together as one universal family is the resurrected Son of God. Whatever our definition of autonomy might be, it must never endanger the unity that we have with one another as the universal body of Christ.

1 Corinthians 12:12 is a clear statement of the connectivity in ministry of the members of this universal church of Christ. When we allow the individual members of the body to maintain their direct connection with the resurrected Jesus as their only Lord and Head, then there is no temptation to move toward autonomous institutional sects. We are functional with one Lord and one Head. When different sects serve different lords and heads on earth, then the members of each sect become dysfunctional in their relationship with the only Lord and head of the church.

If we understand the true meaning of 1 Corinthians 12:12, and the entire context of 1 Corinthians 12, then we must conclude that there is no such thing as autonomous assembly sects, regardless of where the members of each group sit on Sunday morning. Individual submission to the lordship of Jesus guards against the members' becoming autonomous from one another. When members of the body determine not to be brought into the bondage of institutional religion that is perpetuated by authorities on earth, then they begin to understand the fellowship of the worldwide body of Christ from the top down, and not from the bottom up. When all of us focus on the one resurrected King Jesus, then we are held together in the bond of peace.

An example is fitting here to explain this organic function of unity. We must resort to our former Mid-western Kansas rural culture. Throughout the state (province) of Kansas in America there are several assemblies of the saints. The assemblies are scattered across the state, being several miles from one another. It is impossible for them to be together as "one church" in one assembly on Sunday morning. Nevertheless, they seek to behave as one church throughout the state of Kansas regardless of where they are on Sunday morning. Now those institutional churches that seek to be autonomous with their own authority structures, cannot identify with this behavior.

In the central part of the state of Kansas is the well-known Silver Maple Camp. Throughout the year, this camp is used as a collective gathering of all the members of the body in Kansas, whether young or old. When we were young children, we used to go to this camp and meet with other young people from across the state. The same tradition continues today. At the "camp assembly (church)" attendees would identify themselves as being from a particular town somewhere in Kansas. They would do so if there were only one assembly of the church in the small town from where they came. If there were more than one assembly in the particular town or city, the camp participants would identify the assembly group by a street address or city suburb.

But generally, everyone at the camp, both staff and participants, worked as the one church of Kansas regardless of where they sat on Sunday morning the first Sunday after any camp session. There was no autonomy among the participants because there were no power struggles between the town assemblies from which the members came. It was a reflection of the pioneering spirit of unity with which Central America was settled as a farming community two centuries ago. If farmers functioned autonomously from one another back in those pioneering days, then they would not have survived. They realized that their existence as farmers in the pioneering days of America depended on their working together as much as possible.

Hierarchal institutional religion works against the desire of members of the body to function together as one body. If there is within the leadership those who seek to lord over the flock, or to draw away members after themselves in order to be autonomous, then they are walking contrary to the universal unity of the one body of Christ. They have weakened the body of Christ.

Therefore, autonomy is wrong when church groups structure themselves around an authority other than Christ who has all authority over all things (Mt 28:18). Strict autonomous groups hinder the growth of the church because of the religious structures of lordship that separate the disciples from one another.

However, autonomy is right when members of the body seek to keep themselves separate from autonomous religions and their structures of authority by which the members would be brought into the bondage of any individual or board of individuals. When institutional churches start coming together in order to designate a regional chairman, president, head or pope of the churches in the city or province, then it is time to read again Jesus, Paul and Peter. Those individual members who seek to avoid the institutional structures of religious authority must declare their autonomy from such. If they do not, then the autonomy of the religious authorities will eventually destroy their fellowship with one another as the worldwide body of Christ. Their desire to conform to authorities on earth will endanger their submission to the only Lord and head over all things.

The Holy Spirit had this in mind when He had Paul inscribe the following reminder: “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1). This statement was not made in reference to a doctrinal position, but in reference to a religious sect of authorities who would entangle the free.

STINGY GIVING

One of the first evidences of institutional religion shows up at the bank. There is, of course, the evidence of structures of authority that maintain the earthly organization of the religion itself. Organizational structures are set in place in order to maintain the identity of the institution. But in order for order to be maintained, there must be those whose focus it is to preserve the institution through doctrinal pronouncements. These promoters must be professionals, and thus supported by the institution itself. When salaries determine faithfulness to the institution, then the institution is perpetuated by the full-time professionals, whose salaries depend on the existence of the institution.

The early Jewish disciples came out of a very stringent religious system that was funded by the Pharisaical establishment of the day. As the fully supported religious leaders of the establishment, the Pharisees were lovers of money (Lk 16:14). In fact, they were so dominant over the Jews in reference to money that they obligated the children of aged parents to first contribute to the religious establishment—which meant support for the Pharisees—before they considered supporting their own aged parents. They laid guilt on the hearts of the children by pronouncing that the financial contributions of the children be declared as Corban, “that is to say, given to God” (Mk 7:11). And when the Corban contribution was “given to God,” we know who profited from the contribution.

When the early disciples obeyed the gospel, they were delivered from this corrupt system of the Pharisees. They even went from legalized contributions of the tithe to contributions that were free-will, that is, given cheerfully out of a heart that was moved by the gospel of grace. The motivation for the contributions of the disciples, therefore, is explained in 2 Corinthians 9:7: “Let each one give according as he purposes in his heart, not grudgingly or under compulsion, for God loves a cheerful giver.” This is incarnational giving as Jesus gave Himself to us. It is totally contrary to the compulsive giving that was taught by the Pharisees.

When one obeyed the gospel and began his journey of incarnational living, giving was no longer a legal tithe according to the Sinai law. Since the early Jewish Christians became “dead to the law through the body of Christ,” they were no longer under the law of the tithe (Rm 7:4). They no longer gave according to law, but according to grace. For this reason, those who enforce giving according to law, do not understand the gospel. Laying burdens on the people according to law is contrary to gospel giving. When Paul revealed that we are no longer under law, but under grace (Rm 6:14), he meant that even the tithe according to law was gone. There need be no law for giving when grace moves one beyond what law would require (See 2 Co 8:1-4).

As the body of Christ, a Christian now “purposes in his own heart” that which he would give. This is not purposing according to law, but purposing according to gratitude. In this manner, the contribution is not grudgingly given according to law. Nor is the contribution made under compulsion as was the Corban contribution that the Pharisees demanded. Because Christians give out of gratitude, they are thus loved by God because they have given out of their love for God. Whenever contributions are demanded by compulsion, then the “extractors” steal away the cheerfulness of the giver. And if God loves the cheerful giver who gives out of thanksgiving, then what would be His relationship with the one who gives out of law or compulsion?

We must make this point in reference to contributions that were made to the widows of the early church. We must also make the point of twisted giving that was promoted by the Pharisees and was part of the religious culture of the day. We seek to understand the culture of Pharisaical giving in order to understand how some in the early church took advantage of gospel-motivated giving.

Gospel-motivated giving was contrary to that which was demanded by the Pharisees who sought to be put on the top of the priority list when it came to giving. In declaring the contribution of the children to be Corban—that is, given to the full-time workers first—the early disciples reversed the order. The aged widows came first, and then contributions could go to others.

In the previous statement of Paul in 2 Corinthians 9:7, gospel giving was identified. Stated clearly, it was the gospel of grace that motivated the early disciples to sacrificially give. We see this in Paul's statement of 2 Corinthians 4:15: "For all things are for your sakes, so that the grace that is reaching many people may cause thanksgiving to abound to the glory of God." Grace is abounding when it shows up in the collection plate.

Because the early disciples had obeyed the gospel of grace in baptism, they sought to give as God had given grace to them through His incarnate Son. Paul wrote that we "know the things that are freely given to us by God" (1 Co 2:12). We thus give because we were freely given grace by God. This answers why the early Christians were so eager to give, even from the very beginning of the church in Acts 2.

Now all who believed were together and had all things in common. And they sold their possessions and goods and divided them to all, as everyone had need (At 2:44,45).

Now the multitude of those who believed were of one heart and one soul. And no one said that any of the things that he possessed was his own. But they had all things in common (At 4:32).

Nor was there any among them who lacked, for as many as were owners of land or houses sold them and brought the proceeds of the things that were sold and laid them at the apostles' feet. And distribution was made to everyone according as each had need (At 4:34,35).

The early disciples were zealous in their sacrificial giving because "great grace was upon them all" (At 4:33).

We can only imagine what it would have been like to be in their presence. Because we live in such a materialistic world today wherein possessions are held in high esteem, we wonder how powerful the grace of God can work in one's heart to give in such a manner as the early Christians. Their gospel-obedient giving was so strong that some, even out of their poverty, were willing to give to those who were suffering from a famine (2 Co 8:1-4). Paul wrote to the Corinthians about what the Philippians had done in their contributions to the famine victims of Judea. The Holy Spirit had Paul record in Scripture the behavior of these incarnate givers in order to spur us on to sacrificial giving as the incarnate Son gave to us.

The Corinthians had become dysfunctional in their promised contributions to the famine victims in Judea. Out of sight, out of mind. They had promised a year before that they would contribute to the need (2 Co 8:10). However, it seems that dysfunctional behavior among them as an organic body had diverted their attention from their responsibility as a part of the worldwide body of Christ to partner in care for the worldwide body. They held up their contributions while they argued over authority among themselves, debated over the eating of certain foods, and squabbled over tongues and prophecy. All such disorderly behavior among them was contrary to the love that should be expressed by God's family, both locally and universally. So Paul wrote 2 Corinthians 8 in order to embarrass them in reference to their promised contribution to those they should love in Judea.

In order to further embarrass them by what others were doing in reference to the famine, Paul wrote, "Moreover, brethren, we make known to you the grace of God that has been given to the churches of Macedonia" (2 Co 8:1). Grace was given through their obedience to the gospel of grace. The response to this grace was overwhelming. The same grace should produce the same response in the hearts of the Corinthians. It should inspire the same response in our hearts today.

Philippi and Thessalonica were both cities of the province of Macedonia. At the time, the disciples who lived in these cities were "in a great trial of affliction" (2 Co 8:2). However, out of "their deep poverty" they were cheerful givers. They were so willing in their giving that "beyond their ability they gave of their own accord" (2 Co 8:3). In fact, Paul wrote that they begged "us with much urgency that we would receive the gift" (2 Co 8:4). Gospel givers beg those in need to receive their gift.

All the grace-motivated Macedonians needed was the news that there was a famine in Judea. They then took the initiative to make the contribution, and then deliver it to Paul, Silas and Timothy to take on to Judea. It seems that the evangelists were unaware that the disciples in Thessalonica and Philippi were making the contribution. The Macedonians simply made the contribution because they heard of the need of their brothers in Judea. They then begged the evangelists to take the contribution on to Judea.

When we understand the extent and willingness to which the early disciples were driven by the gospel of the incarnate Son of God who gave up heaven for us, then we begin to understand the power of the gospel to transform lives. We begin to understand also that the gospel produced a culture of giving that was unparalleled in history. When people live the incarnational life of the Son of God, sacrificial giving is no longer sacrificial. It is natural for those who seek to live incarnation-ally after the example of the incarnate King. Therefore, we can only imagine that there would be those who would take advantage of such willingness to give sacrificially from the heart.

When we understand the giving nature of the gospel, then we begin to understand why the Philippians, out of their deep poverty, were willing to give to the famine victims of Judea (See 2 Co 8:1-4). We begin to understand why the early disciples sold their possessions in order to be scattered abroad preaching the gospel. We understand why Paul considered his past possessions and position to be refuse (Ph 3:8).

MONEY PROBLEMS

Then in their mission travels, Paul, Silas and Timothy, after leaving Philippi, came to the city of Thessalonica. From the province of Macedonia, where the cities of Thessalonica and Philippi were located, a curious financial scenario developed as the body of Christ increased in the provinces of Macedonia and Achaia. The relationship between the Macedonian and Achaian disciples illustrated the relationship between the gospel-driven Macedonians and dysfunctional Achaians in reference to the universal function of the body of Christ.

From the low income environment of Philippi, to the high income socialites in Thessalonica, the nature of the church in Macedonia was established on the foundation of economic extremes. Nevertheless, the church in both cities caught the vision of gospel-motivated evangelism.

When the gospel was preached in Thessalonica, many were “persuaded and joined with Paul and Silas, a great multitude of the devout Greeks and not a few of the leading women” (At 17:4). The leading women were certainly not financially challenged. In order to help ourselves make our way through the Holy Spirit’s manual on church finances, we must follow the story of the Thessalonians and Philippians as they reached out to partner in order to evangelize Achaia.

The first chapter of the Achaians dysfunctional behavior in reference to finances was addressed when Paul wrote the letter of 2 Corinthians (2 Co 1:1). The letter of 2 Corinthians was evidently written from the province of Macedonia where Paul was at the time on his second visit to Achaia, and specifically to the city of Corinth. In the first chapter of the letter, Paul explained that he had a change of plans while he was still in Asia.

And in this confidence I intended to come to you before [straight from Ephesus] so that you might have a second blessing [of my teaching], and to pass by you [in Achaia] on my way to Macedonia, and to come again out of Macedonia to you, and be helped [supported] by you on my way to Judea (2 Co 1:15:16).

But in order to spare the Achaians embarrassment of not having taken up their provincial contribution for the famine victims of Judea that they promised a year before, Paul changed his plans and went first to Macedonia after leaving Asia (2 Co 1:23; 2:13). From Asia, however, he sent Titus on to Achaia. From Macedonia he wrote the letter of 2 Corinthians to all the Christians in Achaia. In the letter he made several comments about their financial dysfunctions that needed to be corrected before he arrived. If they were not corrected by the time he and some Macedonian brethren arrived in Achaia with him, then both he and the Achaians would be embarrassed.

When Titus eventually came from Achaia to Paul in Macedonia to report concerning the “desire, mourning, and zeal” that the Achaians had for Paul, Paul was greatly comforted (2 Co 7:6,7). Because of the “church politics” that prevailed in Achaia at the time, Paul was fearful for the reception of Titus. But when Titus arrived from Macedonia, he brought with him great comfort to Paul concerning how he was received in Achaia. Paul was reassured that his first letter to them to correct problems that surrounded different immature personalities was successful.

Paul’s first letter of correction had produced great sorrow in the hearts of the Achaia disciples (2 Co 7:8-12). However, their sorrow over previous dysfunctional behavior was their vindication that they still had a heart for God (2 Co 7:11). Their tremendous reception of Titus was the evidence that their hearts were still right with God, though there were still some among them who were false apostles masquerading themselves as apostles of Christ. Nevertheless, the majority prevailed and the rebellious minority were sidelined.

The Achaians had promised a year before that they would make a combined contribution to give to the famine victims of Judea. But because of their squabbles over church politics, they had not followed through on their promise, and thus needed to be reminded by Titus. Because of some power struggles among the Corinthians, their thinking was diverted. Church politics had plagued their thinking with inward turmoil. But now from Macedonia, Paul sought to encourage them to get their contribution together before he arrived. So he reminded them of the generous givers of Macedonia, which included Christians in both Thessalonica and Philippi.

Paul wrote to all in Achaia, “We make known to you the grace of God that has been given to the churches of Macedonia” (2 Co 8:1). This grace was made known in their hearts because of the Macedonians’ response to the needs of those in Judea. So “in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty, abounded in the riches of their liberality” (2 Co 8:2). When hearts are moved by the heart of God, money becomes only an instrument to bless others who are in need. Giving according to law passes away when gratitude for the gospel takes hold of our hearts.

This is the nature of grace. Grace was given to us when we were in need (Rm 5:8). Grace, therefore, can be manifested in our hearts only when we give as God gave to us. This is the principle that Jesus revealed to the apostles: “Freely you have received, freely give” (Mt 10:8). There were no limits to the free gift of the grace of God (Rm 5:15-17; 6:23). There must therefore be no limits to our free giving when we are moved by His free grace. We freely give in abundance because He freely gave His grace in abundance while we were yet in sin (Rm 5:8). We do not forget what the Holy Spirit wrote to the Romans: “They who receive abundance of grace [that’s us] and of the gift of righteousness will reign in life through the one, Jesus Christ” (Rm 5:17).

Paul related to the Achaians that the Macedonian Christians in their deep poverty went beyond what they had previously planned to give (2 Co 8:3). After witnessing their poverty, Paul was apprehensive about receiving their contribution. He was so apprehensive that the Macedonians had to beg him to receive their contribution (2 Co 8:4).

Some historians believe that the Macedonians had recently suffered through a devastating earthquake in the region, since earthquakes are common throughout Greece. Regardless of what caused their “deep poverty,” they were freely willing to give to others. This is gospel-motivated giving that is caused by the free gift of God’s grace (2 Co 4:15). Therefore, gospel-motivated people are revealed through their gospel-motivated contributions. Stingy givers have little appreciation for the grace of God by which they are saved.

We must give some credit to the Achaians. A year before they were zealous to make the contribution. But this was before Paul wrote 2 Corinthians. “I know the willingness of your mind, of which I boast of you to those of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago. And your zeal has stirred up the majority” (2 Co 9:2). But they had become either forgetful, or indifferent about carrying through with what they had promised. Their minds were sidetracked by internal turmoil within the fellowship of the disciples. So Paul sent brethren to Achaia to talk specifically about contributions for the famine victims (2 Co 9:3-5). They needed exhortation to turn their dysfunctional lack of contributions into functional action.

In the 2 Corinthian letter Paul reminded the Achaians of his first mission trip to the area. While in Corinth on his second missionary trip, he supported himself through tentmaking (At 18:1-3). He did so in order not to be a financial burden to them as new converts (2 Co 11:9). It was then that the new converts of Macedonia continued to send support to him in order to make up what his tentmaking business lacked (2 Co 11:9). So Paul had initially preached to them without obligating them to support him. He took pride in the fact that he preached the gospel to them freely. “As the truth of Christ is in me, no one will stop me from this boasting [in supporting myself] in the regions of Achaia” (2 Co 11:10).

Some “full-time” preachers today cannot say this about themselves. In fact, there are those who often boast in the fact that they are supported full-time. In the past, we have unfortunately witnessed a few formerly full-time preachers who stopped preaching when their support stopped. The termination of their preaching when their support was terminated proved that their support should have been terminated, for they were not gospel-motivated messengers of the gospel. If one preaches the gospel because he is supported to preach, then he should immediately cease accepting support until he awakens within him the motivation of the heart of God. His motives are contrary to the free gift of God’s grace through the gospel if he is preaching in order to receive a pay check.

Paul’s point in the context of 2 Corinthians 11 was to remind the Achaians that when he was in their midst sharing the truth of the gospel with them, someone else was paying the bill. He was the only “Bible” they had, but someone else had to pay for their Bible. He reminded them, “I robbed other churches, taking wages from them, in order to serve you” (2 Co 11:8).

The Achaians were financially dysfunctional from the beginning in that they allowed others to pay their preacher. Disciples who continually receive teaching from one who is supported by someone else, will never spiritually grow to the limits to which the gospel can take one. They will always be spiritually dysfunctional and financially crippled because they have not taken ownership of supporting the laborer among them who is worthy of his hire (Lk 10:7; 1 Tm 5:18).

Of course there was a reason why Paul allowed the Achaiaans to be dysfunctional in this matter when he first arrived in Corinth. There were those among the Achaiaans who were prophets for profit. So in order to cut off accusations from the profiteering prophets, Paul supported himself. However, he was coming to them again, thus he reminded them that he would do the same as he did on his first visit, that is, support himself. He wrote,

But what I do [in supporting myself] I will continue to do so that I may cut off opportunity from those who desire an opportunity to be regarded just as we are in the matter about which they are boasting (2 Co 11:12).

In their efforts to be supported by the Corinthians, the profiteering prophets among them were “false apostles, deceitful workers, masquerading themselves as apostles of Christ” (2 Co 11:13).

There is often a slow start in the beginning of the gospel in the hearts of some. However, this was not the case with the Macedonians (See Ph 4:15,16). The Macedonian disciples gave out of their poverty because they sought to live the incarnational life of the One who brought them into His fellowship through the cross. The Achaiaans, on the other hand, were not yet there. They knew what to do. But the problem was the self-centered false prophets who were yet among them. These false teachers diverted the Achaian’s novice thinking away from Paul and the famine victims. They sought the support that should be going to benevolence and the preaching of the gospel, just as the Pharisees pronounced the support of the children for their aged parents to be Corban (Mk 7:11). For this reason, the masquerading false apostles among them would soon taste the discipline of the rod of the Christ-sent apostle if they did not repent (1 Co 4:21).

What is encouraging about the Achaiaans was their response to the personal visit of Titus. Their response to the coming of Titus proved that the majority of the disciples in Achaia continued with great love and concern for Paul. After writing the second letter, they corrected their dysfunctional giving by the time he arrived in Corinth on his second visit. From the time Paul wrote the first letter from Asia, and the arrival of Titus from Achaia, to the time he wrote the second letter from Macedonia, they had repented. Though they were about five years in the faith after being converted from temple idolatry, they were willing to grow in the grace and knowledge of Jesus Christ (2 Pt 3:18).

The Achaia story teaches us a very important lesson in reference to spiritual growth in kingdom business. At the beginning of their journey in discipleship of Jesus, the Achaiaans were not where they wanted to be, or should be. They were diverted by “ministry thieves” who sought to draw attention to themselves. These false apostles sought to divert the novice Christians’ attention away from the famine victims in Judea in order to extract support for themselves. They were self-centered profiteering preachers among them who wanted the money for themselves, and thus they possibly urged the Achaiaans not to send their money off to the foreign country of Judea. Whenever a preacher behaves in this manner, he has identified himself as a profiteering prophet who masquerades as a true messenger of the word of God. But such people are as Paul identified them: “False apostles, deceitful workers, masquerading themselves as apostles of Christ” (2 Co 11:13). Such profiteers existed in the first century. They will exist today.

PROFITEERING PROPHETS

Remember those women of wealth in Thessalonica (At 17:4)? They had not lost their wealth by the time Paul wrote his last epistle, which was directed to Timothy. When Paul finalized the letter, he wrote of one preacher who was, as the Pharisees, a lover of money (Lk 16:13). So Paul established his legacy in Scripture since the first century: “Demas has forsaken me, having loved this present world, and has departed to Thessalonica” (2 Tm 4:10). It was not stated that Demas was afraid to die with Paul in Rome. He “loved this present world.” And in being a lover of money, he went where he could find some soft-hearted wealthy sisters. He headed for Thessalonica.

Profit-seeking preachers often harp Sunday after Sunday about “tithing.” “Don’t rob God,” is a statement that is often voiced from those who are preachers for hire. It was because of this that Paul worked as a tentmaker in Corinth. What he financially lacked was supplied by those from Macedonia. The problem in the Corinthian society was that the city was laden with prophets for hire. Paul did not want to be identified with any of these profiteers.

Simon the sorcerer was one of these people in the city of Samaria. When Philip went to Samaria, his presence threatened the financial status of Simon. When “the people with one accord gave attention to those things that Philip spoke,” then there were problems for Simon (At 8:6). It was then that Simon, who claimed “that he was someone great,” became jealous (At 8:9). As the people turned to the gospel that Philip preached, Simon saw that his financial base was in trouble.

Simon “had for a long time astonished them with his magical arts” (At 8:11). But this means of support was coming to a close. Therefore, he tried to make a financial investment in the ability of the Christ-sent apostles of Peter and John, who later came to Samaria. He offered them money for their gift to impart the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit in order that he too could do the same for a profit (At 8:18). But the Holy Spirit judged his motives as “wickedness” (At 8:22). He was full of bitterness because his means for financial gain in Samaria had been destroyed through the preaching of the gospel (At 8:23).

Religious profiteering also existed in the city of Ephesus. When the gospel was preached in the city, “many who believed kept coming, confessing ...” (At 19:18). “So the word of God grew mightily and prevailed [over religious superstition]” (At 19:20). This created a significant problem for those who profited from religion. Demetrius, who made idol shrines, led a rebellion against the gospel preacher. He rightly accused, “Not only is this our craft in danger of falling [financially] into disrepute,” but also the center of our religion, the great temple of Diana (At 19:27). So when the other religious profiteers heard this, “they were full of wrath” (At 19:28). And so are all those whose pay check is endangered by the preaching of the gospel.

In Corinth, the same financial scenario existed among religious leaders as the case in Samaria with Simon. Profiteering preachers pronounced oracles for gain. In Ephesus they made idols for gain. But when the gospel arrived through Paul, evidently some of these profiteering prophets did the same as Simon. They joined themselves to the body of saints, and subsequently sought to continue on with their profiteering by taking advantage of the novice disciples in Achaia. They were taking advantage of the body of Christ, and such called for extreme measures if it were not corrected by the time a Christ-sent apostle arrived in town.

The Christ-sent apostle was coming to the church in Corinth with the rod of discipline. This was not a hard sermon, but physical discipline. It was discipline that came upon brothers Hymenaeus and Alexander whom Paul “delivered to Satan so that they might learn not to blaspheme” (1 Tm 1:20). We should ask Ananias and Sapphira about the power of a Christ-sent apostle (See At 5:1-11). And then we should ask the false prophet Bar-jesus (At 13:10,11). When Paul was coming to Corinth with the rod of a Christ-sent apostle, there was coming more than judgments made during a church business meeting.

There were those in Corinth who were taking financial advantage of the new Christians who had not been in the faith for more than five or six years. After reviewing both the law of God, and logic to support a laborer (1 Co 9:1-11), Paul came to a very important statement in reference to what was going on among the Achaians. He introduced his instructions of rebuke with a question, “If we sowed to you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we reap your material things?” (1 Co 9:11). And then he stated,

If others are partakers of this right over you [to support them], do we not more [have a right to be supported by you]? Nevertheless, we have not used this right [to be supported], but endure all things so that we should not hinder the gospel of Christ [by being accused of preaching for money] (1 Co 9:12).

There were others among the Corinthians who were being supported by the Corinthians. These were those who made slanderous reports against Paul. In order to guard their support from the Corinthians, they took the Diotrefes' route of slandering all possible opposition (1 Co 10:30; see 3 Jn 10). Paul was fearful that when he came to them, “I will not find you as I wish” (2 Co 12:20). He was fearful that if he came and found among them strife, jealousy, wrath, disputes, slanderings, whisperings, conceits and tumults, then he knew, “My God will humble me among you, and I will mourn over many who have already sinned and have not repented” (2 Co 12:20,21).

His coming to them would be a situation as that of Annanias and Sapphira who dropped dead before the disciples in Jerusalem. There was great sorrow over the fact, but God took the matter into His own hands by taking their life from them before the whole church. In view of such an incident in the Jerusalem church, Paul was fearful that if he came to the Corinthians, and stood before those who slanderously reported of things by which they would exalt themselves, the same might occur in the Corinthian church. They behaved in such a manner in order to retain the financial support of those over whom they had deceived. But they were taking financial advantage of the body of Christ. Such financial profiteering at the expense of innocent sheep could not continue.

The new Christians were so naive concerning these matters that those they had supported were involved in idolatrous temple behavior. They were involved in “uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness” (2 Co 12:21). We once heard the complaint of some disciples who could not get rid of their preacher. He had committed adultery with four of the sisters of the church, but they still could not rid themselves of him. We must not think that these were only first century problems in Corinth. If one would look around in the religious world today, the same unrighteousness prevails among those who are preachers for hire.

We must always be reminded of the situation that prevailed during the time of Eli and his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas (1 Sm 2). The Holy Spirit identified these two sons to be “sons of rebellion” (1 Sm 2:12). “They did not know the Lord” (1 Sm 2:12). They behaved as profiteering preachers today. In other words, they financially took advantage of the people by extracting gain from what the people were obligated to do in obedience to God.

In the case of Hophni and Phinehas, they took advantage of the peoples’ offerings. They wanted to take the offerings before they were properly boiled in the pot (1 Sm 2:15). They wanted the meat raw. When the people said they could have as much as they wanted after it was properly boiled, Hophni and Phinehas said, “No, but you will give it now, and if not, I will take it by force” (1 Sm 2:16). Samuel recorded of the behavior of these two preachers: “Therefore, the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord, for men abhorred the offering of the Lord” (1 Sm 2:16).

With some religious groups, it is sometimes as faithful people today abhorring attendance that they are obligated to do. They abhor attendance because the profiteering preacher always preaches on tithing in an effort to extract their money for his own coffer. One church group was so guilt ridden with the preacher’s intimidation concerning the offering that they decided to get together and scrape up enough money to buy the preacher a vehicle. So they contributed together only enough money to buy the preacher a small Citi Gulf (similar to a Volkswagen Beetle). With great pride they presented the vehicle as a surprise gift to the preacher. But the preacher took the little Citi Gulf down to a local vehicle dealership and traded it for a new Chrysler. He did not want to be seen driving around in a humble little Citi Gulf.

We know the end of the story of Hophni and Phinehas. God first went after Eli for not disciplining his two sons in righteousness.

Why do you kick at My sacrifice and at My offering that I have commanded in My habitation, and honor your sons more than Me, to make yourselves fat with the best of all the offerings of Israel My people? (1 Sm 2:29).

God then went after the two sons. When it was too late for the two sons, the sons “did not hearken to the voice of their father, because the Lord desired to slay them” (1 Sm 2:25). And such the Lord did.

It would not have been a strange thing, therefore, if Paul came to Corinth with the rod of discipline. There would be some delivered unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh in order that they might be taught. People as Hophni and Phinehas must be taught not to mess with the body of the incarnate Son of God. Though in this present age those unscrupulous profiteers who take advantage of the innocent sheep of God are not punished directly, they will eventually face their judgment when the Lord Jesus is revealed from heaven.

MINISTRY THIEVES

Throughout our years of work around the world, we have had the privilege of working with several different ministry outreaches. With the help of many volunteers, first we focused on those ministries that were first evangelistic, and then with efforts to build up the body of Christ worldwide. We mention these ministries in order to establish a context that seems to have happened in Achaia in reference to the ministry of Paul. The principle of “ministry theft” is based on either the unwillingness, or inability, of some who have difficulty in initiating and working their own ministry. Instead of initiating their own ministry, they would seek to take over the ministry of someone else. This seems to have been the case with some in Corinth.

As we study through what happened in Achaia, specifically in the city of Corinth, we gain a better understanding of those who have difficulty exercising self-initiative in starting and maintaining their own ministry.

There was ministry theft going on after Paul left Corinth to go on to other areas. When he wrote back a few years later after leaving Corinth, he identified what was happening, and thus, he defined for us some things that would help us as leaders to approach and correct those who would seek to take over the ministry of someone else against their will.

A. Initiation of the work:

It was on Paul's second missionary journey that he made his way to Corinth. This may have been in A.D. 51 in his efforts to be in Corinth for the Isthmian Games where athletes gathered from across the Roman Empire for competition in games that were similar to the Olympic Games.

After preaching the gospel in the city of Athens, "Paul departed from Athens and came to Corinth" (At 18:1). It was in Corinth that he met Aquila and Priscilla, with whom he joined in ministry of the word to all Achaia, supporting himself with them in the tentmaking business (At 18:2,3).

During his initial stay, "he reasoned in the synagogue every Sabbath and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks" (At 18:4). The team of three were later joined by Silas and Timothy who came from Macedonia (At 18:5). Regardless of some opposition from the unbelieving Jews, "many of the Corinthians hearing, believed and were baptized" (At 18:8). Paul subsequently stayed in Corinth for a protracted period of time. "He continued there a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them" (At 18:11).

He could have possibly stayed longer than the year and a half mentioned in Acts 18:11. After stating the period of one and a half years, Luke also stated in verse 18, "Now Paul still remained there a good while." After this, "he took leave from the brethren and sailed for Syria" (At 18:18).

We would thus credit the initial preaching and establishment of the disciples in Corinth to the initiative of Paul who initially worked in the city. We do not know how long he worked until he eventually encountered Aquila and Priscilla, but it was possibly soon after his arrival. We do not know when Silas and Timothy eventually followed him from Macedonia to join in the ministry. But in reference to the problem that later developed, we must give the apostle Paul credit for initiating the preaching of the gospel in the city of Corinth. He stood alone as he stood up and preached the gospel.

B. Entrance of ministry thieves:

When Paul left Corinth for Syria on his way to Jerusalem, there arose among the disciples in Corinth the problem of ministry theft about which he later referred in 1 & 2 Corinthians. When he wrote in reference to those who sought to assume credit for the existence of the Corinthian disciples, he introduced this subject with the following statement:

Because the foolishness of God is wiser than men and the weakness of God is stronger than men, for you see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called (1 Co 1:25,26).

Those who would seek to take ownership of the ministry of others are puffed up. They are not wise in their efforts, nor mighty in works they claim for themselves, and thus they lack nobility. If one would claim the ministry of another without giving honor to the one to whom honor is due for initiating the ministry, then he is not wise, mighty or noble. This helps us understand the personality of those who would seek to take over the ministry of others, and thus claim the ministry for themselves. This would help explain the character of the preacher who follows a hard working preacher who labored before him. If the succeeding preacher takes credit for the work of the preacher who went before him, then he is not wise.

As we work our way through Paul's description of ministry theft, it is necessary to notice his sarcasm. For example, those who steal the ministry of others think they are wise. They think they are mighty for their works. The result is that they have deceived themselves into thinking that they are noble people. But they are not. The very fact that they seek to take ownership of someone else's labors identifies their true character.

So Paul begins his rebuke of these takeover artists with a question: "For what man knows the things of a man except the spirit of man that is in him?" (1 Co 2:11). There were those among the Corinthians who knew only the things of men. But in contrast to worldly wisdom, Paul wrote, "Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit who is from God" (1 Co 2:12). God had given the Holy Spirit to Paul and the other apostles "so that we [apostles] might know the things that are freely given to us by God" (1 Co 2:12). Paul thus lays the foundation of contrast between those who would claim that the human spirit that is within them is the Holy Spirit, but is actually the wisdom of their own spirit.

The Holy Spirit was not in them to lead them by inspiration to reveal the truth of God. They had only their spirit of understanding on which to depend. And in their claim to have the Holy Spirit to reveal “the things” that were delivered to the Corinthians by the Spirit-inspired revelation of the apostle Paul, they were arrogantly trying to compare themselves with a Holy Spirit-inspired apostle. Paul would later refer to such people as “false apostles, deceitful workers, masquerading themselves as apostles of Christ” (2 Co 11:15). He later instructed the misled Corinthians, “And no wonder, for Satan masquerades himself as a messenger of light” (2 Co 11:14). He was saying to the gullible Corinthians that they should not be easily led astray by those who are so presumptuous as to claim to have the same power as a Christ-sent apostle.

We must not take lightly those in Corinth who were seeking to lay claim to the work of God that came through the Spirit-inspired work of Paul. We must not be surprised that such people also work today among the people of God. When there are those who seek to steal the ministry of others by self-appointing themselves to be somebody, we must identify the source of the problem. Paul later identified the source in Corinth,

Therefore, it is no great thing if his [Satan’s] ministers also masquerade themselves as ministers of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works (2 Co 11:13).

C. Character of ministry thieves:

In addressing the Corinthian disciples as a whole, and in general all the saints throughout the province of Achaia (2 Co 1:1), Paul identified a problem that existed among the saints. “And I, brethren, could not speak to you as to spiritual men, but as to carnal, as to infants in Christ” (1 Co 3:1). They were behaving as babies. “I have fed you with milk, and not with meat, for until now you were not able to receive it. Even now you are still not able” (1 Co 3:2). Therefore, he concluded, “you are still carnal” (1 Co 3:3).

If they questioned his assessment, he asked them to answer a simple question: “For where there is envy and strife, are you not carnal and walking as worldly men?” (1 Co 3:4). So in the general context of their behavior as infants, he stated, “Brethren, do not be children in thinking. However, in malice be babes, but in thinking be mature” (1 Co 14:20).

Paul initially laid the foundation of the gospel in Corinth, and thus no other person could ever again lay claim to having started the church in Corinth. “I have laid the foundation and another builds on it” (1 Co 3:10). He then stated that someone must lay the foundation of Jesus Christ. If others come along and try to lay any foundation other than Jesus Christ, especially a foundation upon their own personality, then it is a foundation of wood, hay and straw (1 Co 3:12). Paul infers, therefore, that the day of trial will determine if the foundation he laid, which was “gold, silver, precious stones,” would be true, and the foundation of others, which was “wood, hay, straw,” would be unstable.

If churches are built on the foundation of carnally thinking men—laying the foundation of a church on one’s own person is carnal—then the works of such ministries will be burned up. Paul reminded the Corinthians that his work would permeate the fire of persecution because it was built on the gospel of Jesus Christ. Therefore, “If anyone’s work endures that he has built, he will receive a reward” if he builds on Jesus (1 Co 3:14).

Paul’s warning for the carnal among them was certainly appropriate: “Let no one deceive himself. If anyone among you seems to be wise in this world, let him become a fool so that he may be wise” (1 Co 3:18). Those who are arrogant have a difficult time building on the foundation of Jesus Christ because they seek to focus the attention of others on themselves.

As a Christ-sent apostle, Paul was a servant of Christ and a steward of the mysteries of God (1 Co 4:1). He reminded the Corinthians, therefore, that “it is required of stewards that one be found trustworthy” (1 Co 4:2). He was assuming that the disciples of Corinth could make a decision concerning the character of those who would claim to be Christ-sent apostles as he. They were claiming to be apostles, but they were masquerading as such, and thus, the masquerading apostles identified themselves to be untrustworthy.

Every preacher who wears a mask is not trustworthy. Some hide behind the mask of smooth and fair speech. They sound good, but inwardly they are wolves. Some hide in the deception of false miracles. They perform well before mesmerized audiences, but they are leaders in wolves’ clothing who are seeking the money of the people.

Though the efforts of the thieves urged the disciples to cast judgment upon Paul, Paul reminded them, “But to me it is a very small thing that I should be judged by you or by a human court. In fact, I do not judge my own self” (1 Co 4:3). Paul ignored their judgment of him because he was cautious not even to judge himself. Only God knows our hearts better than we know ourselves.

Jesus only will be our final judge (At 17:30,31). When He comes, He will “bring to light the hidden things of darkness and will manifest the motives of the hearts” (1 Co 4:5). The untrustworthy accusers of Paul would eventually be exposed. Unfortunately, at the time they would be exposed, it would be too late in reference to their salvation.

The ministry thieves in Corinth were puffed up, and subsequently judged Paul in comparison to themselves. But Paul revealed their behavior by his exhortation “that none of you take pride in one against another” (1 Co 4:6). Ministry thieves always find themselves comparing themselves with those whose ministry they have claimed ownership. In the second letter, Paul specifically identified the character and behavior of such people:

For we dare not class or compare ourselves with those who commend themselves. But they, measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves among themselves, are not wise (2 Co 10:12).

Those who seek to take credit for the ministry of others often marginalize the efforts of those who came before them. In a subtle rebuke of such people, Paul wrote, “We are not boasting of things beyond our measure, that is, of other men’s labors” (2 Co 10:15). Those who assume control over the work of others seek to minimize the efforts of those who went before them. They assume that they are preaching new things to the audience, claiming and wondering why the audience has never before heard what they are preaching. They forget that their audience often has a short-term memory problem in reference to the hard labors of the previous preacher.

Those who have gone before them have gone on to other regions. Paul went on from Corinth “to preach the gospel in regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man’s realm of accomplishment” (2 Co 10:16). This was Paul’s subtle challenge to those who came in behind him in Corinth and sought to take ownership of his ministry in Corinth. Paul was the initial preacher of the gospel in Corinth. These boastful preachers should do as he did by initiating their own work somewhere else.

Paul went on to other regions to preach the gospel in order that he preach Christ where Christ had not been preached. And because he was the initial messenger of the gospel in Corinth, as well as in virgin regions to which he went after Corinth, those who came after him could lay no claim to being the original preachers in Corinth. After Paul preached the gospel in Corinth, no one ever again could claim to be the father of the faith of the Corinthians.

Some preachers need to remember, “For it is not he who commends himself that is approved, but he whom the Lord commends” (2 Co 10:18). Before one starts bragging about his work in the Lord, he needs to remember that there is no commendation of one’s work outside the Lord. Before one starts taking credit for those he may baptize, he needs to consider the fact that someone may have preceded him in teaching the baptized person. For this reason, those who use baptism as a sign of their own successes may be trying to take ownership of another’s work who before them labored in the same area. We must keep in mind that we have the duty to plant and water. God gets all the glory for the increase (1 Co 3:6).

And continuing with his challenge to the ministry thieves, Paul referred to those who were boasting among the disciples. Notice how he sarcastically rebuked them in the following statement: “We are fools for Christ’s sake, but you are wise in Christ. We are weak, but you are strong. You are honored, but we are despised” (1 Co 4:10). Paul’s sarcastic rebuke of some in Corinth was that they claimed to be wise, strong, and thus sought honor. If they would be as Paul, they would claim to be “fools for Christ’s sake.”

Paul did not write to shame the entire church (1 Co 4:14). As a whole, he dealt with them as his children in the faith. But in doing so, he sought to shame the false apostles among them. He reminded the whole, “For though you have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet you have not many fathers, for in Christ Jesus I have brought you forth through the gospel” (1 Co 4:15). It was through his initial preaching of the gospel that motivated them to obey the gospel. The gospel did not originate with Aquila and Priscilla. It did not originate with the masquerading apostles. In Corinth and all Achaia it originated with the preaching of the gospel by Paul.

When ministry thieves seek to take ownership of someone else’s ministry, they will bring accusations against the father of the ministry. They, as Diotrephes, will slanderously accuse the father of the ministry of some lie or immoral behavior in order to gain the confidence of those over whom they seek to have control (See 3 Jn 10). So there were those among the Corinthians who accused Paul of being weak, and thus he could not stand against them in their honored positions that they assumed for themselves among the disciples. “Now some are arrogant, as though I would not come to you” (1 Co 4:18). Where the arrogant were wrong was that they thought Paul would not come. Paul wrote, “But I will come to you shortly” (1 Co 4:19).

He would come to them, but when he did, there would be no debates with words. He continued, “And I will know, not the speech of those who are arrogant, but the power” (1 Co 4:19). He was coming with the rod of discipline of a Christ-sent apostle. The Corinthians had to make a choice as to whether they wanted him to come with the power of the rod of discipline, or as he formerly came to them in a spirit of meekness (1 Co 4:21).

Since the ministry thieves had formerly experienced the power that God unleashed through a Christ-sent apostle, we would assume that they would be shaking in fear at what power Paul could unleash on them when he came. In a second letter of warning that he wrote from Macedonia, he reminded them, “Truly the signs of an apostle were worked among you in all perseverance, in signs and wonders and mighty deeds” (2 Co 12:12).

Paul was coming, but he wrote that repentance must occur before he arrived. “For I fear,” he warned, “that perhaps when I come, I will not find you as I wish, and that I will be found by you to be as you do not wish” (2 Co 12:20). Because he knew that God would obligate him to exercise the power of physical discipline in order to protect the body of His Son, Paul delayed his coming to them until they sorted out the arrogant false apostles among them. He wrote from Macedonia, “Moreover, I call God as a witness to my soul, that in order to spare you, I did not return [immediately] to Corinth” (2 Co 1:23).

He did not return according to his original plans to go directly from Asia. Instead, he went on to Macedonia in order to give them time to repent. If he had come directly from Asia as he originally planned, then he would have found them in the quagmire of their immaturity. God then would have delivered some unto the destruction of the flesh (See 1 Co 5:5).

Our immaturity is sometimes revealed when the temptation of money presents itself to our carnal nature. When there are those who come through with great sums of money in search of a ministry, they first try to purchase preachers. If a preacher can be bought with full-time support, then they will seek to purchase his ministry with their money.

No few preachers have been bought in the efforts of some to capture a ministry. This is especially true in developing world economies. We have witnessed the loss of freedom on the part of many faithful servants who sold themselves and their ministries as Balaam to the highest bidder (2 Pt 2:15). They subsequently preached the message of their supporters, and changed their ministry and preaching to conform to the desires of those who knew little about the field in which they labored.

The arrogant false apostles in Corinth saw the money, and thus they sought the support. Paul rebuked the entire group of disciples for allowing these false apostles to take advantage of them in reference to supporting them (1 Co 9:12). He embarrassed them by reminding them that though they were his children in the faith, they did not offer to support him while he was with them. Maybe they did not offer to support Paul because they knew that he could not be bought. He would not change his message in order to conform to their desires. He thus remained free from the strings of their support in order to preach the gospel without the meddling influence of a pay check.

Churches are often gullible in reference to supporting those who can be bought. Paul could not be bought, and thus when he came to the Corinthians again, he would not receive their support. And in the context of discussing this matter of financial support with the Corinthians, he concluded, “For though I am free from [the support] of all men, I have made myself a bondservant to all, so that I might gain the more” (1 Co 9:19). Not bad advice.

IDLE SPONGES

Living the gospel means more than believing the truth of the gospel. In his example before those to whom he formerly preached the gospel in Ephesus, the apostle Paul reminded the church leaders that if one would manifest himself as a Christian before others, then he must work with his hands in order to support himself. While he was preaching the gospel in Ephesus, Paul later reminded the leaders that he did just that: “You yourselves know that these hands have ministered to my necessities and to those who were with me” (At 20:34). This is part of living the gospel that one obeys.

There was more to working with one's hands to support one's self in order not to be a burden to others. “I have showed you all things,” Paul said to the church leaders, “that by laboring as this you must help the weak” (At 20:35). Paul supported himself with his own hands throughout most of his mission to preach the gospel (See At 18:3). But he did so in order that he might be able to leave a gospel example to help the poor.

There were gospel principles behind his labors. He wrote to Timothy the following exhortation in reference to the responsibility of the Christian to work:

*But if anyone does not provide for his own, and especially for those of his own household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever (1 Tm 5:8).

These are serious principles in reference to one taking ownership of his responsibility to provide for his own necessities, and those of his household. In the preceding statement, it was more than providing for one's self. One also had the responsibility to provide for those of his own house, as well as have the opportunity to give to the poor. If one does not work in order to provide at least for his own household, then he has denied the faith. If one would live the gospel of Jesus, therefore, he must work.

Some in Thessalonica fell short in this responsibility. They did so because they misunderstood Paul's teaching in reference to the final coming of Jesus. In the first letter that he wrote to the Thessalonian disciples, Paul made the following statement:

For this we say to you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord will not go before those who have fallen asleep (1 Th 4:15).

When Paul wrote concerning the final coming of the Lord Jesus, the thinking of some in Thessalonica went wild. For some reason, they thought that Paul was speaking of Jesus' coming in their lifetime, if not immediately. They subsequently quit their jobs and prepared for the end.

Because some quit their jobs, a serious dysfunctional social order developed among the members of the church in Thessalonica. Some quit their jobs and waited for the end. However, not everyone misunderstood Paul's reference to the final coming of the Lord. They had some sense about the matter, and thus they continued on with their jobs of working with their hands to support themselves and their families. But there were some who were either misguided, or simply somewhat lazy. They seized the opportunity to live off the labors of other brethren. In doing so, they gave up their right to remain in fellowship with the church.

By the time Paul wrote the second letter to the Thessalonians, some in Thessalonica had "denied the faith." They did not deny the faith by believing and teaching some heretical doctrine. They denied the faith through their laziness. When we read the Holy Spirit's correction of their dysfunctional life-style, we are reminded of the example that Paul revealed to the leaders of the church in Ephesus. We learn that obedience to and living the gospel is more than doctrinal matters. His was an example of gospel behavior that went far beyond the waters of baptism.

Paul began his rebuke of the lazy members among the Thessalonians with a commendation: "*We have confidence in the Lord concerning you, that you both do and will do the things we command you" (2 Th 3:4). Now here is one of those commands:

Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you withdraw yourselves from every brother who walks disorderly and not after the tradition that he received from us" (2 Th 3:6).

Unfortunately, this is one statement of Scripture that has been greatly misused and applied. Paul was saying nothing about doctrinal matters. It is unfortunate that many have failed to understand that this "command" about which Paul wrote was not in reference to what we commonly refer to as "doctrine." He was referring to how we would live the gospel. Their disorderly walk was in reference to how they behaved, not primarily what they believed in reference to the truth.

In the passage, Paul used the word "tradition," not doctrine, though what he is discussing may be considered doctrine. It is not doctrine according to our common understanding of the word. The tradition that the Thessalonians received from Paul was the behavioral example that he left with the church in Ephesus. This was the "doctrine" that "these hands have ministered to my necessities" (At 20:34). This was the gospel life-style that Paul left with the church in both Ephesus and Thessalonica. He explained,

*For you yourselves know how you ought to follow us, for we did not behave ourselves disorderly among you, nor did we eat any man's bread without paying for it. But we worked with labor and hardship night and day so that we might not be a burden to any of you (2 Th 3:7,8).

It was not that Paul did not have a right to be supported by Christians. But he, Silas and Timothy worked at tentmaking in order to "make ourselves an example to you to follow us" (2 Th 3:9). The three evangelists journeyed from Philippi to Thessalonica. It is true that the Philippian jailor and Lydia "sent once and again" in order to make up where the tentmaking business did not provide enough support when the evangelists arrived in Thessalonica (Ph 4:16). But the context of 2 Thessalonians 3 is not about Paul's initial arrival in Thessalonica. He was referring to the time after the first disciples obeyed the gospel and the church was established. After the church was established, Paul gave an example to the new Thessalonian Christians as he gave to those in Corinth. It was a principle of gospel living that must be assumed by everyone who would obey the gospel in baptism.

Therefore, Paul reminded the Thessalonians, “For even when we were with you we commanded you this, that if anyone is not willing to work, neither let him eat” (2 Th 3:10). We search through the word of God in order to find all sorts of commands. But we often overlook this command. And it is obedience to this command that will determine our right to have fellowship with the body of Christ.

Paul began his correction of the disorderly among the Thessalonians by saying that in their fellowship with one another, something was out of order. The word “disorderly” in verse 6 is a military term. It was used in the military of the Roman army to refer to a soldier who was marching out-of-step with the rest of the soldiers. The person who is not working with his hands in order to support himself and those of his family is marching out-of-step. The point is that he is marching out-of-step with something that defines the order of one marching in step with the group. This context is teaching that each Christian must take responsibility for providing for his own needs. The preacher has a right to be supported by the whole. But Paul, Silas and Timothy did not exercise this right in Thessalonica, nor in Corinth (2 Th 3:9).

“Even so the Lord has commanded that those who preach the gospel should live from the gospel” (1 Co 9:14). It is necessary that we clarify an important point in reference to this statement. The passage states that one has a right to receive support if he is “preaching the gospel.” This would be the right for support of the evangelist or missionary who is going forth to preach the gospel to the unbelievers. He has a right to receive support from the church, because he must take no support from the unbelievers (3 Jn 7,8).

The gospel is not preached to those who have already obeyed the gospel. When Paul, Silas and Timothy left Philippi and went on a mission trip to Thessalonica, the Philippians assumed their responsibility to support the three evangelists in Thessalonica. But when Paul, Silas and Timothy experienced the fruit of preaching the gospel, they did not “eat any man’s bread without paying for it” (2 Th 3:8). They did not take up a contribution from the unbelievers when they preached the gospel. However, when believers were brought forth from their preaching of the gospel, it was then that the evangelists paid their own bill at the local restaurant.

The above teaching was emphasized by John. Listen to this:

For they [evangelists as Paul, Silas and Timothy] went forth for the sake of the Name, taking nothing from the Gentiles. Therefore, we ought to show hospitality [support] to such men so that we might be fellow workers for the truth [of the gospel] (3 Jn 7,8).

The Philippians obeyed in this support of traveling evangelists when the evangelists went from their presence to Thessalonica. But when there were those who were born again in Thessalonica, these new Christians had a responsibility to support the evangelists as did the Philippians. This the Thessalonians evidently did when the evangelists went on to Athens and Corinth (See 2 Co 11:9). But while Paul, Silas and Timothy were resident teachers of the new disciples in Thessalonica, they did not receive support from the new Christians. They did not receive support lest they be accused of preaching for money.

What the evangelists did was an example for the new Christians in Thessalonica. Some, however, did not follow this example, and subsequently they took advantage of the good hearts of some leading (wealthy) women (At 17:4). Some evidently saw an opportunity for money, or possibly willingly twisted Paul’s teaching on the final coming. They subsequently convinced others that Jesus was coming immediately in His final coming. So they started living off the labors of others.

When one can work, and there is work available, but he will not work, then he cannot be in fellowship with the church. This is Paul’s “command” in 2 Thessalonians 3:6. If one will not work, then those who are working are under the mandate that they not feed the lazy brother (2 Th 3:10). This may seem harsh, but the point is that the brother who seeks to live off the labors of another who is working with his hands, has denied the faith (1 Tm 5:8). If one feeds, or gives a loan to a brother who will never repay it because he is not working, then the one who feeds the dysfunctional brother is enabling him to continue in his denial of the faith.

Because gospel living saints are seeking to live the incarnational life of the One who gave everything for them, they are often easy targets for clever people to take advantage of their soft hearts.

There were some wealthy women in Thessalonica. We can imagine how some opportunistic beggars would easily take advantage of such women who were new in the faith. The Holy Spirit in this harsh judgment of the beggars never blamed the wealthy sisters. On the contrary, the Spirit went right where the problem rested. Church beggars were marching out-of-step with those who were struggling to live the gospel. Because they were taking advantage of those who sought to live the heart of God, they needed to be starved out, and then pronounced out of the fellowship of the body of Christ. They had given up their right to remain in fellowship with those who were seeking to incarnationally live the heart of God.

In the command of 2 Thessalonians 3:6, those who were working with their own hands were commanded to disfellowship from their presence those who denied the faith by not working with their own hands as Paul, Silas and Timothy. They had been given an example of work. But they were disobedient to the example, and thus disobedient to the ethic of working with one's own hands in order to support himself and his family.

Paul concluded, "*For we hear that there are some among you who walk disorderly, not working at all, but are busybodies" (2 Th 3:11). If a brother can work, but does not work when there is work, then he is a busybody that must be cast out of the fellowship of the body. "*Now those who are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work and eat their own bread" (2 Th 3:12).

CHALLENGED LEADERSHIP

We would estimate that the events that transpired in the case of Ananias and Sapphira in Acts 5:1-11 took place approximately five years after the events of Acts 2. Though we are estimating the lapse of time according to our chronology of the events that were recorded by Luke, we conclude that some time had passed. The apostles remained in Jerusalem for about fifteen years after the Pentecost of Acts 2. They remained in Jerusalem about ten years after the death of these two disciples.

Judging from the harshness of the punishment of the husband and wife in this case, enough time had transpired since Acts 2 for many disciples to become somewhat complacent, if not competitive with the leadership of the apostles. Or possibly, there were some coming into the fellowship of the church who were diluting the moral standard of the gospel. In this case, we would judge that there had been no change in the moral integrity of these two who dropped dead in the presence of many witnesses.

Therefore, a review of the dysfunctional lack of moral change in the behavior of Ananias and Sapphira fits into our survey of problems that faced the early disciples. In this situation, the integrity of the church before the community was brought into question. If the community of early witnesses of the disciples saw no change in their moral behavior, then the church would simply be considered just another sect of Judaism. If the gospel motivated no moral change, then the power of the gospel would be questioned by the community.

The events that transpired made everyone think twice before they joined themselves to the apostles. In the events leading up to what occurred, Luke recorded, "And with great power the apostles gave witness to the resurrection" (At 4:33). And then after the expiration of the husband and wife, he again recorded,

And by the hands of the apostles many signs and wonders were done among the people. And the rest did not dare join with them [the apostles], but the people highly esteemed them (At 5:12,13).

People did not seek to join in the leadership positions of the apostles because they publicly witnessed God's confirmation of their leadership. They did not question the leadership of the apostles because God miraculously confirmed them to be His men. As God had confirmed Moses, He confirmed the apostles as His designated leadership among the early disciples in Jerusalem.

It was not that Ananias and Sapphira were without warning concerning the power that God could unleash through the apostles. They were not ignorant of the confirming power that God worked through the apostles in order to initially ground the early establishment of the church. They simply became complacent, and subsequently thought they could gain notoriety by their supposed sacrificial gift.

There were some in Corinth who tried to do the same in reference to the incarnational living of the apostle Paul. They boasted of their sacrifices. Their motive was to marginalize the leadership influence of Paul among the Achaians by boasting of their own sacrifices. Though the apostles who had left everything for Jesus (Mk 10:28), they could not embarrass Paul who also left all for Jesus (Ph 3:8).

In order to embarrass the presumptuous false apostles in Corinth, Paul gave a brief survey of the hardships that he endured because of his preaching the gospel (2 Co 11:16-29). We do not know all the motives of Ananias, but at least he wanted to give a show of his supposed dedication through a great sacrifice. But when one starts comparing sacrifices in order to claim notoriety, or to compete with God's established leadership, he is in trouble.

Paul would say to Ananias, "But in whatever anyone else is bold—I speak foolishly—I am bold also" (2 Co 11:21). Paul knew that boasting of trials in the flesh was foolishness. Nevertheless, because of those as Ananias who were in Corinth, he wrote, "Seeing that many boast according to the flesh, I will boast also" (2 Co 11:18). And he did in order to shame those who would give the pretense of offering a onetime sacrifice to the Lord in order to be exalted. Ananias sought to offer a onetime sacrifice in order to be acclaimed sacrificial. But the apostles and Paul offered the sacrifice of their entire lives. If one would seek to lead because of his sacrifices, he should take note of what Ananias tried to do. He lied concerning his sacrifice, but more importantly, his motives were carnal.

God struck down presumptuous want-to-be leaders in the early establishment of national Israel after the Israelites came out of Egyptian captivity. Any rebellion against the authority of Moses was severely punished. When Aaron and Miriam questioned the authority of Moses, "the anger of the Lord was kindled against them" (Nm 12:9). The "cloud departed from off the tabernacle," and "Miriam became leprous" (Nm 12:10). When Kohath, Datham and Abiram challenged the authority and leadership of Moses, the earth opened up and swallowed them and their families (Nm 16). When God makes a paradigm shift in His work among men, He is serious about anyone who might question the leaders who are His representatives whom He designates to initiate the shift. After Ananias and Sapphira publicly fell dead, no one thought of masquerading themselves as Christ-sent apostles in Jerusalem. God had accomplished His goal in striking the two dead. And if news eventually reached as far as Corinth, then we can better understand the rod with which Paul was returning to the city to correct some who were challenging his leadership (1 Co 4:21).

Ananias and Sapphira were questioning the leadership of the apostles in God's early efforts to initiate a paradigm shift away from Israel to the church of our Lord Jesus Christ. The couple questioned the leadership of the apostles by publicly presenting themselves as also having made great sacrifices for the church.

If people could get away with a lie before the leaders of the church in Jerusalem, then there would be moral chaos. The power of the gospel to transform lives would be greatly hindered. This was certainly the moral struggle that was going on behind the scenes as we seek to understand the harshness by which God poured out His power of death on this brother and sister in Christ. Theirs was not simply a lie to the apostles, but an effort to deceive God, and thus subvert the paradigm shift of God's people to the gospel of His only begotten Son (At 5:4).

The deception would eventually be known to the general public. People would discover the actual amount for which Ananias and Sapphira sold their possession (At 5:1,2). Before the apostles, the amount they claimed that they received from the sale was publicly stated. When the general public pulled out their calculators and subtracted the claimed sale amount from the actual amount of the sale, then they would calculate the extent to which they were able to deceive the leadership of this new movement of Christianity. The apostles would subsequently be made a public mockery. The "movement" that they supposedly started on their own would be understood by the general public to be just another sect of the Jews. And thus, the early establishment of the church would have been stymied before it got off the ground. This helps us understand the reason for the extremity by which God dropped these two deceivers dead in a public way.

As a result of the two falling dead before the apostles, Luke recorded, "And great fear came on all those who heard these things" (At 5:5). It is significant to understand that "all those who heard" indicates that the news of the event went far beyond the body of believers. This was "all those" throughout Jerusalem, Judea, and now, even us. But specifically, "great fear came upon all the church and upon as many as heard these things" (At 5:11). "Great fear" means terrified! It was after this event that the religious leaders in Jerusalem began to take seriously the paradigm shift that was being introduced by the apostles. In Acts 6:7 Luke later recorded after this event,

So the word of God increased. And the number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. And a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith.

These priests were scholars of the events of Jewish history that took place immediately after Israel was delivered from Egyptian captivity. They were not unfamiliar with what happened to Aaron and Miriam. They could read in their Bibles what happened to Kohath, Datham and Abiram. Insubordinate people died when God initiated paradigm shifts in reference to His work among men on earth. If there were any opposition to His designated leaders, then there would be severe consequences against those who would rise up against God's work among men in order to bring about His changes. Ananias and Sapphira, through their deed to question the leadership of the apostles, paid the price for questioning the work of God through the apostles.

We must not make the mistake of failing to see who actually extracted life from both Ananias and Sapphira. The text simply says, “And as he heard these words [of Peter], Ananias fell down and breathed his last” (At 5:5). It was not that Peter struck him dead. It is obvious that something as this had never before happened in the early ministry of the apostles. Neither has it happened since. Fear came upon everyone because it happened only this once, and thus, we must not assume that the apostles were initiating the punishment by death of their own free will.

This was a case where God stepped in directly and recalled His spirit from both Ananias and Sapphira. As everyone present witnessed the instant death of the two, the apostles too were also bystanders. The lie was made public, but it was God who caused the death publicly. We would assume, therefore, that when Luke stated that “great fear came on all those who heard these things,” even the apostles were included in the “all” (At 5:5). “Great fear came upon all the church,” including the apostles (At 5:11).

It was a time in the history of the initial establishment of the church when God exercised a direct hand in confirming the leadership of those whom He had ordained should deliver all truth to the church (See Jn 14:26; 16:13). God worked on earth through those whom He assigned to lead in the initiation of a new era. As Moses was a bystander in reference to God’s punishment of those who questioned his leadership authority, the apostles were also bystanders in the case of Ananias and Sapphira who questioned the leadership integrity of God’s designated leaders in the initial establishment of the church. As in the case of God’s work through Moses to establish leadership and law-giving in Israel, so also God established leadership and law-giving through the apostles for the church. When the leadership and law-giving of the apostles was accomplished, then there was no more a need for God to do the same throughout the history of the church. There will be no more members dropping dead in the church because of a challenge to the leadership authority of God on earth. The leadership authority in the church changed from men to the written word of God after the apostles had delivered unto the church all truth (Jn 14:26; 16:13). Only through the written word of Christ God continues to exercise His authority on earth (See Jn 12:48).

In the beginning of the church, only the apostles were designed leaders in that they had the responsibility to deliver all truth unto the church (Jn 14:26; 16:13). But once the truth of the gospel was delivered, the apostles had accomplished their mission, and thus the church carried on under the authority of the word of God in all matters of faith. Once the truth that came through the leadership of the apostles was completed, then people could know that God had no other authority for revealed truth other than the apostles.

WATER SHORTAGES

We were once driving through one wilderness town after another in a desert region on planet earth. We felt that it was truly the “lonely planet” at the time. It was more than a wilderness. The small towns through which we ventured were really in a desert area where water was hard to come by. There were no bodies of water. Water was coveted solely for drinking, and on occasions, for the occasional shower, or a bath with a wash cloth. And certainly, bathing in a bathtub full of water was almost out of the question. The smell of the resident citizen’s human body was a testimony to the fact that water was scarce.

What we have found in desert regions as this is that people start believing that baptism (immersion) in water for remission of sins is not necessary. Salvation is by faith only, apart from obedience to the gospel. Some will provide a tank of water for their livestock, but no water in which to wash away sins (At 22:16).

However, now we better understand why John—the one who immersed in water—carried on with his preaching of the coming Messiah close to the “much water” of the Jordan River. The exact location where he was baptizing was in Aenon that was close to the village of Salim (Jn 3:23). The reason he was there was that the people who came to him could hear his message and then be baptized in much water. He was the “reverse evangelist.” Instead of him going to the people, they came to him in the wilderness area of Aenon in order to be immersed in much water for remission of sins. In announcing the coming Messiah, the people came to hear John’s proclamation of the fulfillment of all prophecy in reference to the Messiah.

They came to John in the desert for some very important reasons: “John came in the wilderness baptizing and preaching the baptism of repentance for re- mission of sins” (Mk 1:4). The people who believed realized that if they would receive the remission of sins in order to fulfill all the revealed righteousness of God, then they had to go to John. So there “went out to him all the land of Judea and those from Jerusalem. And they were all baptized by him in the Jordan River, confessing their sins” (Mk 1:5).

For lack of water, the people who came to John did not write off the necessity of his baptism. People walked across the province of Judea in order to get to the message and the water where John was immersing. Therefore, before one discounts John’s baptizing for remission of sins, he or she should consider how much people believed in John’s message and baptism in order to get to him by the Jordan. How much more should one seek to be baptized today in the name of the One John said was coming, but now has actually come?

Back then, the people walked across the province of Judea to hear a simple message that the Messiah was soon to rise over the sun-lit hills of the promised land. In response to the message, they were baptized by John for the remission of their sins. How much more compelling is the fulfilled message of John on this side of the cross? Would it not be reasonable to conclude that those who would want to respond to Jesus would at least do the same as those early disciples of John?

There went out to John multitudes from across Judea who wanted to hear his message and be baptized for the remission of sins. In fact, Matthew historically recorded that “Jerusalem and all Judea, and all the region around the Jordan, went out to him” (Mt 3:5). “And they were baptized ... confessing their sins” (Mt 3:6). They went out to be immersed (baptized) in the Jordan for remission of sins because there was much water there (Jn 3:23). So John stayed in the region and received those who wanted to hear the message of the coming Messiah and be baptized (Jn 3:22). He stayed at the “Jordan River Baptistry.”

Now consider this: John established a center for preaching and baptizing. Since much water was needed for immersion, he stayed near much water. It was a similar location upon which Philip and the eunuch came in a desert region (At 8:26). While “driving” along the way in the eunuch’s chariot, they came upon a certain body of water into which one could be completely immersed (At 8:36). So the “desert baptistry” presented the opportunity for the eunuch to say, “See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized?” At 8:36). It was an opportunity for him to act on his faith. If he had simply passed by the body of water that represented opportunity to be baptized, then the sincerity of his faith would be questioned.

As we made our way across the desert region of the country in which we were traveling at the time, we too came upon a church that had a purpose-built baptistry. When speaking to a local leader of the church, he said, “Yes, people from throughout the region come to our baptistry in order to be baptized.”

So on our personal journey through so many desert towns and villages, we too wondered how people who wanted to respond to the gospel could say, “See, here is water!” In order to fulfill the desire of those who seek to be baptized in the name of Jesus for remission of sins, “water opportunities” should be provided. We once suggested that Christians do as John, and as one church in the desert that we visited. Someone in desert regions should build or dig a “Jordan River Baptistry” for all those throughout a region who believe on Jesus. At least it should be made known that one has a large bathtub.

The Jordan River offered a natural baptistry. But when there are no rivers running through the region, or bodies of water, at least someone could build a baptistry for all those in the region who realize that they must obey the gospel for remission of sins (At 2:38). Town halls are built for city gatherings. Schools are built for education. Sports fields are built for the gathering of athletes. So why not build a community baptistry for all those in a wilderness village to go in order to obey the gospel by immersion. In the city in which we presently live, some residents have provided their swimming pools as community baptistries.

Remember the 3,000 who were baptized in Jerusalem? Have you ever wondered where they were baptized in one day? There was the purpose-built and public pool of Bethesda that had five entry ways to the water (Jn 5:2). There was the public Pool of Siloam which was a purpose-built pool for cleansing (Jn 9:7). Archaeologists have uncovered other purpose-built public pools in Jerusalem that were specifically made for Jewish ritualistic cleansing. Our question is why someone could not build in a wilderness village a purpose-built baptistry for those who know that they must be immersed in water in obedience to the gospel for the remission of sins (At 2:38; 22:16).

Someone in desert villages and towns need to accommodate the believers in the region by relieving the “spiritual stress” of those who know that they should follow Jesus to the Jordan River in order to fulfill all righteousness by being baptized (Mt 3:13-15). Someone can offer them the opportunity to do so by building a “Jordan River Baptistry,” and then announcing to the entire region the baptismal opportunity. They could, as John, wait for the people to come from throughout the region in order to be baptized for remission of sins. Sincere believers know that they must follow Jesus to the Jordan River. Aiding others to be baptized into Christ is something as simple as showing people where to find water (See Gl 3:26-29).

John was simply baptizing in Aenon those who came to him for baptism. He was not laying claim to those he baptized. He was simply fulfilling his God-commissioned mandate to announce the coming Messiah, and then baptize for the remission of sins those who came to him (Mk 1:4). After they were baptized, the people went home. John did not establish a data base of those who were baptized. That was God's business (At 2:47). John was not recruiting baptized believers into his unique sect. God kept track of those who were baptized.

It was not John's business to organize into groups baptized believers. His business was only to preach the Messiah and baptize those who came to him. The baptized sorted out the rest. What John offered was the opportunity to hear his messianic message, and then be baptized for remission of sins. He allowed the people to do what Philip allowed the eunuch to do after he came up out of the waters of baptism: "And he [the eunuch] went on his way rejoicing" (At 8:39). And just in case Philip might lay claim to a baptized believer, "the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip so that the eunuch saw him no more" (At 8:39).

We must keep in mind that some snakes will also show up at the public "Jordan River Baptistry" (Mt 3:7). As some religionists (the Pharisees and Sadducees) showed up at John's public baptistry near Aenon, so there will show up those to whom a gospel message of rebuke must be delivered (Mt 3:7-12). They must be warned of the wrath they will suffer when Jesus returns with His mighty angels in flaming fire (See 2 Th 1:6-9). Some are indeed baptized with water unto repentance for remission of sins. But for the proud and arrogant religious leaders, they will be baptized with the "flaming fire" that Jesus will bring with him in order to bring down "vengeance on those who do not know God and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Th 1:8).

What God did through John's ministry of baptism in the wilderness was to present the opportunity for both the sincere and the snakes to show up at the baptistry. When both showed up at the "Jordan River Baptistry," then he had the opportunity to preach the word of God.

Book 81

Tethered To Christ Through The Gospel

When mountaineers climb the steep and dangerous slopes of mountain ranges, they tether themselves to one another. The connecting rope (tether) is a safety feature in dangerous mountaineering. If one climber slips, his tether to the other climbers can save his life. Tethering of the mountaineers, therefore, is a survival feature for safe mountaineering.

The same is true of our survival as Christians. We are tethered to one another because of our common obedience to the gospel. Our tethering to one another is based on all of us being tethered to Christ. Our tethering to Christ and one another is a safety feature. But it is a safety feature in gospel living only if every one on the team is tethered to Christ. Jesus only is the source of the life that we all have in Him. If we are not all connected to Jesus, then our tethering to one another would be worthless.

Being tethered to our religious heritage will not result in our desired eternal destiny. The heritage of any religious group saves no one. It is the Lord Jesus Christ who saves. Unfortunately, being tightly tethered to our religious heritage many times hinder our tethering to Jesus. We sometimes exalt church over Christ. But we must keep in mind that it is only when our sole source of spiritual life comes from our Lord Jesus Christ can we have the spiritual assurance that is needed for the treacherous climb of the Christian journey. We gain spiritual self-esteem only in Jesus. We are able to reach the peak of eternal salvation as long as we stay connected to Him.

The purpose of this book is an effort to aid the reader to understand better the obstacles that religious traditions and heritages often present in our efforts to tether to Christ only through the gospel. Unless we realize that religion hinders being tethered directly to Jesus, we will have a difficult time appreciating the security that the gospel offers.

We live in a world where religious heritages have become the self-esteem of many people who know little about the gospel, and less about the Bible. If one would understand the impact that God intended that the gospel should have on the lives of all mankind, then there would be no competition between our religious heritage and the gospel. The gospel would become top priority, though we would appreciate the faith that our forefathers delivered to us.

But we must come to the conclusion that the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ must be the foundation upon which we base our faith. If we can sift through all the confusion of religious traditions that prevail in a confused religious world, and seek for those fundamentals of the gospel that have been distorted or fractured by our lack of understanding of the gospel, then we are on our way to realizing a true faith experience.

These words are written to those of a religious paradigm shift that is taking place throughout the world today. There are thousands of religious leaders in this world who have launched out on a move away from traditional religions. They have realized that the traditional institutional religions of the past have run their course since the time of the Protestant Reformation Movement five hundred years ago. They have for the past half century concluded that institutionalized traditionalism in the area of religion is often cold, indifferent to local needs, and in some cases, individually sterile in satisfying the spiritual thirsts of so many people.

They have thus set out from where they were in a quest to discover the individual's needed relationship he or she must have with a Creator who brought them into this world. In some cases they seek to restore or revive a simple faith that can become the foundation upon which they can establish a rewarding relationship with others who are likewise on the same journey of discovery. All these seekers desire unity among themselves that is based on the gospel alone.

In some cases these worthy spiritual adventurers seek that which is sometimes very obscure in the world of Christendom. They are thus having difficulty finding their way out of the quagmire of religion. In many cases, their call for a simple Christianity that is independent of the shackles of past religious traditionalism is somewhat misguided. They find themselves lost in the midst of so many failed attempts to be Christians only.

They thus find themselves lost in the midst of what is now a formalized independent church movement that is not unlike the fragmentation of the former Reformation Movement a half millennium ago. As these independents give birth to sons and daughters, they too are in danger of institutionalizing, and subsequently giving birth again to more institutional religions. The generations who follow them must again deliver themselves from religion through restoration. History will inevitably repeat itself with another struggle to reform that which should have been discarded.

The words of this book are directed to the present generation of independent church leaders. These are words of both warning and direction. They are words of warning not to lay again the foundation that is based on either man, or on a unique method of churchianity. In order to guard against misdirection that men always produce, our forthcoming words are thus meant to focus our minds solely on the gospel of Jesus Christ. If all of us tether ourselves to Christ through the gospel, then we will shift together. We will subsequently produce the result that will not again generate a fragmented Christendom that will need another restoration. If we all focus on the gospel, we will not only end up together in this world, but also in the world to come.

Though these may be times of religious confusion and turmoil, with Jesus as our renewed King, we can hang on to His word and enjoy the ride. As long as our focus is solely on Him, then we know that He will lead us together in the right direction.

To be tethered to something means that one has boundaries beyond which he or she cannot freely go. This can be either good or bad. It is good that a mean dog is tethered by a chain that restricts his movement. If he were not tethered, then he would cause certain harm to others. But a good dog that has gone through obedience school is different. Tethering such a dog means that he cannot do his "dog thing," that is, be friendly to others.

People naturally want to touch or pet an obedient dog who knows his boundaries and sees himself as man's best friend. But when a mean dog is untethered, he sees a person as an object upon whom he can release his aggression. People run from mean untethered dogs. They reach out their hands to pet a good dog who wishes to make every person his friend.

Not much changes in this illustration when we apply the analogy to people. Mean people are shunned. Those people who have gone through "obedience school" in their obedience to the gospel have voluntarily tethered themselves to Jesus. They are untethered from the ways of the world. Therefore, they are free to let their gospel light shine before everyone because the source of their light is Jesus. They are thus free to think within the bounds of the gospel of freedom. People gravitate to gospel-obedient Christians who are untethered from the evil ways of the world.

On the other hand, those who are bound to the ways of the world are the roaring lions who are walking about in order to deceive the hearts of the innocent. They are looking for innocent souls who are free in Christ. Because Christians are free in Christ, they are free game to be deceived by the false prophets of the world. The freedom that makes the obedient free from the restrictions of religion also makes them the ideal target for religious roaring lions who are not tethered to the truth of the gospel.

Those who are set free from the bondage of religion must first learn how to walk in the freedom that they have in Christ. But at the same time, they must learn how to guard themselves from devouring lions. Some make the mistake of guarding themselves from being devoured by lions by tethering themselves to a legal religiosity. They feel assured that they have justified themselves before God through their religious ritual-keeping, and at the same time, escaped the lure of roaring lions.

But what they have actually accomplished is untethering themselves from Christ first in order to be tethered to the meritorious works of religion. They find comfort in the traditions of their fathers and the heritage of their religion. They give up their freedom in Christ in order to self-sanctify themselves in the bondage of their own meritorious religiosity.

There is no true freedom when one is tethered to the religious traditions of the fathers. Being tethered to religious traditions, or one's religious heritage, may bring a sense of security before God. The problem, however, is that the mental tether is meritoriously man-made, not gospel founded. Most people are usually aware of this. They know that their works-oriented faith is based on subscribing to the traditions of the fathers, while they minimize the power of the gospel. When the Son of God came into the world to reveal the gospel, it was His task to untether the Jews from the religion of their fathers in order that they be tethered only to Him. This was a daunting task during the earthly ministry of Jesus. It still is today.

At the time the Word was made flesh in a barn in Bethlehem, an entire generation of people struggled with their relationship with God through the religious traditions of their fathers. Subsequently, there arose a great conflict between those of the religious heritage of the Jews and the Son of God. The Spirit-inspired records of the confrontation that the Word in the flesh had with those who sought to base their connection with God on the tether of their religious traditions was clearly defined by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. These writers revealed that there was often a heated struggle between the religionists of Jesus' ministry and the gospel that He introduced into the world through Himself. Throughout His ministry, the contention was between the Jewish leaders' theology and the gospel way of life that Jesus was living and preaching.

What the Jews at the time did not understand was that the gospel that was soon to be implemented on Pentecost in A.D. 30 would in the eyes of God be the end of both the Sinai law and all their religious traditions that were connected with that law (See Cl 2:14). Their Jewish heritage since Abraham was to find fulfillment through the cross, ascension and reign of the Messiah. Unfortunately, what they thought was the end of God's revelation to man through the Sinai law and Israel, was only the means of God's eternal plan of redemption for all men.

It took the Holy Spirit half of the writings of the New Testament in the four preceding books to explain the paradigm shift that was necessary in order for one to shift from man-made religiosity to a gospel connection with God through Jesus. Such continues to be our challenge today. We seek to be diligent students of what Jesus taught concerning how one can disconnect from the security of human religious traditions in order to connect to God through the Son of God. This is indeed a challenging task by which we walk by faith in the gospel of Jesus and not by our sight in the religious traditions of our fathers.

At the end of the conflict between those who were tethered to the Jewish religious traditions, came the end of the earthly ministry of the incarnate Word. Those who refused to accept the Word as the incarnation of God in fulfillment of all prophecies concerning the Messiah, crucified the Lord of glory. The cross will always remind us of our salvation through the sacrificial offering of the Lamb of God. But behind the scenes, the cross will also remind us of how stringent religious traditionalists will struggle against those who seek to be tethered to Christ alone through their obedience to the gospel.

Chapter 1

THE ONE GOD

There is nothing like writing. When an author feels unleashed from the constraints of tradition, or heritage, he feels free to reach into the inner sanctuary of his heart in order to bring to light gems that are free from the barnacles of time. And for this reason, only those who are truly free from the restrictions of imprisoning religious prejudices are worth reading. Those scribes who are cowed by the forces of opinion around them should be questioned. Intimidated scribes are rarely objective.

Selfish ambition subtly finds its way into the mind of the writer who would allow his conclusions to be warped toward a hearty slap on the back. A “humble pride” may lurk in the heart of one who has inscribed for himself words that bring satisfaction to himself alone. But when pride is coupled with selfish ambition, no writer can dig deep into the recesses of his mind in order to lay on paper with ink true objective thoughts.

Plagiarism only reveals the inadequacy of one who is either intimidated by his peers, or lacks confidence in revealing his own thoughts. Though one may unknowingly duplicate the thoughts of another, he must not be tried in a court of plagiarism. Accusations of plagiarism more often come from those who are too frightened to pen their own thoughts that can be footnoted with another’s document. Since spoken words can quickly vanish in the wind, there are those who are quick to be policemen for plagiarists, but cowards to inscribe their own words for others to judge. Unless one is writing in the field of atomic physics, there are few revelations that can be made of anything new under heaven.

It was only when Dietrich Bonhoeffer took a moral stand against the social immorality of Nazi Germany that he wrote the modern classic The Cost of Discipleship. After his arrest in April 1943 by the Gestapo, he continued from prison to live unrestrained from the intimidation of those who would bring into bondage his mind. He remained free in thinking unto the death of his imprisoned body by hanging that took place in April 1945.

Bonhoeffer’s imprisonment for his moral beliefs was a blessing to the rest of the world who wanted to start inscribing from the platform of free thought. His religious heritage offered no aid in generating in his mind powerful thoughts that changed the thinking of those who thought they were free, but were looking through prison bars. His unflinching determination to write what was right led him to his death. It was his brave stand to release free thought that unleashed on the world a host of fellow literary prisoners who were themselves imprisoned by the heritage of established theology.

For those who think they can see, the prison that incarcerates their minds is their religious heritage and the judges and lawgivers of their present religious establishment. We have found it incredibly curious to hear some say, “We think liberal, but speak conservative.” Such forked-tongue faith betrays the heart of one who is not free. The words that come forth from his mouth should be questioned. If such a person should write a thought—which rarely they do—then his words will have been “misspelled” by the bondage of his own thinking. Such people are often willing to remain mentally imprisoned because of either weakness in character or the strength of a pay check, or their eagerness to remain accepted by their religious establishment.

And so were the Pharisees among themselves. Jesus said of them, “Therefore, I speak to them [the Pharisees] in parables because seeing they do not see and hearing they do not hear, nor do they understand” (Mt 13:13). The Pharisees were blinded by their own status quo. Because they loved their pay checks (Lk 16:14), individually they were intimidated to conform to the bondage of the religious establishment.

There were several reasons why the Holy Spirit put the saints on guard about being deceived by the smooth and fair speech of some. The fair way of saying things in a beguiling manner is the first sign post along the road of deception. There are ulterior motives. There is selfish ambition. There is the desire of smooth speechologists to reveal only that which will marshal people to their own camp. No speaker should be trusted who seeks, through smooth and fair speech, to recruit the believers to his system of theology.

There are those writers who write well. If they are truly free from the restrictions of religion, then their writings are not necessarily with “smooth and fair” words. Such gifted writers only have the ability to captivate our minds with words and phrases that clearly and distinctly reveal their precise thoughts. We appreciate those writers who are honest, and thus, leave us with exactly what is on their minds. When open-minded and uninhibited scribes write, we seek to interpret them outside our own prejudices. We seek to define the words they use by their dictionary of experiences, and not ours.

There are those who have difficulty revealing their inner thoughts with words. We appreciate their struggle. One thing is always true about writers: There are no perfect writers. But when one is intimidated to write nothing because he or she is afraid that his or her words might be laid before a court of self-appointed judges and lawgivers of the kingdom, then the religious establishment has gone too far. The movement to which they attach themselves is on its way from the word of God. It has digressed into the Dark Ages of religion wherein all were intimidated to believe that the earth was flat and the center of the universe.

When brave writers arose among us during the Middle Ages—which were truly theologically Dark—in order to remind us that we are free, they were often torched at the stake for thinking freely. This era of wicked history taught a lesson to writers for the rest of history. Writers were taught that they should never allow their religious heritage to cage their pens, or dictate their personal studies of the word of God. If ever we move into a “dark” time again when there is no free thought, then we will step aside and allow that time to pass by. We will have no part with “Middle Age” church behavior that suppresses the power of the pen. On the contrary, we will sharpen our pencils and fill our fountains with ink in order that we never again be brought into the bondage of heritage policemen or the domination of those who would suppress the truth. We will never forget the following exhortation of the Holy Spirit:

Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage (Gal 5:1).

Chapter 2

THE BEREAN BIBLE CLASS

If we could for a moment extend the term “Christianity” to include all faiths that in some way consider Jesus to be the Son of God, and “church” to include everyone who in some way separates themselves religiously from all “non-Christian” faiths, then we would discover that something disconcerting is transpiring within the ranks of “Christianity” today. It is something that will eventually lead to the demise of true Christian faith as it is defined in the Bible. Does this sound shocking? It should!

This demise is nothing new. It was happening to Christianity by the end of the first century, and continued into the second. In the second century the apostasy from Christian faith was so drastic that historians believe that about half of those who “believed on Jesus” had gone astray into believing that Jesus was only a good rabbi who led many away from the original Jewish faith. Those who refused to believe that Jesus was the “Christ” relegated Him to only a man who lived, and then wandered off somewhere into obscurity and died of old age. To many, there was no such thing as an incarnation and sacrificial atonement. Gnosticism also took its share of those who wanted to believe that Jesus was some mischievous digression from God.

In many ways, the same is happening throughout the world today. Christianity in general today has a weak biblical foundation. The faith of many is an open black hole that is sucking in any religious fantasy that can be imagined in the minds of religiously misguided people.

Those who have read Acts 17:11 will remember that the term “nobility” was used by the Holy Spirit in reference to those Jews in the city of Berea who eagerly considered what the evangelists Paul, Silas and Timothy related to them concerning the fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies that Jesus was the Messiah. He was the “anointed One” sent from God. And if He were the Messiah, then all those prophesied characteristics and functions of the Messiah were relished upon Him as such. The “nobility” of the Bereans was in the fact that they were seriously interested in studying these things.

The Holy Spirit of God forever wrote the epitaph of the Berean Bible students in the following words:

These [Jews in Berea] were more noble-minded than those [Jews] in Thessalonica, in that they received the word [of the gospel] with all readiness of mind and searched the [Old Testament] Scriptures daily to see whether these things were so (Acts 17:11).

These were rare people of faith at the time Paul, Silas and Timothy passed through the idolatrous city of Berea. Such Bible students are more starkly rare in a world of Christendom today. Most “Christian religionists” now feel that they are fine without a desire to search the Scriptures. Faith is now more often based on either tradition, religious heritage, or a concert assembly wherein the entertained are stirred into an emotional frenzy. If the assembly is so great, why would one want to complicate the assembly experience with Bible study?

We now live in a world that is characteristic of the times that prevailed about thirty years after the earthly ministry of Jesus. It was in that time when there were few written Scriptures concerning who Jesus was and what He taught. Information was transferred primarily through word of mouth. Stories from the first witnesses of Jesus were handed down to eager recipients who were looking for the Messiah. When “walking Bibles” came through town and preached that Jesus was the Messiah, those who had the Old Testament Scriptures opened their Bibles—unrolled their scrolls—and searched to see if the verbal information that was spoken by the traveling evangelists coincided with the prophecies of the mission and message of the Messiah. If prophecies matched the message of the messengers, then the waters in the area splashed with people who were eager to obey the gospel.

The message eventually came to the ears of those whom the Holy Spirit considered “noble-minded” within the city of Berea. These were God-fearing Jews who loved their Bibles and hoped for the coming Messiah. They were not religionists who were content with their religious heritage. Their religious heritage may have brought them to the point of receptivity, but they would in no way sacrifice the possible fulfillment of Messianic prophecies for which they and their fathers had hoped for centuries, in order to consider the possible fulfillment of the prophecies in Jesus of Nazareth. They would not sacrifice the Messiah simply to preserve and maintain the religious traditions of their heritage. The Bereans believed what they studied in their Bibles. They subsequently believed in the One that the apostles preached.

The Bereans were certainly the product of the faith of their fathers (See Mk 7:1-9). Nevertheless, when the message of the messengers matched the prophecies, they knew that they had to lead as “change agents” in Judaism. As the 3,000 on the day of Pentecost, religious heritage had to be sacrificed for the new Head of the new church of God’s people (See Mt 16:18,19; At 7:38). Their heritage of legal religion had to give way to the gospel of grace. New wineskins had to be found for freedom from the bondage of legal Judaism was in the air.

The foundation of their paradigm shift depended on their knowledge of the prophecies of the Scriptures that they knew. The Bereans could make a judgment concerning the fulfillment of the prophecies that was based on what they read in their Bibles. Unfortunately, this culture of Bible-oriented believers to a great extent does not exist in Christendom today. Throughout the world today there is a dearth of Bible knowledge among those who cry out “Lord, Lord” (“Jesus, Jesus”) on Sunday morning in tune with a band (See Mt 7:21-23). The lack of a Bible-based faith is so serious that it will eventually lead to the total corruption of what is in the New Testament defined as discipleship of Jesus.

This reality takes us back into the days about thirty years after the ministry of Jesus. It was in those days after the cross, resurrection and ascension of Jesus that twisted information about Jesus was propagated throughout the world. Many of those who lived far away from Jerusalem and Palestine concluded that Christians were only a sect of Judaism. From Rome to Babylon to Ethiopia, the twisted rumors of Christ and His church went into all the world.

When one of the messengers of Christianity eventually came bound with chains into the city of Rome, those who were similar in hope as the Jews of Berea, said to the messenger, “But we desire to hear from you what you think, for as concerning this sect [of Christians] we know that it is spoken against everywhere” (At 28:22).

So the eager recipients set up a Bible class wherein the Old Testament Scriptures would be studied in the context of what the Roman prisoner claimed.

And when they [the Jews] had appointed him [Paul] a day [for the Bible class], many came to him at his lodging, to whom he explained and testified of the kingdom of God, persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the Law of Moses and the Prophets, from morning until evening (At 28:23).

This Bible scenario rarely happens today. Instead of coming together for a Bible class to search the Scriptures, religionists today under the heading of “Christianity” usually come together only for a musical concert wherein a great deal of noise is made to mesmerize the attendees. Walk into any city today with an open Bible, and usually no one of the “Christian” community in that city will show up. There are few noble-minded Bereans today in any given city of the world. However, if one would have a guitar in his hand, the crowds would come. But generally, when it is announced in brochures and over the radio that there will be a “Bible class” in town, there will be few people there.

So we are still in the days when Luke wrote to Theophilus in the early 60s. It is interesting that the social religious environment in which Theophilus lived at the time was not much different than the world in which we now live. The religion was different in those days in that most religions were based on idolatry. In the case of the Jews, religion was based on the traditions of the fathers (Mk 7:1-9). And because the Jews' religion was based on the traditions of the fathers, its true foundation was the heritage of the Jews (Gl 1:13,14).

Theophilus stood alone with the Bereans and those in Rome who desired to attend a Bible class. By the time Luke wrote the books of Luke and Acts, false rumors were commonly aired over "Radio Rome" that Jesus was only a zealous rabbi of Palestine who inspired a small sect of believers who were going about the Roman Empire propagating their heresy. The believers of this "Christian sect" were so zealous that they turned the religious world upside down (At 17:6). Many thought, therefore, that the success of the movement was based on the zeal of deceived religionists who accepted Jesus as their "messiah." There was no consideration that the gospel revealed through Jesus was God's message to mankind for his own salvation. They did not consider the fact that the power was in their gospel message, not in themselves as the messengers.

It was in this chaotic religious world that Theophilus lived. Because Theophilus was one of some influence in either Roman politics or government, the Holy Spirit deemed it necessary to write two inspired documents to him. In the first—and we must quote in full—the Spirit-inspired hand of Luke revealed the problem that prevailed throughout the Roman Empire in reference to Jesus:

Inasmuch as many have undertaken to compile an account of those things that have been believed among us [Christians], just as they were delivered to us [who did not personally witness Jesus] by those [Christ-sent apostles] who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word [of the gospel], it seemed good to me [Luke] also, having an accurate understanding of all things from the very first [of the beginning of the church] to write to you an orderly [inspired] account, most excellent Theophilus, that you might know the certainty [of truth] of those things you have been taught [through the preaching of others] (Lk 1:1-4).

Theophilus lived in a religious world of confusion that is not much different from the one in which we live today. There were "Christian" religionists then who proclaimed all sorts of distorted beliefs concerning Jesus. The same people today stand in pulpits throughout the world. These are those who have little knowledge of the word of God, and thus with smooth and fair speech proclaim their imaginations about the One in whom people are to believe and obey. Open Bible study has vacated church sanctuaries in order that many unlearned teachers are not embarrassed for their lack of knowledge of the Scriptures.

We have had the privilege of visiting many "Christian churches" throughout the world. Many of these churches sit down as the Bereans and open the Scriptures in order to test the teachers as to whether they are from God (See 1 Jn 4:1). However, when we speak of diligence in Bible study, we must confess that the number of Bible students in these days is few (See 2 Tm 2:15). In such a world, therefore, it is only a matter of time until the vast majority of Christendom has gone astray from the simple gospel that was believed and lived by those of the early church in the first century. In fact, some areas of Christendom are often now so far removed from the gospel that it is now time for a gospel restoration movement among those who thirst for the simple gospel message upon which to base their faith.

Therefore, in the religious world of Christendom today, we seek for the Bereans. Where are all those in Rome who would set up Bible classes in order to study their Bibles? Where are all those as Theophilus who have heard so many twisted stories about Jesus that they want to hear the truth of the gospel? In view of the dearth of knowledge of the Scriptures, we call for a restoration of the gospel as the center focus of our faith.

We now live in a religious world where the word "Bible" is shunned by many people who believe in Jesus. It is as one Internet producer of Christian videos recently wrote to us, "If I use the word 'Bible' in my videos, the viewers of the video are far fewer than when I do not use the word."

This is the world in which we now live. It is as one zealous person once said, "I wanted to start a church, so I had to learn how to play a guitar." We are in a world of Christendom today that if one would "start a church," but do so on the foundation of Bible study, few will show up at the church house doors. Those in the realm of Christendom today who do show up and huddle around the riches of the word of God are now anomalies of the faith.

THE TREE OF LIFE CHURCH

For several years we have had this good friend, who in his old age as an ex-missionary, has continually encouraged the church in America to remember her responsibility to evangelize the world. He was himself a missionary in the 1950s and 1960s in Latin America. But since those days, things have changed in the spiritual climate of his home church. He happens to live in the city where one of the first preacher/missionary training schools was born in America in the 1960s. It was a school to which young eager men and women enrolled who wanted to learn their Bibles. But in his last note to us, this school that once had over one hundred students specifically training to learn the Bible in order to preach the gospel to the world, had a new enrollment of only fifteen students. The paradigm had shifted.

We now live in a world of churchianity where Bible study is almost gone from the halls of “Christianity.” Evidence of the fact is not only in the small enrollment in Bible schools in order to study the Bible, but also in churches where gimmicks are used to attract an attendance. Those churches that maintain their attendance are those churches that have turned more to a social-orientated encounter. There is nothing wrong with focusing on relationships, for our relationships with one another (fellowship) is a serendipitous blessing of our common obedience to the gospel (1 Jn 1:3). But we must not marginalize worship for the sake of a good coffee with one another.

Some churches have turned to focusing on an experiential assembly that is oriented toward the worshipers, and not the One who is to be worshiped. The “worshipers” are often called to assembly by the sound of an orchestra or energetic band of instrumentalists. The call of the church bell now sounds faint and in competition with powerful amplifiers. When this happens, “church” changes from believers who assemble around a worshipful appreciation of the gospel of the Son of God and the word of God, to adherents who assemble around one another for a narcissistic social encounter with one another. The assembly is no longer gospel centered, but socially centered. It is no longer focused on worship in gratitude of the God of the gospel, but a self-oriented experiential event wherein we please ourselves.

Common obedience to the gospel was the primary motivation that brought believers together in the first century. They came together to offer thanksgiving in worship. On the other hand, common relationships are often the only motives to bring people together today. Great effort is thus placed on producing an atmosphere of social development (relationships), and less on zeal for a study of the word of God and mutual worship. In fact, in some cases any Bible teaching that might discourage the relationships or attendance of the adherents to a particular group is avoided.

This paradigm shift from the Bereans to assemblies that exalt relationships over gospel is revealed in the fact that many groups have given up the necessity for obedience to the gospel in order to be added to the body of believers. In a world of religiosity that is void of obedience to God, gone is the necessity of obedience to the gospel for the remission of sins (At 2:38). It is the majority who now affirm that one must “believe on Jesus only” for the remission of sins. Baptism is simply a choice of the believer, a choice that is often ignored. Most suffer from hydrophobia, and thus, are not willing to follow Jesus to the Jordan River.

When the preceding happens among those of faith, an interesting paradigm is established from which it is often difficult to escape. A religious box is constructed. It is similar to legal religious boxes that seek to retain adherents by conforming everyone to a legal set of ceremonies that identify the particular religious sect to which one belongs. But in the social-relational box, the rule is that there are no rules. If one would impose rules, then he or she simply does not fit the mold of the box. It is for this reason that open-Bible study classes have been cancelled because the adherents of the socially focused religion might discover in the word of God something that imposes a divine command that might exclude someone from the social box.

The next stage of apostasy in this movement is that an identity heritage is established. The unique group finds a unique name, possibly the “Tree of Life Church,” under which banner all adherents can be identified as members. Thus the members of the Tree of Life Church identify the heritage of their group by their unique name. The Tree of Life Church thus becomes a sect—a uniquely denominated group—that is separated from all other bannered churches in town who carry their own unique names of identity.

Over time, heritage becomes the foundation and authority of the Tree of Life Church. If others move out from the Tree of Life Church to other cities, they also start churches under the banner of the same heritage as the mother Tree of Life Church. In this scenario, apostasy is identified by one who would leave the heritage of the Tree of Life Church. Therefore, the adherents to the unique Tree of Life Church will often defend their church by resorting to the authority of their heritage and not the authority of the Bible.

It is a normal practice among Tree of Life churches that there is little Bible study. The assemblies of such churches will be characterized by a great deal of “Lord, Lord” emotionalism, but there will be few “amens” uttered when the speakers quote scriptures from the word of God. And since the preachers and movement are based on finances, preachers and teachers alike are cautioned not to speak any truth that might drive away checkbooks.

Legalists find it rewarding to judge Tree of Life churches. But in their spirit of judging, they become the same as that which they condemn. It is always true that those who are most cultic in their beliefs and behavior are the most critical of cults. The same is true of heritage-defined churches. They define who they are by their criticism of the free. It is not that the free are free from law. It is that their faith is in the gospel of Jesus Christ, not in the perfection of their heritage. This is a subtle deception of difference, but it is a deception all the same. We must not base our faith on the “soundness” of our heritage, but on the word of God.

Chapter 4

BOXES AND FREEDOM

When Jude wrote his short letter in the middle 60s, he was not defending either a legal or heritage box of faith.

Beloved, while I was giving all diligence to write to you about our common salvation [in Christ], I felt it necessary to write to you, exhorting that you earnestly contend for the faith [of the gospel] that was once for all delivered to the saints (Jd 3).

In the philosophical world today the phrase “think outside the box” is often used. It is used to encourage people to think outside the constraints of the norm, that is, to think outside the confinement of either heritage or traditions. When considering our social norms, one certainly has the freedom to think outside the old wineskins of the past. But when we consider the truth of the gospel that was once and for all time delivered to the saints as the foundation of our faith, “thinking outside the box” can often infer that there are no constraints on either belief or behavior in reference to living the gospel. We must not forget what Jude wrote in the next verse after the preceding comment:

For certain men have crept in [the body of believers] unnoticed, who were long before marked out for this condemnation, ungodly men who turn the grace of our God into licentiousness and deny our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ (Jd 4).

Now connect the word “faith” in Jude 3 with the word “grace” in Jude 4. Jude was writing about the truth of God’s grace. His subject in verse 3 was the faith of the gospel of grace, not an outline of doctrine. Paul used the phrase “truth of the gospel” in order to focus the minds of the Galatian and Colossian disciples on the revelation of the Son of God (See Gl 2:5,14; Cl 1:5). The incarnation, atoning death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom reign, and Jesus’ coming again compose together the “truth of the gospel.” If one would either deny or question any truth of the gospel, then he or she loses the power of the gospel to transform one’s life.

When we speak of Christianity, we must conclude that gospel behavior is motivated by the truth of the gospel. The “certain men” about whom Jude wrote were those who misunderstood or marginalized the gospel of grace. These were those about whom Paul questioned, “Will we continue in sin so that grace may abound?” (Rm 6:1). Grace is not a license to sin. And because it is not, then there is a box of gospel behavior outside which we must not test the grace of God.

We must consider what Jude wrote in the context of what Paul said in Galatians 5:1: “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage.” The “yoke of bondage” about which Paul exhorted the Galatian disciples not to be brought into bondage, were those religious legal rites from which Christians have been set free in their obedience to the gospel of grace. These were those “doctrines and commandments of men” that “certain men” seek to bring into the gospel of freedom wherein Christians must walk. In doing this, they are preaching another gospel (Gl 1:6-9). Therefore, when we speak of thinking “outside the box,” we are exhorting ourselves to determine what should not be a box of legal religiosity in which one seeks to justify himself before God on the basis of his perfect performance of law.

For example, some Jewish Christians sought to bring into the fellowship of the disciples the religious rite of Jewish circumcision. They were adamant about this because they believed that one could not be saved unless he was circumcised. These were those “certain men” who taught, “Except you are circumcised after the custom of Moses, you cannot be saved” (At 15:1). Circumcision as a part of the Sinai law had become a part of Jewish heritage. But when the Sinai law was nailed to the cross (Cl 2:14), all those who obeyed the gospel were made dead to that law (Rm 7:4). They were thus made dead to the necessity of circumcision.

After the cross, circumcision was relegated to being simply a religious rite of the Jews. Under the Sinai law, it was a law of God that all Jewish males be circumcised on the eighth day after birth. But the cross turned this law into simply being a religious rite of the Jews. Gentiles were not obligated to be circumcised. The law had become, as Luke wrote, only the “custom of the Jews” (At 15:1).

When one comes into Christ through obedience to the gospel, he or she must make some critical decisions concerning his or her past religious beliefs and behavior. What one may have considered “law” before obedience to the gospel, may now be only a “custom.” In the book of Galatians, the Holy Spirit argued persuasively that Christians not be brought into the bondage of old religious “boxes.” Religious rites that may have been allowed before one’s new birth must never be allowed to subsidize the truth of the gospel (See Cl 3).

Some disciples in Colosse had some difficulty with this matter. So Paul argued, “If you then were raised with Christ, seek those things that are above” (Cl 3:1). “Set your mind on things above,” Paul continued, “for you are dead [to the ways of the world]” (Cl 3:3). “Therefore, put to death your members that are on the earth” (Cl 3:5). If one were a Jew coming into Christ in the first century, then there were a host of doctrines and commandments of the fathers that had to be put away in order to live in the freedom that we have in Christ (See Mk 7:1-9). Those who are set free from the religious rites of their past must never again be brought into the bondage of their former religion.

One certainly has the freedom to carry on with his or her former religious traditions. However, under no circumstances does one have a right to bind on the consciences of others those practices he may deem to be in the realm of Christian behavior. We are sure that the early Jewish brethren carried on with their circumcision. However, they could not bind on Gentiles this former law that had now become only a “custom of Moses.” Some Jewish brethren in the first century tried to do this, but they met head on with the condemnation of the Holy Spirit who judged that their actions were endangering the freedom that all have in Christ. In fact, in no uncertain terms the Holy Spirit said, “If you are circumcised [according to law], Christ will profit you nothing” (Gl 5:2). Binding religious laws as a matter of salvation is preaching another gospel (Gl 1:6-9).

FALLEN

We remember receiving a phone call from a young man who was somewhat distraught about a piece of literature of ours he had read. He wanted us to explain what we meant by “apostasy,” for “his church” had never referred to such. It was something quite unknown to him. If one was once saved by the grace of God, then he could not understand how one could be an apostate.

When we use the word “apostasy,” we are referring to both doctrinal matters and gospel matters. John addressed those who were gospel apostates, for they denied that the Son of God had come in the flesh (1 Jn 4:2,3). Paul even prophesied “that in the latter times some will depart from the faith, giving heed to deceit- ful spirits and teachings of demons” (1 Tm 4:1). But in addition to apostasy from sound doctrine, there is the apostasy from the fundamental principles of the gospel. Some simply grow indifferent to the gospel they obeyed. They have become indifferent because their faith in the incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, kingdom reign and final coming have become irrelevant matters of their faith.

As a group, when Christians lose their first love, it is an apostasy without emotional pain, for it involves the majority. Lukewarmness often takes place over decades, not years. Once it is in its final stages, there is usually no turning back. As a group, the Christians in Ephesus lost their first love, though they retained their doctrinal purity (Rv 2:2). But they had fallen into the apostasy of losing their motivation by the gospel (Rv 2:4). The angel to the church mandated that John write in reference to the Ephesian Christians, “Remember from where you have fallen, and repent” (Rv 2:5).

The church in Laodicea simply cooled. “I know your works,” Jesus said of them from heaven, “that you are neither cold nor hot” (Rv 3:15). The problem with being neither excited about living the gospel, or becoming totally indifferent, is that one feels comfortable in his or her state of indifference. If one is content in such a state, then the motivational fire of the Lord in his heart has cooled. In such a state of mediocrity, Jesus judged the Laodicean disciples: “Because you are lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew you out of my mouth” (Rv 3:16).

The majority of the disciples in Ephesus and Laodicea had followed after the consensus, and eventually the majority created in their minds a concept of religiosity that was “fallen.” The majority vote kept them on the path that would eventually lead to their candlestick of influence being removed.

It is frightening that in matters of faith, the creation of a new religion often begins as a zealous call for a restoration. Such is a noble plea, one that is surely taken from the prophets of Israel who were called out of the idolatry of Baal worship to the old paths of God’s ways. The Lord pled with apostate Israel, “Stand in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where the good way is, and walk in it and you will find rest for your souls” (Jr 6:16). But the majority of the people responded, “We will not walk in it” (Jr 6:16). They had actually gone from belief in God to unbelief.

We have noticed in the history of the prophets of the Old Testament that the prophets always showed up too late. The apostasy of the majority had gone so far that the people as a whole could not turn back. God sent the prophets, therefore, more to judge the people than to turn them from their apostasy. He knew that it was too late. But He also wanted the people to know that where they were headed was their own fault, not His. The pleading prophets, nevertheless, were raised up in times when the majority of Israel was on the way out and into captivity. The pleas of the prophets, therefore, were only futile efforts to turn a people from the consequences of their spiritual demise.

We wonder that maybe God sent the prophets to an apostate Israel only for our benefit, “for whatever things were written before were written [in the Old Testament] for our learning” (Rm 15:4). And then we recall what Paul wrote to the Corinthians: “Now these things hap- pened to them [Israel] as an example” (1 Co 10:11). God wants us to rehearse continually the points of Israel’s apostasy unless we find ourselves going through the same door on our way from God. If this was the reason for the call of the noble prophets of God in times of old, then we are listening. We are learning. We are into our Old Testament lest we follow Israel’s example into apostasy.

The church throughout history has gone astray on many occasions. We have church history books that are loaded with illustrations of how church went wrong. We are also listening and learning from our past, lest we are doomed to relive the examples of the fallen as those in Ephesus and Laodicea.

In view of Israel’s slow demise into apostasy on many occasions, and scores of church history books that have mapped out so many examples of the same, we would be less than naive not to believe that the church again could move into ways of creating a god after our own desires and a religion that pleases our indifferent behavior in living the incarnational gospel of the Son of God. We have reasons for believing this.

Our postulations are not simply speculations conjectured from hypothetical situations. Fifty years of experience must not be ignored because we have lived through so many situations, as well as witnessed trends that appear in a vanishing moment. Trends take decades to develop, and thus, only those who have lived through trends in apostasy have been around long enough to know that we have lost our first love and have need “to remember from where we have fallen” (Rv 2:5). The fact that there are few among us who sense the loss of our first love, or the indifference of lukewarmness, is evidence that very few of our leaders today realize that we have “lost our first love.”

Since we now live in an era of little focus on the gospel, we know that we are in trouble. Now do not miss our point. Most religions that fall under the umbrella of “Christianity” focus on Jesus, the Son of God. But the problem is a matter of priorities. It is a matter of what we believe is the primary function of our faith by which we feel justified before God. When faith becomes either heritage (traditions) based, or experientially founded, then the truth of the gospel becomes a secondary foundation. If a particular movement is legal based, it too is on its way from the primary foundation of God’s grace.

Both heritage and legal religions are based on the self-sanctifying efforts of the adherents. The legalist finds comfort in law, whereas the traditionalist finds comfort in obedience to the heritage of the fathers. The adherents of both systems of religion find contentment in the flow of the majority, and thus, they justify their existence by the behavior of the majority at any one time in history.

And then we must add what many consider to be the most important restoration of modern times. This movement falls under what is claimed to be a true return to Pentecost. The movement is known primarily as Pentecostalism, but in definition it is a movement to experiential emotionalism. The experiential restorationist finds comfort in his own feelings. This is a self-sanctifying movement that finds its foundation in the emotional experiences of man. But it too would be categorized with the legal and traditional religionists. All three “systems” of religion are self-righteous oriented. They focus on the performance of the individual as a foundation for approval in the eyes of God. And thus, all three are self-sanctifying religions that take our minds off the gospel of God’s grace as the primary means by which we are justified before Him of all sin.

Gospel is grace oriented. Gospel produces a faith in the righteousness of God that was revealed at the cross. Gospel promotes faith in the total sanctification of the cross. Gospel says that we are totally sanctified by Jesus’ blood, and thus justified by His blood as opposed to our performance of either law or traditions, and especially our experiential emotionalism. Gospel says we are justified before God on the basis of Jesus’ performance on the cross, not on the basis of our performance of self-justifying good works or perfect law-keeping, faithful keeping of our fathers’ traditions, or the emotional outburst of ourselves. The gospel focuses our attention first on Jesus, not on ourselves.

Because the gospel takes our minds off ourselves and places our focus on the Lord Jesus Christ, He is able in our lives “to do exceedingly abundantly above all that we ask or think according to the power that works in us” (Ep 3:20). The gospel of God’s grace through Jesus stirs us out of indifference. It lifts us out of the pits of lukewarm religiosity and spurs us on to restore our first love that was lost. We must call for a restoration of the gospel as the total focus of our behavior. When we start walking in gratitude of what He did for us, we will stop walking alone on the merit of our own energies.

HERITAGE AUTHORITY

It is right and according to the word of God to call for a restoration of the authority of the word of God in matters of faith. However, some who make such a plea often make an unfortunate mistake. While viewing the Scriptures as a catechism of doctrine by which to call for a restoration of the faith of the “old paths,” they assume that the identity of faith is based on their ability to ascertain and implement “sound doctrine” in all matters of opinion as to how we must implement our faith. In doing this, we often fall victim to the same hermeneutic that identified the Jews’ religion of the Pharisees (Gl 1:13). They believed that not only is the law binding, but also the numerous traditions they had attached to the law in order to implement the law.

During His earthly confrontation with the leaders of the Jews’ religion, Jesus pointed out that the problem was not with the Sinai law, but with the added traditions that the religious leaders thought were necessary to surround the law itself (See Mt 15:1-9; Mk 7:1-9). There is indeed nothing wrong with individual interpretations of the law, which are more often opinions. But when the interpretations (opinions) become the heritage of the believers by which the law must be interpreted and implemented, then we have a problem.

In our efforts to contend for the law of our faith, we must be careful. The zealous student often seeks for authorities outside the law in order to confirm his interpretations of the law. In doing this, he often believes that his assertions are authoritative because of the footnotes of his writings from other authors who agree with his deductions. The more bibliography one stacks at the end of his book, the more authority he assumes that his writings must have in the field of theology. His footnotes, therefore, are used in an effort to substantiate his interpretations as truth.

When footnoted interpretations become the norm of biblical studies, then a problem invariably develops. The problem is that footnoted interpretations become a part of the catechism by which the doctrine of a particular religious group is identified. This was the road down which the Jews theologically traveled. When they came to Jesus on the day of the Mark 7 confrontation, they met the author of the Sinai law itself. His pronouncement was penetrating: “All too well you [religious leaders] reject the commandment of God [the Sinai law] so that you may keep your own tradition” (Mk 7:9).

The religious leaders of Israel had allowed the centuries of codified interpretations and opinions of their heritage to become “case law.” By the time Jesus arrived, they could not distinguish between the Sinai law and their law. By the first century, Paul referred to their religion that was founded on the law, plus their case law, as the Jews’ religion (Judaism) (Gl 1:13). They had finalized their apostasy. Their doctrinal purity was obedience to the Sinai law, plus all the other restrictions of law they had added to which the adherents must also be obedient. In doing such, they produced a religion. Some tried to do this very thing with the gospel. But they ended up with another gospel (Gl 1:6-9).

Some of those who are sincere in their efforts to restore the authority of the word of God in matters of faith often fail to see the danger that brought the Jews into bondage when Jesus came with a message of freedom. His message was not a freedom message unless they were already in bondage. They were in the bondage of their own religion. It is worth quoting again Paul’s warning in reference to going back under law: “Stand fast therefore in the liberty by which Christ has made us free, and do not be entangled again with a yoke of bondage” (Gl 5:1).

Now consider for a moment the preceding statement as a matter of historical significance in reference to the Jews’ problem with theology and obedience. In reference to justification before God, Jesus’ message would have no freedom if the people to whom He came were not in “bondage.” The Jews had “entangled” themselves in a quagmire of theology by which they believed that obedience to such would deliver them justified before God. This was the same quagmire of theology that Jesus confronted in Mark 7:1-9.

The mistake that the religious leaders made by the time of the coming of Jesus was that they were preaching Sinai law plus all their interpretations and applications. Their counterparts today, for example, would be those who obey the law, “This do in remembrance of Me,” plus certain catechisms by which the law of the Lord’s Supper must be carried out. Should the Supper be served before the ceremonial sermon, or after? Should men, but not women, serve? Women can serve from left to right, but not front to back. And then we need not go into all the confusion concerning what constitutes “fruit of the vine” and the “bread.”

What complicates the issue is when “Jewish authorities” are footnoted in one’s argument as to how the Supper is to be served. But more important than the authorities one may footnote in his defense, there is the heritage of the particular religious group that has “performed” the Supper a certain way throughout their history. Their heritage, therefore, has become law that must be obeyed in order to comply with the mandate, “This do in remembrance of Me.” The problem with theological heritage keepers is that they are quick to judge those of a different heritage law, but cannot see that they are guilty of the same.

We are urged to carry the apostasy of heritage keepers into the realm of sectarianism, something about which legal-driven sects are almost always unaware. For example, it is true that names of “churches” promote sectarianism. While some say they do not, they fail to recognize that even names within a family of religious groups are always used to identify one group of sheep to be separate from another group. The group that meets on North Main is identified with a name that separates it from the group that meets on South Main. The identity of each group by a particular name is sectarianism. The sheep inadvertently separate themselves into groups by being categorized under their favorite names.

Some with a sectarian spirit will go so far as to select a particular name from the Scriptures, and subsequently, affirm that their selection is “biblical.” However, another group will do the same, but will select a different “scriptural” name. They too will affirm that their selection is correct. Both groups will maintain their separation from one another that is simply based on different names. In doing this, they encourage sectarianism. They encourage the division of Christians by encouraging different groups to assemble under different favorite names. When the favorite names become the heritage of each particular group, then the division is permanent.

Both groups have failed to understand that the Holy Spirit never intended to name the disciples, other than a reference to Christians only (At 11:26; 26:28; 1 Pt 4:16). And when the Holy Spirit used the reference “Christian” in the two notations in Acts, it was probably first used derogatorily by unbelievers. Nevertheless, the Spirit used the derogatory use of the name to identify disciples in the early 60s to whom both Luke and Peter wrote.

We must keep in mind that the Spirit knew that names that are applied to the groups of different Christians would promote sectarianism. For this reason, we assume that the Spirit refrained from using any particular reference to the disciples as a unique mark of identity. If there are those who feel uncomfortable with this, then they have identified themselves to be sectarian. And when the name has become the identity of the heritage of a particular group of disciples, then the rise of heritage authority has captivated a particular group of disciples who seek to remain separate from everyone else.

But it is more than a name when we are referring to apostasy. As time carries on, every religious group begins to cluster under their favorite name and assortment of religious traditions that have now become the identity of their heritage. We would identify sectarian traditions as religious rites or rituals, customs or codes, that lie outside the word of God. When we behave as the Jews, and begin to identify and footnote the particular marks of our identity, then the simple faith that we read about in the New Testament becomes very blurred. We begin interpreting what we read in the New Testament through the glasses of our own religious prejudices.

Throughout a few generations, the traditions that identify a particular sect become the heritage of their faith. Religionists are proud of their heritage, and in order to be proud, they must be able to specifically identify their heritage in the midst of other heritage groups in the religious community. Their heritage defines who they are, and thus of necessity, they must assign a unique name to their heritage lest others become confused as to which group they belong. At this state of an apostasy, the authority of the Scriptures fades away. Bible study no longer defines the group that originally set a course for defining who they are by a call for the authority of the Scriptures in all matters of faith. Heritage has become the final authority of the faith of the adherents. The Jews progressed to this point when Jesus came to them. They rejected the commandment of God in order to maintain their heritage (Mk 7:9).

Several years ago we heard one brother of a particular sect say about another brother of the same sect, "I guess he is no longer with us." What the judge was saying was that the one on whom he had cast judgment was no longer maintaining the unique points of identity of their heritage. Being "with us" meant that one must conform to the legal status of the sect that is now based on heritage more than gospel. "With us" meant with our sect. And to be of one's particular sect, he or she must walk according to the traditions that identify the particular sect.

As a side note, the brother who "was no longer with us" was preaching the gospel, but outside the particular heritage of the group he had supposedly left. The judge meant that it was not "according to the law" that one should step outside the fellowship of the "heritage group" in order to preach the gospel to another group. Paul's custom of preaching in the synagogues of the Jews would be wrong according to the judge (See At 17:1,2). Aquila and Priscilla in the Jewish synagogue on the Sabbath would mean to some Christians that they are "no longer with us" (At 18:24-28).

We offer the example of the Jewish apostasy to illustrate what happened with the religious leaders of Israel, which thing is also happening today. What the religious leaders of Jesus' day were doing was grievous. It was so grievous that Jesus used the word "woe" in His condemnation of what His contemporary religious leaders were doing. Jesus said of the sectarian Jewish leadership,

But woe to you scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! For you shut up the kingdom of heaven against men, for you neither go in yourselves, nor do you allow those who are entering to go in (Mt 23:13).

When judgments are made in reference to conforming to heritage, then we know that apostasy has taken away those who, generations before, did not set their course to establish another religious sect. Therefore, the leading fathers of any restoration must be careful not to establish a legal-oriented foundation upon which apostasy can arise.

Our constitutional mandate is laid out clearly in the books of Romans and Galatians. In extracting legalistic Jews from the Jews' religion, the Holy Spirit established the gospel of freedom as the foundation upon which we must base our faith. Our call, therefore, must always be for a gospel restoration movement, as opposed to a legal restoration. Efforts to legalize grace will always create sects. Legalizing grace establishes those principles ("laws") upon which a system of theology is produced that leads to sectarianism.

GOSPEL AND LAW

Any conclusion that we might make concerning the restoration of the gospel to be our center of reference for faith and obedience must stand on the following statement of Paul in reference to law: "Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of law" (Rm 3:28). In other words, we are justified of sin before God by faith on the merit of the cross of Jesus. We are not justified by any meritorious performance of law or self-sanctification through our own supposed atoning works.

Just in case we might have misunderstood this conclusion, by the time Paul came to the final statements of his argument in Romans, he added, “And if by grace, then it is no more by works [that is, meritorious law-keeping and good works]” (Rm 11:6). And as an added note on this subject, Paul wrote to the Ephesians,

For by grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works [of merit], lest anyone should boast [in his own works] (Ep 2:8,9).

This is the message of the gospel that was revealed through Jesus Christ. This is the foundation upon which we must call for a gospel restoration.

Heritage authority is directly opposed to the gospel. In fact, since heritage authority is established on the consensus of the majority to obey the traditions of the fathers, then the gospel of grace has no opportunity to motivate the hearts of those who are in bondage to their own religious heritage. When heritage has moved gospel out of the hearts of the adherents by the adherents’ trust in their own performance of the traditions of the fathers, then it is difficult to find one’s way back to faith in the grace of God. When we add to this the absence of Bible study among those who trust in their heritage, then only disaster is in the future.

My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge. Because you have rejected knowledge [of Me], I will also reject you so that you will be no priest to Me. Seeing you have forgotten the law of your God, I will also forget your children (Hs 4:6).

The word “destroyed” in this statement of God through Hosea is in the past tense. By the time Hosea showed up on the scene, Israel was already gone. There was no turning back.

When the people of Israel forgot the law of God, they did not cease being religious. On the contrary, the problem was that they based their faith on their own religiosity, not on the law of God. Hosea, therefore, was a preacher who came to pronounce judgment, not to give the people an opportunity to repent.

When a religionist finds comfort in the heritage of the faith of his fathers, which faith is not based on the word of God, then he is in a state where it is difficult to turn back to God. The reason is that repentance would involve a return to faith in God’s grace as opposed to one’s own performance of the religious rites of one’s religious heritage. We must not forget that if one’s faith in his forefathers’ religious heritage is stronger in his life than the gospel of God’s grace, then one is in a very precarious situation in reference to what Jesus said in John 12:48.

This is also true of those who have established a meritorious legal foundation upon which to build their faith. This was the problem of the Pharisees and scribes during Jesus’ earthly ministry. By the time Jesus arrived, they had laid aside the commandment of God in order to honor their own religious heritage (Mk 7:8). In fact, when the commandment of God was presented to them, their stern religiosity prevailed over the message of the gospel that Jesus was delivering to all Israel. Jesus said of them, “All too well you reject the commandment of God so that you may keep your own traditions” (Mk 7:9).

In the books of Romans and Galatians this is precisely what Paul argued against. At the time Paul wrote the two letters, there were Jewish legalists coming into the fellowship of the disciples with the legal religiosity of their former years in Judaism. In the two letters, therefore, Paul concluded that if there is justification through meritorious law-keeping, then the gospel means nothing. It means nothing if it must be subsidized by the religious performances of man.

The gospel is dead if it must be subsidized by the self-sanctifying obedience of religious rites. It has no power in such situations. It was because of this legal attack against the gospel that Paul sternly encouraged those who lived by the gospel not to be brought again into the bondage of meritorious law-keeping and good works (Gl 5:1).

When we refer to gospel, we are not talking about meritorious law-keeping and self-sanctifying good works. The gospel says, “For by works of law no flesh will be justified [before God]” (Gl 2:16). But the legalist would establish a system of legal acts of obedience, and then perform accordingly in order to be justified before God on the basis of performing correctly his laws of obedience. But the gospel is not a system of perfect law-keeping.

For example, the gospel says, “God is spirit, and those who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth [of the gospel]” (Jn 4:24). The legalist would say that we must establish a system by which we can assure ourselves that we are performing the laws of “true” worship.

The gospel says that Jesus is coming again to take “vengeance on those who do not know God and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Th 1:8). The legalist would take the declarative statement of Mark 16:16 in response to the preaching of the gospel—“He who believes and is baptized will be saved”—and twist it in the text into an imperative command. He would thus make the shift of emphasis from baptism being a response to the gospel to a matter of legal obedience on the part of the one who believes.

It is true that there are commands in the New Testament to be baptized (See At 2:38; 22:16). But these commands are based on the response of those who believed the gospel of Jesus. There was no command to be baptized that was not based on belief in Jesus. If one did not believe on Jesus, then there was no need to be obedient to the command to be baptized (See Mk 16:16).

If baptism were simply obedience to a legal command, then we would go from emphasizing one's belief in the gospel to emphasizing one's performance of the "law of baptism." We would forget that obedience in baptism is imperative because it is a natural response to belief in the gospel.

Our response to the gospel is based on our knowledge of God, and what He did for us through the gospel of His beloved Son. We thus obey the gospel in baptism because we are knowledgeable of and believe the gospel. If one did not believe the gospel, then certainly he would not be baptized (See Mk 16:15,16).

Legal obedience in "getting baptized" is reassuring in knowing that one has followed Jesus to the Jordan River, but it often ignores one's response to knowing the heart of God that was revealed through the good news of Jesus. If one does not know the heart of God as revealed through the gospel of grace, then he can legally be baptized according to command. But he is obeying a law without understanding the heart of God that was revealed through the incarnation and the cross. He thus comes out of the water having obeyed legalities, and not because he has responded to the love of God that was revealed through the incarnation and the cross.

It is a subtle difference, but it is a difference. Gospel and legalism simply stand against one another, and subsequently, produce two different individuals on the wet side of the waters of baptism. Gospel focuses our minds on God, and what He did for us through the cross. Legalism focuses our minds on ourselves as to whether we have performed correctly the law of God. Through obedience to the gospel we have been drawn to Christ (Jn 12:32). Through obedience to law we are often running from punishment because of what would happen to us if we were not obedient.

For example, the gospel-obedient person needs no command to show up at the next assembly after coming out of the waters of baptism. He or she simply wants to be around other gospel-obedient people. The gospel-obedient person needs no command to remember through the Supper why he or she went to the cross and grave with Jesus. He or she wants to be with Jesus on the cross and in grave in order to experience the resurrection.

The motive of the legalist is to mark off a check list of accomplishments according to law. The motive of the gospel obedient is to follow the instructions of the Father in response to the cross and resurrection. One walks in question as to whether one's performance is perfect and complete. The other walks in gratitude, knowing that his or her performance is never perfect, and thus, must by faith trust in the grace of God.

The one who lives the gospel, therefore, is made perfect through the cross, whereas the legal performer is constantly seeking to make himself perfect through obedience. It is imperative, therefore, that the legal performer create steps to salvation to be performed, and acts of worship to perform in order to be assured that he or she has perfectly performed all the steps and acts in order to feel good before God. This is the person who needs to read again the comforting statement of the Holy Spirit: "Therefore, we conclude that a man is justified by faith [in the work of God through the gospel] apart from the works of law [by which we would seek to justify ourselves through our own performance of law and works]" (Rm 3:28). "Therefore, it [our salvation] is of faith [in God's performance] that it might be by [His] grace" (Rm 4:16).

Legal obedience cancels gospel response. On the other hand, gospel response nullifies legal meritorious obedience. It is for this reason that the legalist can never understand what Jesus meant in Matthew 5:48: "Therefore, you are to be perfect even as your Father in heaven is perfect."

This statement was made in view of the revelation of the gospel that would be revealed on the cross. It would be then that those of faith would be made perfect through the cross, and not through their perfect obedience to law. We can never perfectly obey, but we can always be perfectly accepted by God through the grace of His Son, whose blood, perfectly cleanses us of all sin.

Law-keeping never makes one perfect. We know this in our own lives. Law always presents the dilemma of what Paul spoke concerning his own life: "For without law, I was once alive. But when the commandment came, sin revived and I died" (Rm 7:9). Law brings with it the reality of sin, and thus death because of sin. Gospel, on the other hand, brings life through the perfect cleansing of the blood of Jesus. It is for this reason that gospel brings life.

Does our faith in the sacrificial performance of the Son on the cross nullify law in our lives? Certainly not! We establish law in our lives because we trust in His performance, and not in our own (Rm 3:31). For this reason, true faith never sits idle in reference to studying the word of God.

Some define their faith by their avoidance of law. This is a “faith only” salvation that inevitably leads to one’s lack of focus on obedience to the commandment of God. Some willingly set aside the law of God in order to be justified apart from obedience. But this is a failure to understand that saving faith is always a response to the Father’s instructions. Obedience to the Father’s instructions in reference to our salvation is never meritorious, and thus, never optional. Obedience to God’s commands is never legalistic obedience. Obedient faith in reference to our knowledge of God’s instructions (law) can never be marginalized in reference to our salvation.

On the other hand, the religiosity that cursed the Israelites with destruction was their willing ignorance of the law of God, and subsequent disobedience of the law. They were destroyed because they had become ignorant of the true God of their origins (Hs 4:6). And because they exchanged the true God of heaven for Baal gods that they had created after their own imagination, they subsequently established their own righteousness to please their Baal gods. Though the Baal gods were eradicated from the minds of the Jews by the time of the arrival of Jesus, they had established for themselves the gods of their own righteousness (Rm 10:1-3). And in doing this, they rejected the righteousness of God.

When one by obedient faith trusts in the grace of God for His salvation, he seeks to establish the will (law) of God in his life. On the other hand, the “faith only” individual who discards obedience to law will eventually cease studying his Bible because he trusts only in his faith. This system of religion resulted in Israel’s destruction for they forgot to continue to study the law of God.

The one who has faith in the grace of God is driven to know God and His directions concerning salvation. True faith drives one to study the will and work of God in the affairs of man in order to bring His people into eternal glory (See Rm 15:4; 1 Co 10:11). The diligent believer is driven to know as much as possible about the gospel plan of salvation of this God who loved him so.

This was the meaning behind Paul’s exhortation of 2 Timothy 2:15. The correct translation of this passage is the following: “Be diligent to present yourself approved to God as a workman who does not need to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth.” If one is not motivated by the gospel, then he will not be diligent, especially in his Bible study. He will be ashamed because he knows he should be, but is not, a diligent respondent (workman) to the grace of God.

We must never forget that legalism leads to a failure in Bible study. Once the legalist has developed his outline of doctrine, he feels that there is no need for more Bible study. The “faith only” religionist ends up at the same demise because his trust is in his own faith and not the instructions of God. If one is saved by faith alone, then there is no need to know the will of God. It is always inherent in a “faith only” theology for one to eventually terminate one’s Bible study. The “faith only” person grows paranoid about discovering in the Bible something he or she must do in order to be saved.

But when one’s faith is in the grace of God, then it is different. Faith in the grace of God inspires one continually to know more about this God who so loved the world that He sacrificed His only begotten Son. Therefore, Bible study, or lack thereof, will be the judge as to whether we are legalists, “faith only” adherents, or gospel-appreciative saints who cannot satisfy our thirst for information about the gospel. We must always keep in mind that the grace-driven student studies without fear of discovering new truth to be obeyed. He has no fear because he understands that he was always saved by grace on his journey to discover more truth through his personal study of the word of God.

Chapter 8

HAVE TO – WANT TO

It seems that no matter how many times we read the following statements in the New Testament, we have a difficult time understanding the true nature of the gospel of God’s grace:

- “By the works of law no flesh will be justified in His sight” (Rm 3:20).
- “We conclude that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of law” (Rm 3:28).

- “Having been justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ” (Rm 5:1).
- “You are not under law, but under grace” (Rm 6:14).
- “A man is not justified by works of law, but by the faith of Christ Jesus” (Gl 2:16).
- “For by grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest anyone should boast” (Ep 2:8,9).

Our difficulty may be in our own desire to do our own thing. When we approach God, we want to do it our way. But this is not the way it is. Our relationship with God is not based on our way, but His way. In fact, we can never come before Him on the merit of our way. Unfortunately, because we cannot come before God on our own terms, we become religionists.

Religion is defined as our meritorious way by which we would earn our acceptance by God. Religion, therefore, becomes a system of rules or religious rites that we presume will obligate God to establish and maintain a relationship with us. If we violate our self-imposed rules to establish this relationship, we then develop some system of self-sanctification by which we can cleanse ourselves of the violations of our rites and rules. After we have performed the atoning works, then we can once again feel accepted by God. This is religion. But gospel is entirely different.

If one were formerly a legal-oriented Jewish religionist, it would be quite difficult to digest the preceding statements of the Scriptures. As many believing Jews in the first century, there are many today who were born again out of a legal religiosity by which they sought to self-sanctify themselves into the grace of God. We too have sought to stand justified before God on the merit of our own self-imposed legal systems by which we have struggled to feel comfortable before God. We have deceived ourselves by trusting in ourselves.

Religion is deceiving because we feel good about keeping our religious rites, rules and ceremonies. When we obey the religiosity of our heritage, we content ourselves that our earthly fathers would be pleased with our obedience to the religious heritage that they had handed down to us. The problem with this is that we are seeking to please the wrong father.

If there are occasional infractions of our system, then with self-appointed works of sanctification that we would perform, we seek to reinstate ourselves in the grace of God. This is a system of saved/lost—lost/ saved. There is no peace of mind in this system of religion simply because we are establishing our faith and feelings on our own performance, which performance in religious matters is always flawed.

In a self-sanctifying system of religion there is no confidence in God to keep us saved. Everything depends on our own performance of either law or our self-imposed works of self-sanctification in order to atone for our misbehavior. Our salvation depends on ourselves. In some cases, we base our salvation on our obedience to the creeds of our religious heritage. We deceive ourselves into thinking that if our earthly father would be pleased with us, then certainly our heavenly Father would also be pleased.

The Jews' system of self-sanctification and self-justification was a system of faith that was based on the heritage of their fathers (Mk 7:1-9). The result of any such systems of religiosity is still the same today. Such systems are riddled through and through with guilt because any rational and honest person truly confesses up to the fact that there is no system of law by which any person can live perfectly before God. And when there are infractions against law, there can never be any self-atoning works by which we can wash our slate clean of sin.

To believe we can cleanse our own sin is an effort to put God in our debt. Paul spoke of this system of religion: "Now to him who works, the reward is not credited according to grace, but according to debt" (Rm 4:4). Our efforts of self-sanctification reverse the grace of God because we seek through good works to obligate God to forgive us. But we forget that He has already forgiven those who have responded to His conditions through obedient faith.

Therefore, the Holy Spirit was very clear. No one can be justified before God on the basis of keeping God's law perfectly. And, no one can perform one good work in order to obligate God to forgive us of our sins. Understanding these two principles constrains us to have faith in the grace of God.

It is our faith in God's grace that brings the peace of mind that passes all understanding (Ph 4:7). This was the peace of mind that Jesus left with us when He left this world for heaven: "Peace I leave with you. My peace I give to you; not as the world gives do I give to you. Let not your heart be troubled, nor let it be afraid" (Jn 14:27).

A. "Have to" religion:

This brings us to the difference between religion and the gospel of grace. All religions are man-made systems of religiosity by which we would seek to tether ourselves to Christ on the merit of our own performance. In religion there is always the feeling that one is working for something. He is working with all his might to hang on to his tether with Christ. The following statement is often mentioned in prayers that are offered: "If we have been found faithful." So we work to be found faithful. Religion is often revealed through those who do not partake of the Lord's Supper because they have not been "found faithful" at some time during the preceding week. Because of guilt they feel that they are not worthy to partake of the Supper. This is religion.

The fact is that we can never be "found faithful" on the merit of our performance of either law or works. And if one would refuse to partake of the Lord's Supper in remembrance of the gospel of grace, then he misunderstands the gospel of grace. He has let go of his tether to Christ in order to hold on to his own.

If we are religiously inclined in this way, then a spiritual problem is revealed when we do partake of the Supper. If we partake, and thus feel that we have been "found faithful" because of our performance in the past week, then we feel self-qualified to be in fellowship with God. We become arrogant about ourselves, for we think that we have meritoriously earned the right to partake of the Supper. This is religion.

Religion is a system of "I have to." The religionist obligates himself to be "found faithful" by his successful performance of self-imposed religious rites. He obligates himself into believing that he must keep law perfectly in order to save himself. He must perform perfectly, and when he does not, he must make up for his infractions of law through self-sanctifying good works. For the self-sanctifying religionist, faith is all about one's performance of law and works in order to be "found faithful" in the eyes of God. When he self-judges himself not to be "found faithful," then he questions his faith. This is religion.

The legalist's view of law is that he must meritoriously keep law perfectly in order to be "found faithful." The psychology of the legalist is that he often remains in a state of guilt because he continually questions whether he is keeping the law perfectly. If some misfortune comes in his life, then he often complains to God. He complains to God that he has kept all the law, but wonders why he is being punished. In order to feel good, he does good works to atone for those areas of the law where his obedience is weak.

B. "Want to" faith:

On the other hand, faith in the gospel of grace means that we "want to." Paul begins to explain this by saying, "Where then is boasting [over law-keeping and works]? It is excluded. By what law? Of Works? No, but by the law of faith [in the grace of God]" (Rm 3:27). So where does law stand in reference to our relationship with God? Paul answered, "Do we then make void law through faith? Certainly not! On the contrary, we establish law" (Rm 3:31).

This is the faith of the one who says, "I want to." Because we have faith in the grace of God to save us, we want to be obedient children of our Father. If we seek our Father's favor through works, then we are trying to set aside His grace, or at least marginalize it in our efforts to measure up to what we have established as our standards of faithfulness.

But if our faith is in the fact that we are already saved by His grace, then we work because of our gratitude for our salvation. We thus walk by faith in His grace, and not by sight in our meritorious performance of a perfect attendance (2 Co 5:7).

We thus have a choice as to whether we would walk in religion which dictates "I have to" keep His law in order to justify myself, or walk by faith in the grace of God which inspires us to say, "I want to" walk according to His law because He has already saved us. One walk is a walk of religion and bondage. The other is a walk of freedom and peace of mind. And for those who have experienced the walk of freedom, Paul's exhortation is that we not detour from this walk of freedom (See Gl 5:1).

We must not forget that we are "justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Rm 3:24). He "freely gives us all things" (Rm 8:32), because "Christ has made us free" (Gl 5:1). Therefore, "we must know the things that are freely given to us by God" (1 Co 2:12). And in the end, Jesus, because of grace, will say to each one of us, "I will freely give to him who is thirsty of the fountain of the water of life" (Rv 21:6).

If it is all free, then why would we be driven to work meritoriously for that which is free through the grace of God? It is not that we "have to" perform in order to be rewarded with that which is free. We must by faith accept the free gift of His grace. But it is not that we have to work in order to be worthy of that which is free.

If by faith we accept His grace, then we "want to" work because we have been saved by His grace. We must remember this truth: "For by grace you are saved through faith, and that not of yourselves, it is the gift of God; not of works, lest anyone should boast" (Ep 2:8,9). We have chosen, therefore, to walk the walk of gratitude, and not the walk of guilt, despair, and discouragement. We have chosen this walk, not because we have to, but because we want to.

When one is first delivered out of the bondage of religious rites and rules through his obedience to the gospel, for some time there is often a spiritual battle between freedom and bondage, grace and works, faith in God or faith in one's own performance of past religious rites and rules. This struggle to fully appreciate our freedom from the bondage of guilt is often a lifetime struggle. We have the New Testament Scriptures today because the early Christians were also struggling to grow out of their past religions. But we must remember that our heroes of the faith, as the apostle Paul, made it. And for this reason, he was sanctioned by the Holy Spirit to inscribe the following words concerning his victory: “Be imitators of me even as I also am of Christ” (1 Co 11:1).

PERSECUTED FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS

Is there a conflict between law and grace? Depending on one’s approach to law, there most certainly is. Paul’s statement of Romans 7:9 should be a clue: “For without law, I was once alive. But when the commandment came, sin revived and I died.” Because of the conflict between law and grace there will always be a conflict between those who seek to live according to the gospel and those who seek to live according to a religion of meritorious law-keeping.

We do not know at what time during Jesus’ early ministry that He began to reveal the gospel of grace. We do know that when He delivered the message of the sermon on the mountain early in His ministry, He began revealing the first principles upon which gospel living would be founded. Also in the sermon on the mountain, He began to speak to His disciples concerning the adverse reaction of religionists who would come upon them if they chose to live the message that He was bringing into the world.

At the time He delivered the message on the mountain, Jesus was into His ministry long enough for multitudes to be following Him. Unfortunately, the multitudes did not fully understand the paradigm shift He was introducing into their faith (Mt 5:1; see Lk 14:25-35). Sometime during the first year of His ministry “He went up on a mountain.” It was then that He began to reveal a great conflict that would soon arise in the religious world concerning what He was about to introduce into the world.

At the end of what is commonly referred to as the Beatitudes, Jesus revealed that there would be great conflict in the religious world between those who would follow Him through their obedience to the gospel, and the religious world that would oppose the gospel that He would reveal. Jesus later warned His immediate disciples, “If the world hates you, you know that it hated Me before it hated you” (Jn 15:18).

It is interesting to note in the preceding statement that Jesus used the word “world” in reference to the religious world of the Jews who hated Jesus so much that they eventually cried out, “Crucify Him. Crucify Him.” So without mentioning any specifics in concluding the Beatitudes, Jesus forewarned the multitudes,

Blessed are those who are persecuted for righteousness’ sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are you when people insult you and persecute you and falsely say all kinds of evil against you for My sake (Mt 5:10:11).

Jesus brought a final note of comfort to His eager audience by recalling the righteous prophets who had gone before them. “Rejoice and be exceedingly glad, for great is your reward in heaven, for in the same way they persecuted the prophets who were before you” (Mt 5:12).

What was coming in the future was a conflict between those who had created their own righteousness and those who would be imputed with the righteousness of God through their obedience to the gospel. Those who created their own righteousness would eventually be intimidated by the righteousness of God that was revealed in the lives of the early obedient disciples. And for this reason, those who lived according to the standard of their own self-righteousness would persecute those who would live only by the standard of the gospel of grace.

The conflict was coming in the lives of those who would live according to the righteousness of God. The self-righteous would put Jesus on the cross because they refused the gospel He preached. Those who would live according to their motivation by the gospel would likewise be persecuted as Jesus. And thus, the persecuted would also have a cross to bear (Lk 14:27).

In the fullness of time when Jesus arrived on earth, the self-righteousness of the Jews had reached its zenith (See Gl 4:4). The religious leaders of Israel had established their own religion (Gl 1:13). As Israel during the days of the prophets, specifically Hosea, the Jews had become ignorant of the righteousness of God (Hs 4:6). Paul explained that the same religious environment existed at the time Jesus came into the world:

For I testify of them that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. For they being ignorant of God’s righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God (Rm 10:2,3).

Herein is explained why the Jewish religious leaders nailed Jesus to the cross. He intimidated their works-oriented religiosity. Through their legal system of righteousness, they presumed that they were self-justified before God. The faith that Jesus introduced was not based on one's confidence in his own self-sanctifying righteousness. It was based on the righteousness of God. This meant that one was righteous because of God's grace, not because one had either performed law perfectly, or sanctified himself through good works in order to put God in debt to save him. The religious leaders of Jesus' day had truly forgotten what God said through David:

The Lord looked down from heaven on the children of men to see if there were any who understood and sought God. They have all gone aside. They have all together become filthy. There is no one who does good, no, not one (Ps 14:2,3).

Paul reminded his readers by quoting in Romans this very statement of David concerning the spiritual condition of man when Jesus came into the world (See Rm 3:10,11). In the context of what Jesus said in the sermon on the mountain, the Holy Spirit wanted us to connect the dots: "There is none righteous, no, not one" (Rm 3:10).

There is no one who is righteous before God on the merit of his own performance of law, or supposed self-sanctification through good works. But the religious leaders of Jesus' day presumed that they were righteous according to the righteousness that they had religiously constructed for themselves in ignorance of the righteousness of God. They were so steeped in their own self-righteousness that they could not recognize the righteousness of God that was revealed through Jesus. In fact, Jesus said of them, "For John [the Baptist] came to you [religious leaders] in the way of righteousness and you did not believe him" (Mt 21:32).

It is true that those who live the gospel today are often not recognized by the religious world. It is difficult for self-righteous people to recognize those who live by the gospel. Self-righteous legalists must judge others according to the legalities of their own legal systems, not according to their understanding of the gospel of grace.

Self-righteous religionists persecuted Jesus during His ministry. They will do the same today to anyone who would live by the motivation of the gospel. Gospel intimidates the religionist, for religion is based on the meritorious obedience of those who are in the bondage of the rites and rules of religion. Those who would lead in a gospel restoration will always be persecuted by those who have built their faith on a legal-oriented restoration of self-righteousness.

If one would live in the freedom by which Christ has set him free in obedience to the gospel, then those who are not of the gospel, and do not know the God of the gospel, will persecute those who are identified by the gospel. Those who live according to the gospel of freedom will always be labeled liberal because they do not conform to a legal system of self-righteousness. Those who presume to be legally righteous will always consider those who live after the gospel of freedom to be liberal according to the legal standards by which they define their religion. Legalists will presumptuously assume that they are self-justified before God through their meritorious law-keeping, and thus by their own standards, will judge those who live according to the gospel of grace.

Those who seek to establish their own righteousness according to a religion of meritorious law-keeping will always have difficulty understanding those who establish law in their lives according to their response to the gospel of grace. Because of this difficulty on the part of the legal self-righteous, Paul had to clarify this point in the following statement: "*Do we then make void law through faith? Certainly not! On the contrary, we establish law" (Rm 3:31). Those who have lived long in a system of legal righteousness have some difficulty understanding this statement of gospel truth.

GOD'S RIGHTEOUSNESS

In referring to the subject of baptism in obedience to the gospel, we can be more specific concerning the self-righteous persecution of those who would be righteous according to God's righteousness. A self-righteous religionist will often deny that one should be baptized for remission of sins, even though there are numerous clear statements of such in the Scriptures (At 2:38; 22:16). But there is a reason for this objection.

A. Self-righteous legalist:

First consider the legal-oriented religionist. This person cannot understand why some would question those who seek to be baptized. Since he believes that one is subject to law on the merit of one's own performance of law itself, then he cannot understand why there would be those who would question those who want to obey the law. He does not understand the argument of the self-righteous religionist, because he asserts that the religionist is seeking to deny obedience to the law.

Legal religionists will always be in debate with one another over matters of what they consider law. They will debate because each is approaching the law legally, and not according to the gospel of grace. They debate as to which laws must be obeyed. They debate that the commands to "believe on Jesus" and "be baptized" are laws from which a choice must be made in order that one come into a saving relationship with God. They even debate as to which examples in the New Testament that they have made law should be obeyed. Their debates are endless because each one has established a rule book of law that defines which opinions are salvational and which statements of command are optional.

Though the New Testament is used to establish unique outlines of law that must be obeyed, the outlines of all legalists are invariably different, and often in conflict with one another. Depending on the hermeneutics by which each determines the laws of his outline in the camps of the legalists, there will always be conflicts between outlines of law.

Since all aspects of faith must supposedly fall under law, then legal-restorationists will constantly be in conflict with one another as each makes his own legal outline of law according to his own heritage, or interpretation of the Scriptures. The Jews had a solution to iron out such conflicts. They established authorities called the scribes to settle disputes when there were conflicts in reference to determining that which is of law. As the religious policemen, the Pharisees made sure that everyone complied with the decisions of the scribes. Theirs was not necessarily a system of religion without contradictions, but it was truly a system of religion in which they tried to be as consistent as possible (See Gl 1:13).

B. Self-righteous religiosity:

Now consider the self-righteous religionist affirms that any obedience to law is meritorious. He has read enough scriptures on the subject of our justification by faith through grace that he is convinced that no "works"

(obedience) whatsoever should marginalize grace. If there were any action on the part of man in reference to his own salvation, then such should surely be contrary to our salvation by grace alone.

Since his position is usually defined as "salvation by grace only," he has a difficult time understanding the requirement of any commandment that is given in reference to our salvation. To him, therefore, baptism as a law would be a work of merit if obeyed in order to be saved. His conclusion is that since we are not meritoriously saved by works of law, then we are saved by ignoring all law, including baptism that would give the pretense of meritorious salvation. However, he does not realize that he becomes self-righteous in his rejection of law in order to establish his own law that one is saved on the merit of faith alone. And herein is revealed the fact that his theology is contrary to the gospel.

C. Gospel living by faith:

Now we need to view baptism from the gospel side. Paul's argument to the "faith only" religionist was not the dismissal of law through faith and grace, but through faith "we establish law" (Rm 3:31). Faith in the grace of God is the motivation to establish law in one's life. It is the impetus.

Faith energizes our hearts to respond to the heart of God that was revealed through the gospel of His Son on the cross and resurrection from the dead. If there is no response to the gospel, then it is as Paul wrote to the Thessalonians. The unresponsive person really does not know God (2 Th 1:8). He does not know the heart of God that was incarnate in the flesh of man in order to be offered as a sacrifice for the sins of humanity.

If one is ignorant of the heart of God that was exposed on the cross, then he will create his own religiosity—his own self-righteousness—in order to feel justified before God. His "faith only" relationship with God will drive him to guilt that creates some meritorious work ethic to relieve himself of guilt. Because he trusts in his "faith only" salvation, he does not seek to obey the gospel of God by being buried with the heart of God that went to the cross and grave for his sins. He will not be raised up to rejoice in newness of life as the Son of God was raised from the dead. He will not because he has deceived himself by confusing meritorious works of law with responses to the heart of God. He thus misses out on what Paul wrote of himself: "I want to know Him and the power of His resurrection and the fellowship of His sufferings, being like Him in His death" (Ph 3:10).

All this consideration about baptism is simply legal business in the mind of the "faith only" religionists.

He feels that a response to the heart of God is a step into the realm of meritorious works of law. On the other hand, the legalist will always be baptized in order to comply with legalities. He will find a law, and then obey that law. At least he is being obedient to law, though he may not fully understand what it means to be baptized in response to the gospel heart of God.

The gospel respondent, in agreement with those who are legally obedient, will be baptized. However, his obedience in baptism is motivated by the crucified heart of God for his sins. A young child can be baptized according to law. But in order to be baptized in response to the gospel, one must be of the age when he or she can intellectually and emotionally respond to the heart of God that was crucified on the cross of Calvary. It goes without saying that the baptism of babies is a mockery of the heart of God on the cross. Parents cannot respond to the heart of God on behalf of their babies.

And so, there will always be a conflict between those who would seek to establish their own righteousness that is void of the law of God, and those who seek to respond to the gospel of the cross. And for this reason, self-righteous religionists will always persecute those who seek to be righteous according to the righteousness of God. Legal religionists will always persecute those who seek to live in response to the gospel. Those whose emphasis is on grace will always be persecuted by those whose emphasize is on meritorious law-keeping.

The deception of the “faith only” self-righteous religionist is that he presumes that he is righteous before God on the merit of his faith only. He has convinced himself that his faith will wash away his sins (See At 22:16). Unfortunately, this system of righteousness always leaves one in doubt concerning the “saving strength” of his faith. He can believe that he is saved, but his belief is based on the merit of his faith. He thus establishes a religion of self-righteousness that is based on the merit of his own faith. Instead of having faith in God’s declaration of his salvation that is based on his obedience to what God requires of one to be saved, he seeks to declare his own salvation that is based on the merit of his faith alone.

The hypocrisy of the preacher of the “faith only” system of righteousness is that he proclaims that we are all saved by “faith only,” and yet he will continually harp every Sunday that the people must tithe according to law. And if they do not tithe according to law, then the people are “robbing God.” Their faith is weak.

Some also assume that their “speaking in tongues” is a manifestation of their faith. They subsequently judge others to have little or weak faith if they do not “speak in tongues.” Their own “speaking in tongues,” therefore, makes their faith meritorious. They make the judgment of others: No tongues, inadequate faith.

The hypocrisy of such a theology is self-evident. However, as the religious leaders of Jesus’ day, some are often so steeped in their self-righteous religiosity that they cannot see the contradictions of their theology. Nevertheless, it is quite hypocritical for one to self-proclaim himself saved by “faith only” on Saturday night, but then feel that according to law he must show up in attendance on Sunday morning lest he break the law of the assembly. Likewise, it is hypocritical to affirm that one is saved by faith apart from obedience to the gospel, while at the same time he seeks to self-righteously validate his faith by meritorious works as “speaking in tongues.”

At the same time, we will not let the self-righteous legalist off the hook so easily. The self-righteous religionist establishes a law of assembly, quoting endlessly and out of context Hebrews 10:25. The legalist will bark Sunday after Sunday not to forsake the law of attending the assembly. If one does not attend, or in some way must miss a designated “appointed hour” of assembly, he has broken the law. He is judged that his performance of the law of the assembly is dysfunctional, and thus he must “go forward” before the church and repent of his negligence.

Those legal religionists who find themselves in the quagmire of guilt will go on year after year, assuming that in their self-sanctifying attendance they are justified before God. They hope to pull out a perfect attendance chart at the final judgment in order to guarantee their entrance through the pearly gates.

Gospel is not about attendance charts. Those in Hebrews 10 who customarily failed to show up in attendance were those who were struggling with their response to the gospel of Jesus. In fact, the entire book of Hebrews addressed this problem. The problem was not the violation of some law of attendance. The problem was that some were turning away from the gospel of Jesus. They were no longer motivated by the reigning King Jesus who was functioning in heaven as their High Priest and King (Hb 7:24-26; 8:1). They were falling away from the gospel priesthood and reign of Jesus. The Hebrew writer reminded them, and us, concerning what happened in the latter years of Israel when the nation fell away to the extent that it was not possible for them to repent. He wrote, “For it is impossible ... if they fall away, to renew them again to repentance, since they crucify to themselves the Son of God and put Him to open shame” (Hb 6:4-6).

It would be impossible for them to repent because they would be content with the self-righteousness of the Jewish religion to which they returned. The ceremonial religiosity of Judaism appealed to them, so much so that it made it impossible for the gospel to once again have an appeal to their hearts.

People who want to walk in the bondage of their own self-righteous rules will always seek to return to the bondage of Egypt. In the following statement, Peter referred to some former Christians who eventually made their way from freedom in Christ back to the bondage of Egypt:

For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled in them and overcome, the latter end is worse for them than the beginning (2 Pt 2:20; see 2:21,22).

The last state is worse because the gospel of grace no longer had any appeal to their hearts to motivate them to escape the bondage of the world.

We must not think that religion does not have a tremendous appeal to the hearts and minds of those who seek to either narcissistically please their own flesh in the realm of religion, or to take glory in the security of institutional religion. When it seems that everyone is moving in the direction of a “big church” with an energetic concert of entertainment on Sunday morning, then it is time to be cautious. It is time to read again that the gate unto eternal glory is very narrow (See Mt 7:13,14). We must not forget that Jesus leads us out of the security of institutional religion and into a realm of faith wherein we must trust in the power of His resurrection (See Ph 3:8-11).

We must not forget that it was the religious majority who put Jesus on the cross. It was the religious majority who persecuted the early Christians. And, it was the religious majority upon whom God brought down judgment in A.D. 70 with the destruction of Jerusalem. Therefore, before one joins the religious majority, he should take another look at whether the majority is living the gospel of King Jesus.

We must never forget that any form of theology that affirms that one is saved by faith alone is a theology of self-righteousness. It is not difficult to come to this conclusion. If one declares that he is saved solely on the basis of his own faith, then he has meritoriously declared his salvation. His faith is the meritorious condition upon which he declares his salvation. The problem is in one making a personal declaration of one's own salvation. Though the word of God would state that one is baptized for remission of sins (At 2:38), one's declaration of having remission of sins on the merit of his own faith is self-declared righteousness.

If one states that he is in Christ because of his faith alone, then he has meritoriously self-declared himself to be in Christ on the merit of his faith. The word of God states that one is baptized into Christ (Rm 6:3; Gl 3:27). But if one declares that he is in Christ on the merit of his own faith, then he has meritoriously declared himself to be in Christ on the basis of faith. This is self-righteousness.

If one through faith alone lays claim to those spiritual blessings that the word of God declares are received through God's declaration, then one has set aside the declaration of the conditions of God to receive all spiritual blessings (See Gl 3:26-29; Ep 1:3). He has done so in order to receive all spiritual blessings in Christ by making his own meritorious claim to the blessings on the basis of his faith alone. This is self-righteousness.

Self-righteous declarations to possess those things that God states are received on the condition of responding to the gospel, are meritorious declarations that are based on the condition of one's faith alone. On the other hand, spiritual blessings that result from one's response to the gospel are never self-righteous. They are never self-declared. They are not meritoriously received. They are not because they are declared blessings by God in response to the conditions of the word of God. Obedience to God's instructions is never self-righteous because one is simply being obedient to God. His conditions for salvation are never conditions to which we can meritoriously lay claim.

Self-righteousness is not the receiving of God's blessings when we comply with His conditions to establish a covenant with Him. When God makes the declaration that we have remission of sins upon our response to the condition of obedience to the gospel, then we are not declaring for ourselves our own remission of sins on the basis of our faith. It is God who makes the declaration of the remission of our sins when we go to the cross with His Son, to the grave of water, and then rise with Him as His Son rose from the dead (Rm 6:3-6). It is then that God declares we have washed away our sins (At 22:16).

Therefore, one has a choice as to whether he will put his trust in his own self-declared remission of sins based on the merit of his faith alone, or on God's declaration of the same when one is obedient to the gospel. It might be good to conclude this chapter with another reading of how self-righteous declarations led Israel away from God.

For I [Paul] testify of them [the Jews] that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge.

For they being ignorant of God's righteousness and seeking to establish their own righteousness, have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God (Rm 10:2,3).

Does this sound familiar? If it does, then one may have established his own system of righteousness by which he would consider himself right before God. The problem with religion is that it is a system of self-sanctification by which one would consider himself justified of sin before God. Religion is simply our self-determination to establish rules and measures by which we would consider ourselves sanctified of all wrong doing. We bring this into our faith, and thus we create a religion. The problem with religion is that we make ourselves the judge of whether we are sanctified before God. This is exactly what the Jews had done by the time Jesus came into this world. They had established their own righteousness, and by doing such they rejected the righteousness of God. All religion is inherently contrary to the grace of God.

THE INCARNATIONAL SON

At this point in this book we must become personal, that is, personal in reference to the life of Saul the Pharisee, who later became Paul the incarnational apostle. Philippians 3:1-11 is truly an inspirational text wherein Paul revealed his own incarnational journey by which he sought to live the incarnational journey of Jesus.

If a passage could be written of one being in heart and soul tethered to the Lord Jesus Christ, this would be the passage. And since Paul instructed those in Achaia to be imitators of him as He was of Christ (1 Co 11:1), then it is incumbent on us to dig deep into this explanation of how he, as John the Baptist, lived after the incarnational example of the Son of God. His life was indeed an incarnational example that answers the question concerning what one should be and do in order to imitate the God who existed in spirit, but lowered Himself to be man in the flesh.

In Philippians 2, Paul had just explained in this letter that as disciples of the incarnate Son of God, we must live the mind of Christ. “Let this mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus, who being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God” (Ph 2:5,6). The New International Version probably better translated this verse: “Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped” (Ph 2:6).

God the Son did not covet the nature of Deity when considering the value of those whom He had created after the image of God (Cl 1:16). The very fact that He emptied Himself of the nature of God proves forever that God was never after the nature of man. God is spirit (Jn 4:24). The Son of God sacrificed spirit for flesh (Jn 1:14).

The extent of his transformational journey will never be fully understood by us. Nevertheless, in some way Paul exhorts us to have the mind of the incarnate Son of God. In some way, we too must make this incarnational journey in our own lives. Philippians 3:1-11 is Paul's personal testimony as to how he made the journey. His life was such a strong testimony to incarnational living after the incarnational journey of Jesus, that the Holy Spirit here allows him in Scripture to give us an example of how to so live.

“To write the same things to you indeed is not tedious” (Ph 3:1). It is not that we need a second opinion on incarnational living. The fact is that we need to be told what the truth is twice or more. We need to reread this context with prayer and fasting. The reason is obvious. “For you it is safe” (Ph 3:1). It is safe to stay close to Paul and Jesus because of the dogs of religious leadership: “Beware of the dogs. Beware of the evil workers. Beware of the false circumcision” (Ph 3:2). These were those religionists who would profess to be Christian, but by their behavior they would deny the incarnational Son of God. The world is full of such people. John warned us with the following words: “For many deceivers have gone out into the world who do not confess that Jesus Christ is coming in the flesh. This is the deceiver and the antichrist” (2 Jn 7).

These religious “dogs” presented themselves as people of great sacrifice and faith. They presumed to lead people with the example of their “persecutions for their faith.” Paul used a harsh term to define such people. However, we do not accredit the word “dogs” to have originated from Paul. It was the Holy Spirit who directed the pen of Paul to inscribe the word.

The Spirit was serious because He realized that we are as sheep without a shepherd. The Spirit knows that we are too eager to follow any religious charlatan that may come along who presumptuously assumes that he has been miraculously validated for the leadership of the church.

We once visited an “elder” of such a group that had innocently been led astray by one who boasted of his great struggles in propagating his message around the world. We were given a 290-page book that was written by this worldwide false apostle. The book was entirely about the supposed miracles that the prophet claimed to have experienced in his journeys. His miraculous deliverance supposedly validated him to lead the church. The entire worldwide network of churches that the self-appointed apostle had established was based on his personal testimonies of miraculous deliverances that were written in his autobiography.

By revealing the exact opposite of what the aforementioned false apostle professed, the Holy Spirit allowed Paul to begin his testimony of what he sacrificed for Christ. The results of Paul’s life were entirely different. Here is why: Paul wrote, “We rejoice in Christ Jesus and have no confidence in the flesh” (Ph 3:3). In other words, Paul wrote, “If I have to boast, I will boast of the things that concern my weakness” (2 Co 11:30).

When men start boasting concerning their sufferings for Jesus, they are seeking to call people after themselves, and not after Christ. Though Paul used his sufferings for Christ as an argument against the false apostles in Achaia, he reminded them and ourselves that boasting in the many sacrifices we might have endured for Jesus is simply foolishness (See 2 Co 11:1). It is foolishness because in publishing such sufferings one is actually trying to draw people to himself and away from the incarnational suffering Savior.

We must keep in mind that Paul was successful in using his incarnational living according to the gospel, not as a validation of the truth that he preached, but to reveal the sincerity by which he believed and preached the gospel. If one boasts in order to validate his message as truth, then he is a false apostle and evil doer.

Think for a moment. We are not called Paulites today. Neither were those in the first century called such, though some sought to follow the personalities of Paul, Cephas and Apollos (1 Co 1:12). If either Cephas or Apollos used their sufferings to validate the truth of the gospel they preached, then we could be called either Cephites or Apollosites. This would be true if the message these men preached originated exclusively from them and was validated by their sufferings. But because the message originated from God, the early disciples were called after Christ alone. Even though Paul wrote most of the letters of the New Testament, we are still called after Christ, for it was Christ who was crucified for us, and it was into the name of Christ that we were baptized (1 Co 1:13).

So Paul reminded the Philippian “flesh boosters” that “if anyone else thinks that he may have confidence in the flesh, I far more” (Ph 3:4). In other words, one should never enter into a debate over sacrifices with the incarnational living apostle Paul (See 2 Co 11:16-32). Paul had to give only a brief survey of who he was and what he had done as a religious leader. This he had before Jesus knocked him off a horse on his way to continue his persecution of the disciples in Damascus (Ph 3:5,6; see At 9:1-19).

Every self-proclaimed religious leader who through pride seeks pomp and the opportunity to empty the purses of the poor, should read this: “But what things were gain to me, those things I have counted loss for Christ” (Ph 3:7). This is incarnational leadership according to the God who became flesh on our behalf. These are the thoughts that God expressed through Jeremiah:

But let him who glories glory in this, that he understands and knows Me, that I am the Lord who exercises lovingkindness, justice and righteousness on the earth. For in these things I delight (Jr 9:24).

Institutional religion is sustained by a hierarchy of leaders who often seek position, pomp and power in order to receive the offerings (tithes) from the purses of the attendees. But those who would lead the disciples of Jesus must be able to say, “What things were gain to me in the world, I have counted loss for Christ.”

THE INCARNATIONAL LIFE

In Philippians 3:7 the Holy Spirit allowed Paul to begin his personal testimony of living the incarnational life of the gospel. His description of his journey in Christ validates why the Spirit allowed him to write to those in a similar situation in Achaia: “Be imitators of me even as I also am of Christ” (2 Co 11:1). In his own way, Paul lived the mind of Christ.

So he begins by reflecting on his previous life as a religious leader in Jerusalem. “What things were gain to me [in my former religious life], those things I have counted loss for Christ” (Ph 3:7). The life of a disciple of Jesus is not an opportunity for either financial gain or notoriety. Ambition for such things is contrary to the incarnational example of the Son of God. They are opposed to the “mind of Christ.” We can understand why Saul was so hesitant in succumbing to the goads that constantly pricked him while he persecuted those in Judea who lived incarnationally. As Saul the religious leader of Judea, he enjoyed all the pomp and power such a leader could enjoy in the religion of the Jews (Gl 1:13).

Jesus said to Saul on the Damascus road, “It is hard for you to kick against the goads” (At 26:14). Every time Saul imprisoned or beat a disciple, there was a goad that pricked his conscience as a stubborn cow is goaded with a stick to remain walking in a straight path. It took a special appearing of Jesus to convert this goad-pricked persecutor. But Jesus knew that once convinced with a vision from heaven, the hardheaded Saul would become the tenderhearted saint who would open the door for the gospel to the Gentiles.

Saul’s problem was that he knew that if he became as those whom he persecuted, he would have to begin living as they lived. So after the Damascus road experience, he tarried blind in Damascus for three days until a disciple came to him and said, “Why are you waiting? Arise and be baptized and wash away your sins, calling on the name of the Lord” (At 22:16). He was from that day forward, the Jewish official named Saul who became the incarnational Paul who lived as those he once persecuted. He reminded the Philippians, “I count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things” (Ph 3:8).

It was not that Paul simply gave up a great deal for Jesus. True, there was the actual sacrifice of losing all the pride, pomp and purse that he enjoyed as a leading religious persecutor of the “sect of Christians.” That was the real and actual. But in Philippians 2:5, we must remind ourselves that incarnational sacrifice involves not only sacrifice of things, but also a paradigm shift in one’s mind. Paul had introduced his statements here with the exhortation, “Let this mind be in you” (Ph 2:5). Incarnational living after the gospel of Jesus starts with the mind, but it must end up in the heart.

Therefore, there was a mental paradigm shift in Paul’s thinking concerning those things he had previously enjoyed as a leader in institutional religiosity. His standard of living came down, so far down that he at times went without food (See 2 Co 6:5). He was graphic in reference to the things he sacrificed: “I count them

[the things I previously enjoyed] refuse [dung] so that I may gain Christ” (Ph 3:8). Unless one is willing to forsake that which is of this world, he will continually be frustrated in his quest to gain Christ (See 1 Tm 6:10). One may act out in his life the mind of Christ, but unless the idolatry of money is conquered in one’s heart, he or she will never “gain Christ.” Paul remembered what Jesus said, “Whoever of you who does not forsake all that he has, cannot be My disciple” (Lk 14:33).

We are our own judge of how we will live incarnationally for Jesus. But the fact remains that our standard of living will come down in order that we share with others who are in need (See 1 Co 8:1-4; 3 Jn 6-8). All that we formerly consumed on our own lusts will be shared with others who are struggling to survive both physically and spiritually.

So we wonder how this was accomplished in the life of Paul. Before Saul became Paul, Saul was filled with religious self-righteousness. He eventually realized, however, that in order to discover the righteousness of God, there had to be a major shift from religion to grace. As Paul, he desired to ...

... be found in Him [Christ], not having my own righteousness that is from law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness that is from God by faith (Ph 3:9).

Saul was a religionist who conducted himself strictly according to the rites and rules of Judaism. However, once he was truly convinced and converted, all this changed in his life. In his masterful document against his former religiosity, he informed the Galatian disciples, “For you have heard of my behavior in the past in Judaism, how beyond measure I persecuted the church of God and tried to destroy it” (Gl 1:13). And indeed he tried, but the power of the resurrection that proved Jesus to be the Son of God, conquered him (See Rm 1:4).

In the Philippian letter, Paul answered a shortcoming that is often asserted by many. It is true that the power of the gospel is unto our initial salvation (Rm 1:16). Upon the basis of one’s faith in the resurrected Jesus, he or she is obedient to the gospel for the remission of sins (At 2:38). One is raised with Christ from the waters of baptism in order to walk in newness of life (Rm 6:3-6). It is a new life because one has come into the realm of the continual cleansing blood of Jesus (1 Jn 1:7). However, the power of the gospel goes far beyond one’s initial contact with the blood of Jesus when one’s sins are washed away (At 22:16). In Philippians 3:10 Paul counted all his previous accomplishments and possessions as refuse in order that he do as he wrote, “I want to know Him and the power of His resurrection.”

The power of the gospel of Jesus' resurrection goes far beyond being raised from the waters of baptism. The Colossian disciples evidently did not fully understand this. They did not fully understand that this power motivates life change. Paul needed to correct and encourage them with the following words: "If you then were raised with Christ, seek those things that are above" (Cl 3:1). If one sets his "mind on things above" (Cl 3:2), he or she will put to death worldly behavior that is "on the earth: fornication, uncleanness, passion, evil desire," etc. (Cl 3:5). He or she will "put on the new man, who is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him who created him" (Cl 3:10).

The power of the resurrection is revealed in the transformed life. The power of the gospel, therefore, does not cease at the waters of baptism. The power continues on as the primary motivation for one to count the things of the world to be loss for Christ. One is saved by the blood of Christ at baptism, but it is in thanksgiving of this salvation that one lives the gospel of Jesus. It was the cross and resurrection of Jesus that empowered Paul to lead the incarnational life. It was the power of this gospel that continued to motivate him to grow in the grace and knowledge of Christ (2 Pt 3:18).

But there is a stipulation. People seem to have an eager desire to have a "personal relationship" with Jesus. However, they often fail to understand what this means. In Philippians 3, Paul surveyed through what he had to do in order to come into the realm of God's offer to have a personal relationship with us through His incarnate Son. God initiated the offer of a new covenant relationship, which is personal. However, in order to connect with this covenant relationship, Paul explained the stipulations. "I-count-all-things-loss" was not just a recollection of his life. It was his personal life of gratitude for that which he received in Christ. In other words, our lives must reflect the incarnate life of the Son of God. We must walk in gratitude of what He did for us. In this walk, we are walking in the light of His relationship with us, and thus, He continues to cleanse us of all sin (1 Jn 1:7).

Paul continued: "I want to know Him and the power of His resurrection and the fellowship of His sufferings, being like Him in His death" (Ph 3:10). We have encountered few who wanted to have a "personal relationship" with Jesus' sufferings, and then "count all things loss" for Jesus. The word "fellowship" in this verse is the Greek word koinonia. This is joint sharing, joint partnership and identity. This is incarnational living with the sufferings of Christ. We are partners with Jesus in His sufferings. If one is not suffering with Christ, then he should possibly reconsider his "personal" relationship with Christ. It may be that he is walking outside the realm of God's personal relationship that He extends to us through the sufferings of His Son.

We have discovered that most of those who seek a relationship with Jesus often do not understand what they are seeking. If they would understand how Paul came into this realm of relationship, then they might think twice. In any relationship with the incarnate Son of God comes also fellowship with His sufferings. Therefore, "all who desire to live godly in Christ Jesus will suffer persecution" (2 Tm 3:12). Nevertheless, "rejoice, in as much as you are partners of Christ's sufferings" (1 Pt 4:13). This is exactly what Jesus said at the conclusion of the Beatitudes and introduction to the sermon on the mountain (Mt 5:10-12). "Rejoice and be exceedingly glad" (Mt 5:12).

If one who seeks to have fellowship with the sufferings of Jesus as did Paul, then the following rehearsal by Paul of his godly living in Christ Jesus might encourage some to reconsider what is involved in establishing a relationship with the incarnate and ascended King Jesus:

But in all things approving ourselves as servants of God, in much endurance, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in beatings, in imprisonments, in turmoil, in labors, in sleeplessness, in fastings (2 Co 6:4,5).

Many of those who seek this relationship with Jesus often want it on their own terms. And thus, this is the birth of religion. The religionist seeks a relationship with God that is based on his own religiosity. The religionist seeks to establish a relationship with the Son of God on the basis of his performance of religious rites and rules that he would establish for himself that would bring him a sense of closeness with Christ. And thus, in his religiosity he establishes a self-sanctifying system of religion by which he can judge himself to be performing correctly in reference to his own religious rites and rules. But in establishing a relationship with the sufferings of Jesus, one, as Paul, can willingly do as James wrote, "Count it all joy when you fall into various trials" (Js 1:2).

Religion on our own terms is a system of self-deception. It is deception because the religionist has established his own conditions for his relationship with Jesus, which fellowship usually excludes all suffering for Jesus. Paul, on the other hand, understood the incarnational journey of Jesus into the flesh of man, and then to the suffering of the cross of death. It was this journey that Paul sought to follow, for he concluded, "... if, by any means, I may attain to the resurrection from the dead” (Ph 3:11). And therefore, “I affirm, brethren, by the boasting in you that I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily” (1 Co 15:31). It could be that we should wake up each morning with the thought on our minds, “To what will I die today ... to pride ... to selfishness ... to greed ... etc.”

Chapter 13

HE WRONG CALL

In order for one to call himself out of religion, and especially the heritage of religion that was handed to him by his forefathers, there must be a paradigm shift in mind and heart. But in order to generate a paradigm shift in a restoration from religion to gospel, a very important decision must be made. This decision involves the “what” and “who” unto which one must be called for direction in his move.

A. Tethered to God through His Son:

One must make a decision to untether himself from the bondage of heritage authority in order to be tethered to God only through Christ. This means that the gospel is the only means by which we can approach God. There can never be two tethers in our relationship with God. One cannot be tethered to the religion of one’s past, and at the same time, seek to be tethered to God through the gospel of His Son. It must be one or the other. Christ can have no competition in a restorational paradigm shift.

In their preaching of the gospel, this was the choice the early disciples presented to the Jews who in the first century were in the bondage of the Jews’ religion (Gl 1:13). It took Saul the persecutor some time to make the choice to be Paul the apostle, but he eventually made his way out of religion and into Christ. And of those things he counted sacred in the Jews’ religion, he wrote,

I count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, for whom I have suffered the loss of all things. I count them refuse so that I may gain Christ (Ph 3:8).

One can be, therefore, tethered only to Jesus. “For there is only one God and one mediator [tether] between God and men, the man Christ Jesus” (1 Tm 2:5). There is only one Lord (Ep 4:5). Peter was very specific about this matter: “There is salvation in no other [than Jesus Christ], for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved” (At 4:12). It is only through Jesus that one can be tethered to God. This leaves religion outside the realm of establishing a relationship (covenant) with God. Salvation is not through meritorious religiosity, but through Christ alone.

Unfortunately, throughout history there have arisen numerous misguided efforts on the part of sincere people to establish a relationship with God, which relationship has been obscured by the influences of their religion. In their desire to establish a gospel relationship with God, some have been diverted by religion in the wrong direction. After a few decades, they ended up back where they started. They left sectarian religiosity in order to establish a direct relationship with God, but because they based their paradigm shift on the foundation of their forefathers’ religion, they missed their desired destination. They circled around and ended up being that from which they fled. They left sectarian religion, but constructed a sectarian movement that inherently produced different sects within the movement. Restoration within a particular religion is a disguised reformation movement. Reformation movements always lead to the birth of more religious sects.

B. Restoration of the gospel of Christ:

A common slogan that unfortunately leads to sectarianism is the call that we must restore the “New Testament church.” When living in the midst of religious confusion, this sounds like a noble call. It sounds like a call for restoration that is away from the sectarian denominationalism in which most of the “Christian” world lives. But it is a call that has embedded within it flaws of human reasoning. This may not at first be noticed, but the results of many misguided restoration movements throughout history have proved that restorations that are not based on the gospel eventually lead to the establishment of more religious sects.

In making a call for the restoration of the “New Testament church,” we often have our favorite Old Testament passages that were originally stated in the context of an Israel that had gone beyond repentance and repair. Nevertheless, we quote proclamations as, “Stand in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths” (Jr 6:16). At the time this plea was made, Israel was beyond restoration, for the people replied, “We will not walk in it” (Jr 6:16).

The calls of the prophets for repentance were vain when they were initially stated because God had already doomed Israel to go into captivity. The same calls in reference to restoration today are misapplied because the premise upon which we seek our noble goal is flawed.

The outcome of our call for restoration is often unsatisfactory because we misapply the call of the prophets for Israel's repentance. We unfortunately use the prophets call for repentance as proof texts in order to call for restoration today. But we miss a critical point. A call for repentance is different than a call for restoration.

Our use of the Old Testament pleas to Israel is out of context in reference to our plea to all religious groups today. The prophets pled for a return from going after Baal. All of us today believe in the God to whom the prophets pled for Israel to return. Using their pleas for repentance to the God of heaven is out of context in reference to our plea today to those who are stuck in religion, but believe commonly in the one God of heaven. We call for restoration from religion, not to the one true and living God in whom we all believe.

When the early disciples went forth to preach the gospel, their gospel call was not a plea to restore "the old paths" of the Old Testament. Those paths were nailed to the cross by the gospel event (Cl 2:14). The preaching of the gospel by the early evangelists was a call for a paradigm shift, not for a restoration to the "old paths" of the Sinai law. Their call was for a paradigm shift from self-justifying law-keeping to the grace of the God who sent His only begotten Son into the world. The early evangelists, therefore, called on the world to believe on this Son. We would settle for no less today. Theirs was a paradigm shift from Judaism to faith in the crucified Christ. Today, it is still a paradigm shift, but a shift from religion to the gospel.

C. Call to gospel, not sectarianism:

A call for the restoration of the "New Testament church" is misleading, if not sectarian. It is misleading in that it sets up everyone who would be a theologian with the task of determining what characteristics of the church we read about in the New Testament should be restored. And once this church is supposedly restored on the foundation of law, it is unfortunately assumed that salvation is in this restored biblical church. Church thus becomes the savior, not the Christ in whom we are saved as the church. We subsequently find our security in church rather than Christ.

In our efforts to restore today what we read in the New Testament, our focus must first be on the gospel, not on the dysfunctional response of the early disciples to the gospel. In the midst of a catalog of dysfunctional behavioral and doctrinal problems in the early church of the New Testament, each "church theologian" today is left with the daunting task of determining what examples and doctrinal beliefs of the early disciples must be restored.

In order to make a correct decision to determine what is "binding" today in our call for restoration, we have often progressed through a host of hermeneutical gymnastics in order to bind today those behavioral responses of the early disciples who were struggling out of legal Judaism or pagan idolatry. When we cannot come to a common outline of binding their examples in our misguided call for restoration of the "New Testament church," we often fuss over our hermeneutical gymnastics. In our debates with one another over "issues," we inadvertently become sectarian in our relationships with one another.

The call for a "restoration of the New Testament church" inherently results in sectarianism among all those who have the noble desire to "speak where the Bible speaks." However, we forget about "being silent where the Bible is silent." We are not silent for each sect among us determines to carry on with their own hermeneutical conclusions and practices from the authority of "examples" and "necessary inferences." Or, in setting aside any New Testament examples or inferences, we simply depend on our favorite religious performances or works in order to express our faith. Even worse, some just assemble around a favorite personality who can woo their loyalty Sunday after Sunday.

When a group eventually agrees on the "identifying characteristics of the church," the claim is often made that the "New Testament church" has been reestablished in our time. Once the form of this identity is inscribed on outlines and written in books and tracts, then it is usually propagated throughout the world as a mission message that is to be preached. The preaching of the "restored church" usually places the messengers (missionaries) in conflict with other institutionalized churches among the nations who are preaching that they too have "restored the church." In our zeal to duplicate a form of identity of the "biblical" church, Christ is often marginalized and the "doctrine" of the catechism for the church is capitalized.

Unfortunately, the fallacy of both the call and the hermeneutic to restore the "New Testament church" is that we are seeking to restore the wrong foundation upon which we would be the New Testament church. We obscure why the New Testament church existed in the first place. In our obsession over binding and loosing according to our theological hermeneutics, we lose sight of that which should bring people together as church. We forget that we should first be preaching Jesus Christ, and then the response that people should make to this gospel message.

We must be clear. It is not our task to restore the “New Testament church.” Nowhere in the New Testament is this plea made. But if this is our plea, then we are left with the task of determining which “New Testament church” we would seek to restore. Should it be the “New Testament church” in Corinth? Should it be the “New Testament church” in Ephesus at the time the disciples in Ephesus had lost their first love? Which “New Testament church” must we restore?

Because we confuse ourselves with the dysfunctional behavior of some churches we read about in the New Testament, we cast off that which we do not want to restore and set out on a hermeneutical journey to pick and choose what is worthy to become the major points on our outline of the “identity of the New Testament church.” For example, we choose the example of the Lord’s Supper every first day of the week by the church in Troas (At 20:7), but we discard fasting for missions by the church in Antioch (At 13:1-3). We make our contributions into the collection plate on Sunday morning, but refuse a contribution to a homeless person on Monday morning who shows up at our door. Many other examples could be listed. In our efforts to restore “the New Testament church,” we often become quite inconsistent with ourselves in our efforts to have biblical authority in all things that we do.

D. Inherent sectarian restorations:

When we call for a restoration we must be careful in establishing the foundation upon which we base our call. If we are not cautious, we may end up with some unfortunate conclusions that inherently cause us to divide from one another.

In our picking and choosing what we consider to be the “New Testament church,” we saddle ourselves with an inevitable sectarian conclusion. We will often go to battle with ourselves over determining which behavioral examples of “the New Testament church” should be binding, and thus, be restored. We leave ourselves with the daunting challenge of sifting through a catalog of examples of the early disciples we read about in the New Testament. We diligently sift hermeneutically in order to determine what we should restore in reference to the early disciples’ response to the gospel.

Our hermeneutic for determining that which should be restored is often inherently sectarian. We find ourselves fighting legal battles over the example responses of those, who in their obedience to the gospel, were venturing out of the bondage of legal religion. In our misguided call for a legal restoration, we subsequently legalize the examples of the early Christians’ deliverance from the bondage of legal justification. We often develop a systematic theology of law from the examples of those who through faith in the grace of God were set free from the bondage of systematic theology.

Any systematic theology is inherently sectarian. Here are some illustrations of deductive applications of examples that have become a part of someone’s theology that has led to sectarianism within their restoration movements: Some have concluded that there should be only one cup used during the Lord’s Supper (Proof text: Mt 26:27). Some have concluded that only wine can be used as the fruit of the vine in the Supper (Proof text: Deductions). Some have concluded that contributions could be made only on the first day of the week (Proof text: 1 Co 16:1,2). Some have concluded that individuals must be baptized the same hour of the night (Proof text: At 16:33). Some have concluded that assemblies of the church must be autonomous from one another (Proof text: ?). Some have concluded that members must place their membership with a particular autonomous group (Proof text: ?). Some have concluded that all singing must be congregational (Ep 5:19). Some have concluded that their group must have a specific name in order to label their uniqueness, and thus separate themselves from all others who do not conform to the dictates of their accepted church law.

This list of differences goes on, depending on where one is and with what group he or she is associated in fellowship. The call to restore the “New Testament church” sometimes forces on us a system of hermeneutics to understand and apply the New Testament in a way that inherently divides us from one another. It is inherently divisive because it is a call for the restoration of the wrong subject.

E. Unity efforts:

In such a scenario of embedded division, sectarian groups will inevitably arise. In order to establish some harmony among those who are inherently divided because of the way in which they have understood the Bible, a superficial unity is often established between those who discover that they must come to some common deductive conclusions.

In such cases, differences are often debated among the sects of misguided restorations. But for the sake of not having “division in the church,” agreements are made upon which a great number of the dissidents can come to a common understanding on what is binding and what is a matter of opinion. These are often legal matters of agreement that subsequently become the identifying characteristics of the movement, or those who would be identified as a part of the restoration movement for unity.

It is at this point that the movement as a whole becomes sectarian, and thus the movement is separated from all others who have followed the same system to determine their own behavior and theology in seeking to be the church of the first century. Unfortunately, the restoration movements that was initially started to produce unity, inadvertently encouraged the adherents to circle around and become that from which they fled.

Ecumenical movements are somewhat different. They are efforts to restore unity among different existing religious groups. Because these movements are efforts to produce some semblance of unity in a community of sectarianism, the adherents to such efforts must first realize that all ecumenical movements are orchestrated by men who come together in order to speak in peace with one another. Unfortunately, in order for religious leaders to speak peace in the same room there must be theological compromises, or at least theological temperance. In such environments the authority of the Scriptures is often set aside. But this does not necessarily have to be.

Simply because there is an effort to be together for the sake of peace among different religious groups does not mean that we should leave our Bibles at home. If we forget the word of God in our efforts to be together, then we have doomed ourselves to create religion. True unity must be based on something greater than our forbearance of one another’s theology. Unity must be based on our common understanding of the gospel. If we come together for unity that is first based on the gospel, then there is hope.

We have, fortunately, witnessed some ecumenical efforts on the part of many religious leaders who want to lay aside their theological deductions in order to unite on the gospel alone. There is some hope for these movements. In one such meeting where we were invited to speak with the leaders of such a movement, the question was asked by one of the leaders, “How can we be united when we all believe so many different doctrines?” Our response was, “When we understand the gospel correctly, and agree to be united on the foundation of the gospel alone, then many of the theological differences we have with one another simply fade away or become points over which we feel there should be no argument. At least they become points that should not keep us away from one another.”

We are in contact with thousands of church leaders who have grown weary of division over senseless issues. These leaders seek unity that is based on the gospel more than the preservation of their religious heritage, or the uniqueness of their particular group. Theirs is a thirst to respond to the gospel alone in order to present before the world a oneness in Christ that is based on Him (Jn 17:20,21).

Admittedly, these are independent churches who have already released themselves from the shackles of traditional religions. They have left the sectarianism of traditional religion, but in their “restoration,” they became sectarian among themselves because their initial move was not based solely on the gospel. Nevertheless, these independent church leaders realize where they are. In the midst of so much evil in their communities, they have come to the conclusion that in some way they must work together. They now seek to work together in their communities in order to be united on the foundation of the gospel. We would write and confess that this is indeed an exhilarating time in history where such restorations to the gospel are taking place.

F. Gospel foundation only:

Our quest for unity must not be based on catechisms, but on the gospel of Christ. If we call for a restoration of a correct catechism, then we often bind on ourselves the task of choosing a supposedly correct catechism upon which we must all agree, which catechism will supposedly bring us all together in unity. And in order to establish the correct catechism, we must bind on ourselves a hermeneutic by which we will all understand the Bible alike, and subsequently, come to some common conclusions. These are legal restorations that usually produce division because they are not based primarily on the gospel.

Inevitably, our hermeneutic of legal restoration of necessity involves deductive conclusions, and inherent in deductive conclusions is division. Deductive conclusions are subject to the minds of men, and thus, we are often left to the mercy of those among us whom we consider to be our scholars to make the correct deductions. We subsequently submit ourselves to a hierarchy of authorities to whom we give the right to hand down interpretative dictates to the laity.

God did not clone our minds to come to the same conclusions through a deductive system of reasoning. Our hermeneutic of “deductivism,” therefore, is inherently flawed with human reasoning. And since we are independent in our thinking, our deductive process of reasoning often leads us to different conclusions. We subsequently become different sects if we seek to bind our conclusions on one another as the catechism of “our church.”

However, there is hope in all sectarianism. There is hope if we once again refocus on the gospel as the foundation of our unity. There are no deductive conclusions to be made about the gospel. What is revealed as gospel in the New Testament is revealed in clear statements as historical facts. No interpretation is needed. If we all refocus on the foundation of the gospel, then we may not all have to start a restorational journey from the same sect. Nevertheless, if we persistently focus together on the gospel of Jesus, then we will eventually end up together on the same path.

The path of almost everyone originates out of some past religious heritage. But if we continue to focus on the gospel, our paths will inevitably converge, regardless of our religious origins. It is simply the beauty of the gospel to produce that which we all crave, that is, brotherhood in Christ. We seek to answer the prayer of Jesus as He prayed to the Father: “That they all may be one; even as You, Father, are in Me and I in You, that they also may be one is Us” (Jn 17:21).

We must be warned, however, that as restoration movements age, they inherently become the heritage of the people. And when the deductive conclusions of a legal restoration become a part of heritage theology, then the deductive interpretations become a part of the authority of the heritage. We have thus doomed ourselves to eventually decline in numbers as new generations arise who are not attached to the heritage of the fathers, specifically to some of the deductive interpretations of the fathers.

These things are now happening in the religious scenes of many nations with which we are familiar. Unfortunately, those who are trapped within what have become heritage movements have a difficult time understanding the reason for the decline of their heritage churches. Respect for the catechism of doctrine of the heritage is simply diminishing.

Because the heritage was originally identified by a legal catechism of deductive interpretations, the older generation is now quite unsettled in witnessing the decline of their religious heritage that they have sought to pass on to their children. They are having difficulty understanding that legal restorations inherently divide or are doomed to failure as succeeding generations interpret the Scriptures according to their own cultural needs. But as Paul wrote to the Corinthians—we use his statement somewhat out of context—we would say, “And yet I show to you a more excellent way” (1 Co 12:31).

THE RIGHT CALL

The problem that eventually leads to a decline in any movement, whether restorational or ecumenical, is the original call upon which the movement was initially based. Legal restorationists often make a call for restoration that is based on what we would consider a catechism of law. This is done in order to establish a doctrinal identity for those who seek to be identified with the movement. Those who identify with the catechism are allowed to be in fellowship with the movement. Those who find flaws in the catechism are considered to have left the movement.

The inherent nature with this system of identity is that we become serious students of law, but often overlook the cause as to why the early church came into existence. In our call for legal restoration, therefore, we often marginalize Christ by seeking to exalt the law of the “New Testament church.” We do so by seeking to identify legally the church in the New Testament. Our favorite books become Acts and the epistles, and not Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, with the coronation of the Lord Jesus Christ in Revelation. The primary subject of our sermons is based on law, not the Lord Jesus Christ. We often become judges of one another in order to make sure that each one of us conforms to the catechism that identifies who we are.

We are thus intimidated to conform to law, rather than focus on Christ and live the gospel which we have obeyed. But if our obedience was not initially in obedience to the gospel of Christ, but to law, then we easily carry on with law-keeping without focusing on Christ. We thus become a church of the right laws, but often have a minor focus on Jesus.

However, when we follow the message of the early disciples, we discover something that is quite different than what is often preached today among those who seem to believe that they have a copyright on restoration. We are encouraged, therefore, to take another look at the message that was preached among Jews and Greeks in the first century. The result of the message was so phenomenal that it was proclaimed that the Christians had turned the world upside down (At 17:6).

It is the gospel that has carried disciples throughout the centuries unto this day. Our primary task, therefore, is not to restore the New Testament church by focusing specifically on the legal form of the church, but to continue the proclamation of the gospel that has resulted in the existence of the New Testament church every century since the Pentecost of Acts 2. If our focus is on preaching the gospel, church is always the serendipity of our message. The church of Christ will always exist when Christ is always preached.

A. Preach the gospel:

Remember when Jesus said, “Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature” (Mk 16:15)? The message of the early evangelists was the gospel, not the “law of the church.” Their message to those who obeyed the gospel led to a transformed life. They were transformed in response to the gospel reign of our Lord Jesus Christ (Rm 12:1,2; Cl 3:1,2).

The gospel was not a catechism to identify the church. It was a message that had the power to save and change lives. When the gospel was preached, the church of the saved was the result. The gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ is the message and the cause. The church is the body of individuals who are saved and transformed by the gospel.

Unfortunately, we have often reversed the focus of the early disciples. We make the identity of the “church” the message, and the gospel of Christ an afterthought. In fulfilling the great commission of Jesus we have been guilty of going into all the world and preaching church first and then mentioning Jesus on the side.

In preaching “church” as our central message to the religious world, not only is our message often sterile of the gospel of God’s love through Jesus, it also encourages an appeal “to join the church of our choice.” So in order that the preacher seemingly guarantees the “right choice,” proof text upon proof text—precept, upon precept (Is 28:10)—are accumulated under each point of a multiple-point sermon outline in order to identify the right church. The preacher thus proves that he is a messenger of a legally-defined New Testament church, and not a preacher of the gospel. He is getting the egg before the chicken, forgetting that the gospel produces the body; the body (church) does not produce the Christ.

B. Preaching the resurrected and reigning Lord Christ:

We must remember in Acts 2 on the day of Pentecost that which cut the people to the heart was the gospel message of the resurrected and reigning King. “This Jesus God has raised up” (At 2:32). “Therefore, let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made this same Jesus whom you have crucified, both Lord and Christ” (At 2:36). This message keeps the chicken before the egg.

After the resurrection of Jesus, Jesus was no longer just the good Teacher from Nazareth. He was no longer just Jesus who walked with the disciples on the roads of Galilee. He was no longer just the brave Teacher who stood up and taught in the temple and the synagogues. He was now the resurrected, raised and reigning King Jesus at the right hand of God (Hb 8:1). This was the gospel message that cut the people to the heart on the day of Pentecost (At 2:37). This was the message that turned the world upside down. This message will do the same today if we once again restore gospel preachers among us.

We seem to miss this point, especially among those who only want to know Jesus simply as the good teacher with His disciples on the road to and from Galilee. Such is brought out in the request of many who seek a more “personal relationship with Jesus,” which often translates into a “mere” relationship. At least it gives the appearance that if one behaves correctly he or she can have and maintain a “personal relationship” with Jesus. But this often becomes self-righteous religiosity because our thinking and behavior are based on self-appointed merits by which we seek to establish and maintain a relationship with Jesus.

One often concludes that if his or her relationship is to be “personal,” then one must bind on oneself “personal works” to perform in order to “measure up” to what he or she thinks Jesus would expect of us. When one fails in his or her own self-imposed standards of expectation, then he or she feels emotionally unworthy. He or she often questions why God is not accepting one’s performance.

This is performance-oriented religion. It leads to a lack of confidence in the sanctifying power of the blood of Jesus because our confidence is focused on our own self-imposed performance. And when our performance fails, we first blame God.

It is certainly a noble desire to feel close to Jesus. But our meritorious behavior is somewhat misguided if we seek such a relationship that is based on our own performance of self-imposed works. It is somewhat misguided because the object of our relationship is no longer the man Jesus whom we seek to know according to the flesh in the records of the gospel. The man Jesus is now King and Lord over all things.

Paul certainly knew Jesus as a man while Jesus was in the flesh, for he was acquainted with the events of Palestine during the ministry of Jesus. A few years after the beginning of the preaching of the gospel, he even persecuted those who followed the Nazarene called Jesus. He persecuted these followers even unto death because he believed that Jesus was only a rebellious leader of a sect of Nazarenes.

But Paul's understanding of Jesus changed from Jesus the man to Jesus the resurrected and reigning Son of God. After the gospel of the ascension of Jesus, he once wrote the following words to some who possibly still considered Jesus to be only a renowned teacher from of Galilee:

Therefore, from now on we know no man according to the flesh [including Jesus]. Even though we have known Christ according to the flesh, yet now we know Him thus no more" (2 Co 5:16).

If we are preaching that people must have a personal relationship with Jesus according to the flesh, then we are limiting the gospel message that we must establish a gospel covenant relationship of peace with the reigning King Jesus. Our relationship must go beyond what we would consider a personal relationship with Jesus in the flesh, for we no longer know Him "according to the flesh." We are preaching an earthly message because we are seeking to attach people to a concept of Jesus while He was yet in the flesh. But now we do not know Him as such.

What the people understood from the message of Peter on Pentecost was that it was no longer Jesus according to the flesh. It was the resurrected and ascended Jesus who was reigning as Lord and Christ. And being at the right hand of God and reigning on David's throne meant that the resurrected Jesus is now King and Lord over all things (See Mt 28:18; Ep 1:21-23). He is now as Isaiah prophesied of Him:

For to us a child is born, to us a Son is given. And the government will be upon His shoulder. And His name will be called Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace (Is 9:6).

The church of Christ came into existence in the first century because people believed in the gospel message of the reigning King Jesus. If we would speak of personal relationships with this King, therefore, we must seek out how we would establish a covenant relationship with King Jesus who is now reigning over all things. He is now Lord and King! He is the One before whom all of us will eventually give account.

For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that everyone may receive the things done in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad (2 Co 5:10; see Jn 12:48).

Jesus is now the King about whom He spoke when He taught His disciples. He is the King with whom each one of us must make peace before He comes again with His mighty angels (See 2 Th 1:6-9). Whatever relationship one might seek to establish with this coming King, it must be a relationship of reverence, awe and submission. We must establish a covenant with this King before He comes. In order to do this, we must obey the gospel of King Jesus in order to come into the realm of His grace (Gl 3:26-29). This is what those who were cut to the heart on the day of Pentecost realized, and thus were willing to do what Peter instructed: "Repent and be baptized every one of you" (At 2:38).

We preach Jesus the Christ and King. This was the message of the early disciples. Some have had difficulty understanding Paul's statement in 1 Corinthians 1:17 when he referred to this message: "For Christ did not send me to baptize, but to preach the gospel." Those who are of a legal heritage have reversed the order. They would conclude from their catechism of identity that evangelists must first be sent to baptize legally, and then the baptized believer must be disciplined in matters of knowing Christ. This is revealed in the preaching of those who preach church in meetings with little mention of Christ.

This was the reverse order of what Jesus instructed the disciples to do in His great commission into all the world. Before His ascension, He said to them, "Going, therefore, disciple all nations, baptizing them ..." (Mt 28:19). People were first to be disciplined to Christ, and then baptized.

This is the correct order of what Peter preached on Pentecost. It was the order of all the evangelists who obeyed the commission to go into all the world and preach the gospel. It was the order of what Paul preached in Corinth upon his initial arrival in the city. He later wrote to the Corinthians, and all those in the province of Achaia, "For I delivered to you first of all that which I also received" (1 Co 15:3). And that which he received was a risen Christ who died for our sins and was resurrected to reign as King of kings (1 Co 15:3,4). This is the gospel order that we must preach as we go into all the world.

When Philip encountered the eunuch on his way back home to Ethiopia, he preached "Jesus" to him (At 8:35). It was only later, and after hearing this gospel message, that the eunuch said, “See, here is water! What hinders me from being baptized” (At 8:36). And herein is the difference between preaching a legal catechism of restoration, and the gospel of the incarnate Son of God who lived on earth under the name of Jesus. This Jesus was crucified, buried and resurrected, and is now reigning as the King who will come again. It is, therefore, as Paul wrote, “We preach Christ crucified” (1 Co 1:23).

Our message to draw people to the cross is the good news of the incarnation, crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, coronation and consummation in the final revelation of King Jesus from heaven. It is this message that cuts people to the heart. It is this message to which people gravitate away from institutional religiosity to a relationship with the One who is now reigning over all things. This is the power of the gospel to change the lives of those who realize that they will eventually give account of themselves before a returned King (Jn 12:48; At 17:30,31). King Jesus is the right and only mediator through whom we must call all men in order to reconnect with the King who is over all things (1 Tm 2:5).

Epilogue

We close this book with the appeal that the gospel makes to the heart of every person. Consider a powerful metaphor that Paul used when he reminded the Corinthians of the power of the gospel:

*Moreover, brethren, I declare to you the gospel which I preached to you, which also you received and in which you stand (1 Co 15:1).

The word “stand” is metaphorically used by Paul to explain the confidence that one receives from the power of the gospel. He did not use the word “sit.” He did not use the word “lay.” He used a word that portrays one standing erect with confidence.

The gospel is our confidence to remain brave in the midst of the emotional storms that come our way in life. The gospel is the enabling power that encourages us to remain strong when bullied. When we feel rejected, the gospel informs us that we are accepted by God Himself. When we are put down, the gospel of Jesus lifts us up again to a standing position. When theologians intimidate us through intellect, our confidence is in knowing the simple gospel message of Jesus, being assured that we are saved by the gospel. When we have low self-esteem, the gospel stands us up on a pedestal before Jesus, reassuring us that we are blood-bought children of God. When we fear because of a lack of confidence in ourselves, the gospel of an ascended King Jesus instills within us self-assurance to face every trial that comes our way. When it seems that the world is falling apart, the gospel of the coronation of King Jesus is reassurance that all things are still under His control, and thus, will work together for good for those who love Him.

Young and old need to hear this message. It is this gospel message of reassurance that Paul preached, and in which he remained confident throughout his life. Until the end, therefore, every gospel-obedient person can repeat with confidence the following words of Paul:

To this gospel I am appointed a preacher and an apostle and a teacher. For this reason I also suffer these things. Nevertheless, I am not ashamed, for I know whom I have believed and am persuaded that He is able to keep what I have committed to Him until that day (2 Tm 1:11,12).
